CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE OLD CLOCK IN THE HALL.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

It stands in a corner of the room
Behind the door, in the shade and gloom
In a heavy and antique case,
Rich mahogany, maple and oak,
Battered and scratched and dim with smoke
And the hands are bent on the face !

The knob and hinges are red with rust,
The top o' th' mouldings covered with dust,
The panels are yellow with stains,
And a ragged web like a tattered pall
Runs from its side to the sombre wall,
And over the window panes.

The pendulum swings, the wheels go round,
Making a dull, monotonous sound,
As the vanishing moments fleet ;
A "tick," like the falling of grains of sand,
As Time was pouring from out his hand
The dust of years at his feet !

Years have vanished—forgotten years—
With all their sorrows and sins and tears,
And left their marks in the hall ;—
The old have died, the young grown old—
Generations have gone to mould,
And the clock survives them all.

Beautiful girls have watched the hours,
Knitting at stands, or working flowers
In frames of 'broidery fine—
And mornings, the young folks playing late
Wished the moments fettered to "eight,"
For the school began at "nine !"

Mothers, with sons in distant lands,
Sorrowing, chid its tardy hands,
And dreamed of the meeting dear—
And wives whose husbands returned at night
Marked the time in the fading light,
And listened for footsteps near !

Blushing brides at their toilets gay,
In snowy robes on the happy day,
Have waited the hour to wed :
And sick folks, tussling on beds of pain,
Gazed at the clock again and again,
And watched beside the dead !

But years have vanished, and others fill
Their place, and the old clock standeth still

Ticking as in its pride :—

Summer and winter, day and night,
A sexton chiming the hours' flight,
Tolling the knell of Time !

THE "GOOD OLD TIMES."

A fig for the "good old times,"
Of which some love to sing ;
A fig for the dogg'el rhymes
From grumblers' brains that spring.

In these "good old times," say they,
"Men were as men should be ;
They fared on the best each day,
And lived right jollily !"

"Starvation was then unknown—
Taxation but a name ;
Now 'neath the latter men groan,
For thence the former came."

A plague on your "good old times !"—
"Ye drivelling dotards, cease !—
Say, what but their splendid crimes
Now rob us of our fleece ?

We 're shorn to the very skin,
While still the debt remains ;
And, like some national sin,
The nation's life it drains.

Though many fared well each day,
The millions were oppress'd ;—
'T is a crowning lie to say,
The people then were bless'd.

And never again, let's pray,
May might alone be right ;
The sun of a better day
Now sheds its glorious light !

Then a fig for the "good old times,"
Of which some love to sing :
And a fig for the dogg'el rhymes
From grumblers' brains that spring.

CATCH.

NEAR the moon a pale star clinging
Harbingers another morn,
Feeble spark to mortals bringing
Hopes and cares with daylight born.

Fare thee well, thou moon of sadness !
Silent night, awhile farewell !
Will the day give grief or gladness ?
Who of Adam's race can tell ?

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

Fare thee well, thou moon of beauty !
Hail, thou glorious rising sun !
Let the weak be strong in duty,
Till their course, like thine, be run.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THERE was a Ball at Belvedere on Thursday night—to dance out the Old and sing in the New Year. The Viceroy and Lady Lansdowne were present to bid farewell to 1891 and greet 1892. Just at the hour when the two Years met, the dancing ceased and the band played "Auld Lang Syne." The guests took up the strain and the old song was sung lustily. The party broke up with exchange of good wishes for the New Year.

SEVERAL churches had midnight services to bless the New Year. The ships on the river rang bells, blew steam whistles, and fired rockets to announce the departure and the advent.

THE Maharaja of Kapurthala is in Calcutta.

FOR manufacture of matches, there are, in Europe, about 50,000 factories, producing annually a quantity valued at 10,000,000*l.* sterling. The oldest and the largest place for their manufacture in the world is in Sweden.

A DARING robbery is reported from the bank of Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., Lombard Street. A gentleman entered and deposited the contents of his bag—gold, silver, and cheques—on the counter. As soon as the Cashier had checked the silver, some one spoke to the depositor, and when he turned round to answer, one package containing 300*l.* and another with cheques to the amount of 400*l.* or 500*l.* had vanished.

BY way of answer to those who still assert that English soldiers are as good as ever, the military correspondent of the Globe quotes the following figures from the last issued authoritative document on the subject, shewing an alarming and steady deterioration :—

"Ten years ago the proportion of men under twenty years of age was 104 per 1,000, while in the last three years it has been 132, 147, and 158 respectively. Ten years ago men under 5 ft. 5 in. were in a proportion of 52 per 1,000, while in the last three years they have reached the proportions of 106, 115, and 117 respectively. Ten years ago men under 37 inches of chest measurement were 570 per 1,000, while for the last three years the numbers respectively are 641, 657, and 668."

AT a sitting of the Austrian Delegation, the celebrated surgeon Professor Billroth spoke of his experience of modern warfare. He said that "statistics proved that the percentage of combatants wounded by bombs or cannon balls on modern battle-fields was very slight when compared with those disabled by rifle bullets. The speaker had been present at the battles of Woerth and Weissenburg during the Franco-German War of 1870, and had personal opportunities of observing that wounds inflicted by artillery or cavalry were comparatively rare. To put the case more plainly, he would say that about 80 per cent. of the total number of casualties consisted of bullet wounds, while 15 per cent. could be ascribed to artillery, and 5 per cent. to the sabre or bayonet. It was, moreover, a fallacy to suppose that the majority of wounds caused by artillery or bombs ended fatally. According to his observations this was not the case. In 5 per cent. of the wounds inflicted by the Mannlicher bullet sometimes two and sometimes three bones were shattered. An army at that rate would quickly melt away. Professor Billroth also spoke of the influence of smokeless powder in future warfare. In the storming of fortified places the sacrifice of life would be beyond all calculation. In the Franco-German war, when smokeless powder was unknown, such assaults were made at a fearful sacrifice. He urged the importance of efficiency in the ambulance service. In the fighting around Metz, although the Mannlicher rifle was not in use, two-thirds of the gunshot wounds were of a serious nature. In this connection he reminded the House that the aéronaut and the electrician might be expected to play an important part in the next war. He mentioned in laudatory terms the electric apparatus which has lately been adopted by the English, French, and German armies for the purpose of searching the battle-fields by night."

THE want of a good theatre in Calcutta being brought to the notice of Mrs. Potter and Mr. Kyle Bellew, Mr. Bellew, on behalf of Mrs.

Potter himself, writes to the Englishman "to make known to those in your splendid city who are interested in the drama, that we are prepared to lease and undertake the management of a theatre in Calcutta if a suitable one is built—in Chowringhee or some site as popular and accessible."

It is time that the omission should be rectified. The European quarter sadly needs a theatre worthy of the city of palaces.

THE Sub-Deputy Collector of Haflaspore, in the Madaripore subdivision of the Faridpur district, holding his court at Gopalgunje, will henceforth be officially known as Sub-Deputy Magistrate and Sub-Deputy Collector of Gopalgunje.

THE Secretary of State for India has accorded sanction to the commencement of work on the Mu Valley State Railway from Kailin to Mogong, the proposed terminus of the line, and on the Katha Branch.

THE Honourable Dr. Gooroo Dass Banerjee has made himself indispensable to the Calcutta University. He has been re-appointed Vice-Chancellor for another term of two years.

LAST week, there was a wrestling match at Fillis's Circus between a native named Karim Bux and the champion English wrestler Tom Cannon. The referee, the Maharaja of Cooch Behar, adjudged the native victorious. The Mirror was in high glee and taunted Tom Cannon or Captain Duncan C. Ross and other Europeans saying, that "it will be vain for them to try conclusions with Indian wrestlers, unless and until they sit at the latter's feet, and become their pupils. As it is, these matches between European and Indian wrestlers will continue to be hollow affairs, and a Karim Bux will always be pinning a Cannon flat on his back." The Captain thus replies to the challenge thrown out by the Mirror. He writes to the Englishman :—

"Now after the match between Cannon and Karim Bux I challenged any Native to wrestle me either in public or private for Rs. 1,000. I leave you and the public to judge why my challenge was not accepted."

Now Sir, instead of my having to take lessons from or sit at the feet of Native wrestlers, after about 15 years' wrestling amongst the best wrestlers of the world, and holding as I do the undisputed championship for mixed wrestling, I make the following propositions :—

- (1) I am prepared on one week's notice to throw Karim Bux for a stake of Rs. 1,000 ten times within one hour, according to International rules, Scotch, Irish, or American styles.
- (2) Or I will agree to throw any six Natives that can be produced on the same conditions within one hour.
- (3) I will wrestle any Native in his own style one fall, and one fall European style, the man winning his fall in the shortest time to be declared the winner.

Failing acceptance of any of the above very liberal propositions, I am prepared to wrestle any Native in his own style, provided I am allowed one European representative who thoroughly understands the rules of Native wrestling. In doing this I make no reflection on the decision of H. H. The Maharaja of Cooch Behar, in the recent match which according to the rules was absolutely fair and honest."

AFTER his acquittal, the jeweller Jacob received, as he says in a letter to the morning papers of Tuesday, "many expressions of the sympathy from the public generally." He thanks "all who have entertained towards me such kindly feeling." The gentlemen of the jury too come in for a share of his acknowledgments "for their patient and independent consideration during the protracted proceedings in the High Court." He has a suppressed smile at the Calcutta Bar. "With a strong array of legal professional gentlemen against me, I was chiefly supported and encouraged by my confidence in the English love of fair play, which in contest generously leans to the weakest side." Lastly, he thanks the editors of the papers to which he sends his letter and wishes "to one and all a Happy New Year and many of them." Mr. Jacob is not profuse only in verbal thanks to those who merited them at his hands. He remembers the poor in this connection. To further mark his satisfaction at the end of the trial and in praise of God Who delivered him from the meshes of the law laid against his liberty, he has placed Rs. 5,000 in the hands of the Commissioner of Police in aid of the Calcutta charities. Mr. Lambert has distributed the sum as under :—

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE engagement of his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale to her Serene Highness Princess Victoria Mary of Teck has been very popular in England. At the annual dinner of the members of the Civil Service, the Prince of Wales, in acknowledging the toast of "The Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal Family," alluded to the forthcoming royal marriage and expressed his satisfaction saying—"Not the least gratifying circumstance is, that it has received the approval of the nation. I am glad and proud to think that he (my elder son) marries one born in this country—living in this country, and who has the feelings of an Englishwoman." The news, however, has been a surprise at Berlin, where the feeling seems to be that there are German ladies of higher lineage and the Prince might have wooed and won one of these.

The Princess Victoria Mary is the only daughter of the Princess Mary Adelaide and the Duke of Teck. She was born on May 26, 1867. Her full name is Victoria Mary Augusta Louise Olga Pauline Claudine Agnes. The Duke of Clarence and Avondale and Earl of Athlone, K. G., K. P., was born on January 8, 1864. He had been in India in 1889. The wedding comes off at Windsor on the 27th February.

PRINCE George of Wales is still confined to his bed, though improving. The anxiety due to a relapse has passed away.

THE World says that the Prince will shortly be created Duke of Kent.

THE Duke of Connaught, Prince Henry of Battenberg and Prince Christian went out shooting at Osborne. It was a sad excursion. It ended with the shooting of Prince Christian in the face, one pellet entering the left eye. Think of the amazement of the party when it was discovered that the shot came from one of them—the Duke of Connaught. The injured eye had to be extracted. The consolation now is that the Prince is progressing very favorably.

TOWARDS the close of the last year, a Portuguese expedition bound to Nyassa was, about midway on the journey, destroyed. While the party was encamped, the whole stock of gunpowder exploded, killing sixty men on the spot, including two Europeans, and injuring 170, including Captains Continho and Andrade, the leaders of the expedition.

THE expulsion of a French Correspondent from Bulgaria, has been followed by a French and Russian protest to the Porte. Those two Governments consider the proceeding as opposed to the Treaty of Berlin and the common law, and insist upon the integrity of the capitulations of Bulgaria.

A PLOT amongst students, officials and officers against the Czar has been discovered in Russian Poland, and numerous arrests made.

ACCORDING to the Times, an attempt is being made by Germany to draw Russia into the new continental commercial league.

AT St. Etienne, two Englishmen were arrested for an attempt to obtain patterns of the new French carbines, tried, convicted and sentenced respectively to fourteen and two months' imprisonment.

THE subscription opened by the Princess of Wales among the wives of officers and men of the British Army, to mark their appreciation of the heroine of the Manipur disaster, amounted to thirteen hundred pounds, which has been made over to Mrs. Grimwood.

THE end of the Manipur tragedy is not yet. In his tour of enquiry in the villages round about Meiklethana, in connection with the attack by Nagas on a mule driver, Major Maxwell arrested three men, who will be tried as concerned in the murder of Mr. Melville, of the Telegraph Department.

FOR persistent obstruction to Government measures, among others, for the relief of the sufferers by the late earthquake, the Japanese Parliament has been dissolved.

MR. Allan Hume made the acquaintance of our native Indian politics late in life. But he has by this seen too much of its leading exponents to be taken in any more. So he has promptly stopped the flattering proposition of some private correspondents and other nobodies in the columns of a Madras newspaper to raise a permanent memorial in his honour. He knows it is all idle chatter—mere springes to catch woodcocks—for which our Stray Feathers from the groves of the Civilian Olympus is too old and knowing a fowl. He gives them a bit of his mind and of the mind of all intelligent observers. It is throughout a manly letter that Mr. Hume has written on the subject, which does credit to his head and heart. But for one expression, it would be faultless as a composition too. He writes:

"When India cannot erect a statue to Lord Ripon, to talk of any public memorial to any one else, on account of public services in the political line, is mere blasphemy."

That last word sticks in all refined throats. It is faulty from every point of view. Mr. Hume commits the very sin he charges on others.

THE Chief Magistrate sticks to etiquette in dress. He refuses to see advocates not donning a black coat. On Monday, Mr. Gauth appearing in a drab overcoat was told to go his way. He explained that he was suffering from a bad cold and cough and therefore was obliged to cover the black coat with the drab overcoat. The Magistrate still insisting, the advocate threw off the drab garment under protest, saying he considered the magistrate's repeated refusal a gratuitous and unwarrantable insult to the Bar.

It remains to be seen how the Bar resents the insult. Will an action be against the Chief Magistrate for thus exposing an advocate in a diseased condition, to the inclemencies of the weather?

THE question of dress has cropped up in another quarter. "We only hope that, in the rage for uniformity, black will not be insisted upon for black men."

MR. James Payn is a lover of cats, God bless him! and he is not ashamed of confessing it. All good men and true love Pussy, from Mahomet to Chisholm Austey. No man can truly worship God who is not kind to his creatures. No man can truly love his kind who does not love animals, and no man of refined thought and feeling but appreciates Pussy.

We are not surprised that Mr. Payn has been shocked at the speculation just started, to wit:—

"An island in Paget Sound has been set apart for the nutrition and entertainment of black cats. They are to be fed there on fresh fish twice a day. The announcement of this benevolent enterprise gave me great pleasure, for I love cats, and especially black ones. I did not quite understand as I read on why they should be imported from the Netherlands, unless indeed they wished it (which seemed improbable), and the last line was a most cruel revelation: 'A large profit is expected from the skins.'"

MR. T. E. Ravenshaw, late Commissioner of the Orissa Division has certain shares in the Cuttack Printing Company. He is anxious that the proceeds thereof be spent in the division which he had ruled. He has accordingly offered to the Bengal Government to establish a fund for the purpose of providing therewith an annual prize for the Cuttack Medical School.

MR. John Berney Worgan, the District and Sessions Judge of Dinapore, has worked out his time and retired from the Service. He, with Mr. Alexander Smith, arrived in India on the 16th December 1856, and both were put on the retired list on the 16th December 1891. Mr. Worgan had applied for two years' extension of time, but he could not hope for an indulgence which was not granted to a Halliday. That he was capable of work and loved it, was not considered a sufficient reason for his continuance in the Service. He, however, leaves it with the regret of the people of the district of Dinapore where he was last posted. We are told, by a pleader of the local bar, that he was a just Judge and that his decisions—on either side of the court—gave satisfaction. He was never discourteous. In keeping with his character, while finally making over charge, he took leave of all the pleaders, wishing them success.

We understand our business. It is not every knight of the grey goose quill, or, for that matter, every sharp-shooter of a steel-pen-wallah, who runs the hazards which we habitually encounter.

Our pleasure is in enterprise and in the success of surmounting danger. Few are the papers that would notice a commercial circular or a trade advertiser. It were infra dig., to begin with. Dignity—that mysterious, impalpable, unknown quantity—is stupidity's first care, and stupidity is all over the world. And, then, there is the danger of blundering. The fear of miscarriage imposes on man the wholesome restraint of not going out of his depth. For our part, we have no dignity, always taking care to keep ourselves above it. Not dignity but honour and honesty is our Brahmanic mantram. And, being well up in our Vedas, and understanding what is what, we are not afraid of sudden disaster. The Effective Advertiser caught our eye and we noticed it with enthusiasm. That was at once a moral and a literary feat. It requires courage to think well of an advertiser, and, above all, to say well of it in the market place. Every one is ready to swell a plethora—to aggrandise the prosperous and elect. It is the appropriate mark of independent intelligence to discern the worth of strangers and new-comers. It is the part of right manly doing to help new aspirants and blow the trumpet of modest merit. The depravity of our nature, however, is ever after painting the lily. You will hear respectable and educated men talk of the perfection of organization of the giant of Printing House Square, although the blundering of the Times has added a word to the language—the “silly season.” You will see the smartness of the great “Saturday Reviler” taken for granted at times when the Saturday has been truly respectable and sober as a Sunday preaching to the poor. Such was not our cue, however, and so the E. A. had a chance of genuine appraisement in the East.

The Effective Advertiser was woefully handicapped for public recognition. It was not simply a stranger, but a Pariah into the bargain. As a mere trade concern, it had no caste in the eyes of the blue blooded political and literary press: all its accomplishments went for nothing. And this in a nation of shopkeepers! This contempt for trade among a people, every mother's son of whom is nearly or remotely a child of Trade and Commerce, is most extraordinary. But the fact is patent. So the E. A. had no fair play. Tainted with trade, all the admirable writing in its columns was lost upon the blue blood of the press and of society generally. Its points fell flat—its jokes caused at most a stare as who should say, Halloo! what does this mean? Is it possible that some gentlemen of education are plying this thing in cog? The exquisite beauty of the mechanical workmanship itself, almost removed it from the sphere of literary criticism. Could weak, envious human allow in a neighbour the highest merit, both external and literary?

Wa were above all that sort of nonsense. We reported as we saw, praising what was so eminently praiseworthy, without knowing whom we pleased. We did justice without fear or favour—we mean fear of reproach or ridicule or expectation of favour. But a good deed is never wasted, thank God! We cast our bread on the salt estranging sea

and it has come back to us after many days. We struck the right vein of humanity. We have got our reward.

The Effective Advertiser thus acknowledges our notice:—

“We were not born to blush unseen, to waste our fragrance under a bushel, or hide our candle in the desert air, so we do not mean to do it. We get about. We even go, by the good ship Postman, as far as Calcutta, where we meet friends. The editor of Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Persant), a weekly newspaper and review of politics, literature, and society, has burst our postal band and turned over our new leaves. Naturally he likes to do so, just as we are pleased to receive his deservedly popular journal among our numerous exchanges. Listen—

There's for you! It was one of the wettest days this wet summer when we received this from India, but we rushed out in our paper caps, and never stopped until we reached ‘The Old Cheshire Cheese’ of famous memory.

We foregathered. We drank that editor's health. We drank ‘Prosperity to Reis and Rayyet.’ We drank ‘to the Indian Empire, especially Calcutta.’ We drank to Mr. Mutty Lall Ghose (the publisher) of the ‘Bee’ Press. We drank to ‘No. 1, Uckoor Dutt's Lane,’ in the aforesaid Calcutta. We drank to ‘the whole of the staff’ of the clever little journal. We drank to ‘ourselves,’ because we felt like people of the Top Row. Having nearly knocked the arithmetic out of the fan creature who presides at the only part of the place where we are tolerated, we drank ‘To Her.’ Although the rain was still falling as gently as bucketfuls can fall we returned to our literary duties. It was a wet day. What cared we? Many of the merry jests we made would have been printed, but our shorthand writer was taken ill. Fifty copies of the Effective Advertiser make a good pillow, if tied carefully so that the knot of the string fits into the bottom ear. No, not back numbers. We never have back numbers, because we sell out every time. We always jubilate when we get a shake-hands like this from a brother across the sea. We all threatened to go to India, and tell that man how much we like him, but when our genial director said, ‘No ship would take such a lot of—’ we missed the word—we pulled ourselves together and went home in cabs, to pass a pleasant evening with our wives, and have our fortunes told!’

There! that is a literary outburst of true power which more than ever confirms us that our original impression was correct. All that chapsody is sterling humour, redolent of character, buoyant and bounding, and withal delightfully pleasant. We shall look in vain for it in the literature of the day. The respectability of the political and literary Press fights shy of such “antics,” as it probably calls it. But who that has a genuine sense of enjoyment and is familiar with the achievements of genius in the earlier years of this century, but must lament the growing fastidiousness. The writer of the foregoing passage in the E. A. is a true scion of the house of the Father Prouts and Christopher Norths, the Magnus and Mahonys of the past. Our best wishes for his success!

THE Lieutenant-Governor has issued his orders in the case of land-hunger noticed by us sometime ago, in a leading article headed “Annexation Petty.” The attempt of the Howrah Municipality at downright spoliation of private property under color of the law, has been frustrated. The contemplated sacrilege also of removing the two ancient images of Hindu deities has been prevented. The order states that “after a full consideration of the circumstances of the case the Lieutenant-Governor is of opinion that the object of the Commissioners, which is the widening of the road, will be attained by acquiring only so much of the land as is actually required for the purpose.” The Collector of the District has been directed “to cause the preliminary proceedings (commenced for acquiring the entire homestead of the poor mechanic) to be cancelled.” An amended declaration has been directed to be submitted for acquisition of the land actually required.

The order has given general satisfaction. It has assured the people of all Howrah, that the tenure of property under British rule is law and loyalty and not the will of a Corporation. Sir Charles Eliott has earned the thanks of the entire community of the small town, including hundreds of work people who were watching the case with extraordinary interest. Mr. Fiddian, the Magistrate of Howrah, we hope, has become wise. He had, in a moment of weakness, allowed himself to be misled against his own better judgment expressed on many previous occasions. In his report to the Divisional Commissioner he had referred to many irrelevant matters, particularly abusing a well known gentleman of whom the late Mr. Macaulay used to say that it was he who “did the thinking of Seelapore,” and who had from the beginning aided the poor mechanic with his pen. At times, some of our District officials become so intolerant of honest individuals who are forced by their culture and convictions to expose official high handedness of every description, that in confidential reports to superior authorities they seek to blacken their character. Such attempts are a sort of bear's repayment for the grudges they owe and for which they cannot exact due vengeance under a reign of law. They are unfair blows that do not much redound to the honor of those that deal them.

WE may shortly expect an ostrich farm in Bengal. Messrs. Anderson Wright and Company have concluded negotiations with the Bengal Government for the necessary site in the Western Doonars. Sanction has been given for a grant to them of a preliminary lease, for five years, of 4,000 acres of sandy sterile, including a moderate quantity of cultivable, land. The rental, to begin with, has been fixed at one anna an acre, a year. The other conditions are that the lease will confer no heritable or transferable rights in the lands, that the lands are not to be sublet or put to other than the particular uses for which they are leased, and that the lease will cease with the closing of the farm. The trees will belong to Government, subject to the right of the lessees to purchase them at the market value.

THE Hon'ble Dr. Rattigan has honorably repelled the charge brought against him by the Calcutta Bar. He takes it to task for publishing a private letter without permission of the addressee or before that letter reaches him and without waiting for the reply. The Calcutta Bar attributed the notice of the contempt in certain daily papers to Mr. Rattigan's part propriety of the Pioneer. Mr. Rattigan explains that but for his connection with the Pioneer and the Civil & Military Gazette, these papers would not have left unnoticed "the unfair attacks the authorship of which can be no secret to certain members of the Calcutta Bar, which have been made upon me, since I returned to Lahore, in the columns of more than one Calcutta newspaper." The other dailies are left to speak for themselves. A full account of the matter follows, shewing that he took or attempted to take the steps which, it was taken for granted, were omissions on his part. Mr. Rattigan admits that he derived much of his information from Mr. Gaddes on whom he relied as an attorney of the Calcutta High Court and as a member of a leading firm of solicitors. He does not forget to apologise in his reply to Mr. Gaddes for dragging in the attorney's name in vindication of his own character. There is a word too in justification of his publication of his reply and of the previous correspondence.

THE condition of the Maharani of Cooch Behar, who was reported in the papers to be convalescent, causes anxiety. The Maharaja is obliged to keep home and to avoid all engagements.

THE Dewan of the Doorniaon Raj has at last secured a very desirable bridegroom for the daughter of his Maharaja in the person of the minor Maharaja of Rewah. Government has sanctioned the marriage of its ward.

RAI BAHADAR Gopal Chander Sircar, the retired Treasurer of the Office of the Private Secretary to the Viceroy, is dead. He was admitted into the Private Secretariat when Lord Dalhousie was Governor-General, and left it during the Viceroyalty of Lord Dufferin. During the period that he was in service, he held different posts, and always enjoyed the full confidence of every successive Private Secretary. He was sixty years of age.

THE Congress met at Nappur, on the 28th and 30th December. About a thousand delegates were present. Rao Sahib Ananda Charlu, as arranged beforehand, led the deliberations. It will not be the last sitting of the National Assembly. They carried a Resolution for its next meeting at Allahabad. But they cannot do without Mr. Hume, and he too was elected the General Secretary for the current year.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, January 2, 1892.

THE YEAR.

THE record of the year just gone by is fraught with a series of the most painful incidents, and on the expiration of it we sincerely wish our countrymen a happier New Year. The past year opened with a bitter controversy. Monster meetings, Maha Poojas and lengthy resolutions were, for a time, the order of the day. The leniency of the British Government gave free scope to the operations of the belligerents. They had their fling for more than two months, and when all their demonstrations were over, any further prolongation of the warfare was rendered useless by the decision of the Supreme Legislature of India. The wirepullers who got up the formidable show of opposition, still threaten to renew the fighting. But they and their weapons have been so completely found out, that they have no chance whatever of being mistaken again as true warriors, or as genuine exponents of our ancient faith. Though hors de combat, the promoters of the agitation laboured, for a long time, under the delusion that the crowds which collected round them in the maidan and other places, accepted them as their leaders, and that they were powerful enough to defy the authority of the British Government. They indulged in a spirit of braggadocio with an amount of freedom which was unknown before, even in the annals of vernacular journalism. The hauling up of the Bangabasi staff before the criminal courts, was the necessary consequence. Whatever they might think or say of us, and however much we might disapprove of their attitude, they had our heartfelt sympathy in their hour of trial, and no one felt happier than we did at their eventual escape from punishment. Our belief is, that gagging Acts and state prosecutions are neither expedient nor necessary for the purposes which they are intended to serve. The advantages of a free press far outweigh the mischief that can possibly be done by foolish journalism. Those who find it profitable to raise the cry of "religion in danger," cannot be repressed by the criminal law. By being prosecuted, they acquire the notoriety and the honor of martyrdom which they seek. The only way to render them powerless, lies in dispelling the darkness of ignorance in which alone they can thrive and work successfully. True Hinduism is amenable to reason and common sense. It is not an impracticable creed. If rightly understood, it is one of the best religions of the world. But it requires to be expounded by men who really know something about it, and are not interested in misrepresenting facts. The mischief that may be done by general ignorance of the shasters, has been accentuated in the strongest manner possible by the Age of Consent agitation, and we hope the time will soon come when Government will see its way to bring the great Pandits of the country en rapport with its institutions for Western culture, and to give greater encouragement to the publication, translation and study of ancient Sanskrit works than it has hitherto done.

The vituperations of professional fanaticism were followed by a real disaster to British arms, which, though nothing compared with what befell on more occasions than one in Cabool, is yet of sufficient importance to be memorable in history. The details of the Manipur imbroglio are still too fresh in every one's memory to require recapitulation. The policy of Government towards Manipur has been severely criticised even by its apologists. It is easy enough to be wise after the event. Perhaps, the best course would have been to restore the deposed chief Sura Chandra to his throne. But the responsible rulers of the country, with their fuller knowledge of the wheels within the wheels, decreed otherwise. Mr. Quinton and his comrades in death paid dearly for the policy which they attempted to carry out. By sparing their lives, instead of treacherously murdering them, the Manipur Darbar had everything to gain, and nothing to lose. But the whole affair has apparently been a tragedy of errors on both sides. If the Government of India adopted a wrong policy, the Manipur chief and his advisers were equally mistaken in the line of action taken by them, and they too have paid dearly for their folly.

By the pacification of Manipur and of Upper Burma, the political outlook in the east has been improved. But the safety of the western frontier has been lately threatened in a quarter where danger was least expected. The appearance of the Russian Bear in the Pamir makes the situation ominous. British power is, however, too deeply rooted in the loyalty of Her Majesty's Indian subjects to be easily shaken. And we may yet hope for the best.

The chief noticeable events in the internal affairs of the country were the opening of the Nagpore Railway, the completion of the Kidderpore Docks, the census, the Deccan Agricultural Commission and the cadastral survey ordered for Behar. The latter measure gave rise to a panic which has not yet subsided. Prosecutions for defamation are of late years becoming rather too common. The Jain defamation case was characterised by the learned Judge who tried it, as "a mere carnival of foolish, wanton, mischievous and pettifogging litigation." The most important prosecutions against the press were those which brought to grief the Eastern Herald, the Tribune, and the Banga Nibashi. The victims of these prosecutions were all punished with too much severity. The result of these cases and that of the Bangabashi show that the real source of danger to the press lies, not so much in the attitude of Government towards it, as in the law of defamation now in force. But the organs of public opinion have hitherto been abusing their freedom too much to expect any modification of the law at once.

In the Native States, the most important event to be noted is the partial restoration of the Maharaja of Cashmere to power, and the reassurance of a non-aggressive policy given by both the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. The order which has vested the Political Agents with almost unlimited powers of control over the press in the localities directly under their jurisdiction, is a retrograde step. But it is not altogether impossible that it is only a temporary measure, and we may look forward to its cancelment before long.

With regard to New Indian politics, the budget of news was never and is not a very hopeful one. There is no sign yet of any disposition on the part of Government to concede to the Congress the ultra radical constitution that it demands. Mr. Hume and his following have determined to lead a forlorn hope to extort a Magna Charta for India by battering the ears of the British people in their native home. But the death-knell of the Congress has been already sounded, and, notwithstanding the recent assurances of renewed attempts to give it a longer tenure of life, its end seems nigh. To cover his retreat, Mr. Hume indeed says that it has done its work. But the fact probably is, that he is tired of feeding and working for the white elephant that he brought into existence, and he is now anxious to relieve himself and those who believe in his leadership, from the burden. The sooner they can back out of their present position, the better for their credit and financial resources. It is almost a national calamity, that a movement which began under such high auspices and which has cost the country not less than a million of rupees, should, after all, end in ignominious failure. Even now, we would ask the promoters of the Congress not to put an end to its existence, but to revise its programme so as to give it a chance of doing really useful work. The political autonomy which it aspires for, may have its advantages, but it is certainly not attainable by speeches and resolutions. In the present state of things, the safer and more practical course for our patriots and philanthropists lies in concentrating all their energies and resources to the improvement of our manufacturing industries. If we succeed in that respect, political privileges would be conceded as a matter of course. At any rate, if the industrial emancipation of our country be accomplished, it would not matter much, even if we continued to be ruled as at present.

Speaking of manufacturing industries, it is worth while to note that the Bengal Spinning and Weaving Company, organised by Raja Janaki Ballav Sen, of Rungpore, and Babu Hem Chunder Mitter, of the local bar, has become a fait accompli. The capital required has, we believe, been fully subscribed, and the mill-buildings are in course of construction.

It is satisfactory also to note in this connection, that the Manchester cotton spinners themselves are taking steps to set up some mills in Bengal. We may now look forward to a time when, through their enterprise, if not through that of our countrymen, India will regain her position as a manufacturer of piecegoods. At any rate, there is some chance of our having less of Factory Commissions and Factory Legislations in the future. The philanthropic zeal of Manchester for the welfare of Indian mill operatives, has already abated, and may vanish altogether, if some of her mills be transplanted to this country.

The improvement which, after the American Silver Legislation of 1889, took place in the value of the Rupee, disappeared long before the close of the year under review, and silver is now at a lower level than it had reached ever before.

The gold mania which led to the formation of more than a dozen mining companies, in the course of a single month about the end of 1889, has subsided. The shareholders who have been defrauded are trying to bring some members of the "golden gang" to book. But, after the breakdown of the Chartered Bank case, the Bombay case of the Oriental Life Insurance Company and the Hyderabad Diamond case, very few can be inclined to throw good money after bad in criminal prosecutions. We suggested some time ago certain improvements in the Indian Company's Act, so as to empower the executive authorities to exercise some control over joint stock concerns. At any rate, a commission ought to be appointed by Government to make a searching enquiry as to the modus operandi of defunct and newly formed companies, against which there may be suspicion of dishonesty or improper dealing.

The past year was preeminently one of cyclones, and railway accidents. There were no less than half a dozen serious railway accidents within the last three months. The casualties in connection with the accidents in the vicinity of Nagpur and Mooltan were specially heavy. The disasters in the sea were not less numerous. The storm god visited with his wrath not only the shores of Bengal, but also those of England and America. The havoc done is well known. In connection with the cyclone in the Bay of Bengal, the fate of the Coleroon and the Enterprise cannot be soon forgotten.

While we had violent storms, the rainfall last year was very far below the average. In October, there was no rain whatever when it was most wanted. The result is that there is famine of a more or less serious character almost throughout the country.

Nor is the complaint of a deficient harvest and agricultural distress, confined to India. If the reports that reach us are not exaggerated, the peasantry in the dominions of the Czar are at present suffering from a famine which, in extent and intensity, must be very like the calamities that befell Bengal and Orissa in 1866, and Southern India in 1877-78.

In the year's obituary, prominent mention must be given to the names of Sir T. Madhava Row, Dr. Rajendralala Mitra, and Pundit Ishwar Chunder Vidyasagar. Our estimate of the two latter gave offence to their admirers. But we gave them every credit that they had any claim to, and if we did not say anything more in their favor, it was only out of a sense of duty as journalists to state the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

England lost two of her greatest men during the year. The uncrowned King of Ireland who, successfully cleared his public character from every charge with which the malice and nefarious tricks of his powerful enemies attempted to stain it, at last fell a victim to an indiscretion in his private life. His disgrace and his eventual death have inflicted a crushing blow on the cause of Home Rule in Ireland. Equally irreparable is the death of Charles Bradlaugh, who, by sheer dint of ability, rose, from the position of a common soldier and a porter in an attorney's office, to be recognised as one of the greatest men of his country. The laborious work of his public life and the anxieties of his early struggles, undermined his iron constitution, and cut short his career while yet in the prime of life. In the death list of the year must be mentioned also the names of Lowell and Von Moltke. Their achievements, in their respective spheres, have secured for them immortal renown, and this is not the place to expatiate on the greatness of the American poet, or of the German strategist who reduced the game of manslaughter to a fine art.

■ THE PURI LODGING HOUSE ACT IN NUDDEA.

THE Puri Lodging House Act has been recently extended to the town of Nuddea. Its working accentuates, in the strongest manner possible, the danger of extending a law originally meant for one particular place, to a different part of the country, where its provisions may not suit the local circumstances. Puri is an out of the way place, approachable only after weeks of tiresome journey. It is an ancient place of pilgrimage, and there are in it regular lodging houses for the accommodation of pilgrims, their food being always obtainable from the temple of Jagannath.

Nuddea is an ancient town also, but it is only in recent times that it has become a place of pilgrimage. It was the seat of the Hindu Government which ruled Bengal before the Mahomedan conquest. The Brahmanical population which settled in it in the palmy days of its political importance, made it subsequently the chief seat of Hindu learning in the eastern districts of India. The birth of Chaitanya, which has made it a place of pilgrimage, took place in the fourteenth century; but, like all prophets, he was never honored as a god by his own townspeople. In fact, he was bitterly hated by them, and the Brahman Rajas of Nuddea, while they had any power, never allowed his followers to worship him openly in his temple. In recent years, a coalition between the ancient Brahman population and the newly settled colony of Vaishnavas has commenced, but the line of demarcation is still wide enough.

In Nuddea, there are even now very few lodging houses properly so called. The majority of the pilgrims are provided with food and shelter in the Vaishnava Akras, which are Dharamsalas with temples attached. These monasteries are managed by Mohants or superiors who are under vow of celibacy. They have no wives or children, and the sole business of their life and that of their confrères is the feeding of pilgrims. They have no regular endowments, but their establishments are liberally supported by rich Hindus of their sect, and belonging generally to the Teli and the Chau castes.

Under the Lodging House Act, the Vaishnav Mohants of Nuddea have been called upon to take out licenses by paying heavy fees. They contend that their establishments are monasteries and not lodging houses. The rich men occasionally entertained by them as guests, pay something as pranam or reverential present to the idols worshipped in their temples. But there is no contract or compulsion for such payment, and their Akras are supported by their patrons, simply because pilgrims are fed by them gratis. They consider the application of the Puri Lodging House Act to them, as an insult and an unwarrantable interference with the discharge of the religious duty to which their lives are dedicated. One of these venerable Mohants actually shed tears in our presence for having been compelled by the action of the local authorities to turn out from his Akra a party of about 60 Sanyasis, who at midday asked him to provide them with food and shelter. He supplied them with food secretly, but the sin of turning out guests at midday weighs heavily upon him, and his mental condition seems really pitiable. We hear that some of the Mohants have been already fined under the Act. They would rather leave the place than humiliate themselves by taking out licenses as hotel keepers. In their own community their position is exactly the same as that of bishops and abbots in Christian countries. The Brahman Municipal Commissioners of Nuddea may have recommended their humiliation. But surely the revered priests of an important sect of the Hindu community, can claim to be better treated than as innkeepers.

If the income of the local municipality is not sufficient for the sanitary improvements required for the town, the deficit might be met by the grant of a part of the large income derived from the local ferry. At any rate, the necessary funds might be raised by less offensive forms of taxation under the municipal Act.

THE HYDERABAD DIAMOND CASE.

FOURTEENTH DAY, TUESDAY DEC. 22, 1891.

The Judge's Summing up.

Then followed a very large number of telegrams all relating to the deposit of those 23 lacs. All that they showed was that there had been some little delay about the money, that on the part of both Mr. Jacob and Mr. Abid there had existed a complete misunderstanding as to how the money was going to be placed in Mr. Jacob's hands, that both evidently thought that the money was going to be placed to the credit of Mr. Jacob in Hyderabad, and thence remitted to him in Calcutta, whereas what actually took place was that 23 lacs was borrowed on Government security from the Bank of Bengal at Calcutta, credited to Sir Asman Jah, and afterwards transferred to Mr. Jacob's account. That transaction was completed on the 23rd July; so that it was unnecessary to refer to any part of this correspondence. After that transaction there were telegrams about other jewellery. That brought them to that date of the 10th of July. The Jury would remember that on that date Mr. Jacob had made his final bargain with Messrs. Kilburn and Co. He got back Rs. 50,000 and paid them 22½ lacs, the equivalent of £150,000 computed at the rate of one and fourpence. According to Mr. Abid's evidence, and it is clear from the correspondence, it was very promptly known at Hyderabad that Mr. Jacob had withdrawn this money, and consequently a telegram was sent from Hyderabad to Mr. Jacob. On this telegram great stress had been laid, and that telegram supports the theory for the prosecution that the money was to be held in deposit on an express trust in Mr. Jacob's name, and that it was not to be paid out until the diamond was approved. The telegram said, "Our mutual promise was that money should be deposited in your name only until pasand or na pasand," and if that stood alone it would have been a very strong ground. But in order to understand the bearings of the matter they must not be satisfied with statements made by one side without reading the answer. The answer in this case was, "Yes, you are right, if pasand you will pay the balance; if not pasand the diamond goes to Patiala, and you get your money back. I have deposited money with agents, and for balance given security." That asserted what was the arrangement. The next document was a letter of the same day on which Mr. Jacob sent the telegram, the letter having been sent first (reads). He then told him this, that he went to Messrs. Pittar Leverson's agents, and accompanied them to the Bank of Bengal, paid the money, and got the stone.

Nobody simply reading that letter would understand that he had paid the money to the credit of Messrs. Pittar Leverson's agents and got the stone, and that also showed that Mr. Jacob was about to proceed to Hyderabad, and he requested that certain officers might be sent to meet him and prevent danger. The answer to that was the telegram of the 18th, "Letter received to-day, no need of the Police, you can come here all right." Accordingly he went and arrived on the 21st July, and on that day he had an interview with the Nizam at which the diamond was rejected. Some correspondence passed when Mr. Jacob was there. One letter was written to him by Pestonjee, of the Customs, regarding the jewellery brought by him for sale by Mr. Jacob, to which his reply was that he had brought nothing for sale, but that he had come about the large diamond, which his Highness was supposed to have purchased. His Lordship did not know for certain at what period of the day this correspondence took place, but at whatever period it did, it was not an exact statement of the facts, for they knew that Mr. Jacob had with him jewellery for sale; they knew that he had the diamond in his possession, and he had a lien upon it to the extent of 17 lacs, if it was not his absolute property, and it was for the Jury to see whether the mutual agreement had any bearing upon the charge of criminal breach of trust. They had to consider this interview with the Nizam. He rejected the diamond, and Mr. Jacob took it away. The important question was, what happened between Mr. Jacob and Mr. Abid, was it true that the effect of the conversation was that the money must be returned? On the other hand, was it true that he received from Mr. Abid, purporting to act for the Nizam, an offer of 40 lacs. This was extremely important, supposing Mr. Abid had the authority. If Mr. Jacob's story was true, and there really was an offer made by Mr. Abid, purporting to act for the Nizam, and if Mr. Jacob in good faith thought it was an offer coming from the Nizam, it was almost impossible to say that what he subsequently did was not done in good faith. It might be that Mr. Abid made a false statement. The whole thing rested on the two statements, the one made by Mr. Abid, and the other made by Mr. Jacob. Well, they (the Jury) were entitled to give credit to what Mr. Jacob did, if he did it under a mistake. By the light thrown upon it by the documents it was quite possible that they were not prepared to say absolutely what really passed on that occasion. It might be that they were satisfied that Mr. Abid was speaking the truth, it might be that they were not satisfied with either, and it might be that they thought that the whole matter was so obscure that they could not arrive at any confident decision as to what really passed on that occasion. If that was the frame of mind in which they found themselves they should give the benefit of it to the prisoner. His Lordship then asked the attention of the Jury to the letters and telegrams which passed after that time. First, Jacob left on the 22nd although he apparently intended to leave on the 23rd. It had been said that he knew that the diamond had been finally rejected, but it was suggested by the other side that the Nizam did not finally reject the diamond. His Lordship could not draw any confident inference from those telegrams. The first telegram was sent from the first important station from Hyderabad, Gungawarren. It was to the following effect:—"I trust to you to arrange that matter as soon as possible, otherwise I will be in difficulties," Mr. Abid said it referred to the request which Mr. Jacob had made before he left Hyderabad to get the Nizam to cover the expenses he incurred in getting out the diamond and taking it to Hyderabad and to try and see that he would not be a loser by the transaction. On the other side the construction put by the defence was that it related to the sale for 40 lacs and to the balance payable.

DEMAND OF A REFUND.

The next telegram was written after the prisoner reached Bombay on the 23rd and ran as follows:—"I leave for Calcutta this evening, hope you will arrange money as soon as possible." That was a little more definite, because it asked for some arrangement about money. But the prosecution said that it referred to the request made already to Mr. Abid for expenses. Mr. Jacob arrived in Calcutta on the morning of the 26th and telegraphed:—"Arrived here. When will I get money; hard pushed." Mr. Abid said that he received these three telegrams, but that he did not show them to the Nizam until after he received the third, and he then got instructions for an answer. That answer was on the same day, the 26th, and was to the following effect:—"Deposit money must be returned before any question of expenses can be entertained." This telegram was certainly in favour of the view taken by Mr. Abid. He said it was written under instruction from the Nizam, and that a draft was shown to him. It showed the very singular way in which Mr. Abid transacted business for the Nizam. That was shown to the Nizam, but who was the writer of it? The writer was a Mr. Skinner, who was the manager of Mrs. Abid's shop. It had been said that this had occurred more than once, but if so that did not make it any the less singular. Then there was another telegram to which his Lordship thought he would have to call the attention of the Jury. On the 21st, the date on which the diamond was in the first instance rejected by the Nizam, Mr. Jacob telegraphed to Messrs. Kilburn and Co. Of course the telegram informed them of the transaction with the Nizam. It ran:—"Diamond rejected, there has been foul play here, leaving to-morrow for Calcutta." What the force of the words "foul play" here was his Lordship did not quite know, and there was no direct explanation to be found in any part of the case. The Jury had heard the suggestions on one side and on the other, and they would have to judge for themselves, but he supposed it meant that there was some influence adverse to Mr. Jacob being exercised, and that on that account the diamond had been rejected. But before he got a long way on his journey, at Gungawarren he telegraphed again to Messrs. Kilburn and Co.:—"Secure draft if favourable, if not wait my arrival. Nizam cut me six lacs."

That was understood by Messrs. Kilburn in this way, that the diamond was at first rejected, but it was afterwards taken at a reduction of six lacs, because they wired to Messrs. Pittar, Leverson and Co. "Cancel yesterday's telegram. Sale gone through." There was little doubt that the meaning of this telegram was the interpretation which Messrs. Kilburn and Co. put upon it. The importance of it was this that it at least showed that, whether truly or falsely, at an extremely early stage after the interview on the evening of the 21st, Mr. Jacob had made up his mind to tell and had told the story he had told throughout that the diamond had been rejected at first, but that it had afterwards been bought for forty lacs. Whether that statement was made at the earliest period or afterwards the consideration was of the utmost importance. This story at any rate was put forward as early as the first station from Hyderabad Gungawarren, which was two hours' journey from Hyderabad on the line of road. That brought the correspondence and telegrams down to the 26th. The telegram of Mr. Jacob, when they, Messrs. Kilburn and Co., understood Mr. Jacob's meaning to be that the diamond had been sold afterwards for forty lacs seemed to throw light in the meaning of the telegram to Mr. Abid in which he asked for money. It would seem to shew that Mr. Jacob was trying to tell one story to Messrs. Kilburn and Co., and another to Mr. Abid if he intended to refer to the payment of expenses, and not to the money which would be payable to him under the transaction which he said took place. On the other hand the Nizam might not have been aware of what took place and put a different construction on this telegram. The last telegram his Lordship would refer the Jury to was Mr. Abid's telegram of the 26th: "Deposit money must be returned immediately according to agreement before any question of expenses can be entertained." That telegram arrived in Calcutta either on the night of the 26th or the morning of the 27th. It was ready to go out very early on the morning of the 27th and was in fact delivered to Mr. Jacob's servant at the Great Eastern Hotel about six o'clock on the morning of the 27th. About that telegram there has been a good deal of comment on one side and on the other. It had been said on one side that beyond doubt, coming as it did promptly and within a very short time of Mr. Jacob's telegram and immediately on his arrival in Calcutta, it showed that the Nizam would not have sanctioned any transaction for the purchase of the diamond at 40 lacs. On the other hand if these letters and telegrams to Mr. Jacob were understood only to refer to the same allowance for expenses why had Mr. Abid wired to him to return 23 lacs. He was to have returned it according to the evidence after he reached, and it was more particularly mentioned three days after his arrival, but he reached Calcutta on the morning of the 26th, and the telegram was sent on the same day before it could be possible for him to remit the money. Of course there was the third possible explanation that the Nizam had in perfect good faith understood the telegram to refer to the allowances to be made for expenses, and did not know anything about the purchase for 40 lacs. It was perfectly possible from all which took place between Mr. Jacob and Mr. Abid that he justified Mr. Jacob in thinking that Mr. Abid had the authority of the Nizam to make a bargain for 40 lacs, and the telegram from Mr. Abid explained that the Nizam knew nothing about this bargain, but was under the impression that the money was to be returned, and Mr. Jacob might have been perfectly justified in expressing surprise. His Lordship thought it was his duty to remind the Jury of the very important transaction about Mr. Jacob's dealing with the 22½ lacs which had been transferred to Messrs. Kilburn and Co. They had an account of that transaction from several persons. Mr. Cheetham's account of it was that Mr. Jacob came to his office and saw him about 10 o'clock on the 27th July, and told him that, notwithstanding the first rejection of the diamond, it had ultimately been accepted; that Mr. Jacob then asked the rate of exchange, and he authorised them to obtain a remittance for the £150,000, and the remittance was accordingly made; that there was only one interview, that Mr. Jacob remained in his office from 10 to 12 o'clock; that the transactions were finally completed within that time; that during that interval Mr. Jacob showed him or had in his hand a telegram and referred to it; that Mr. Jacob spoke of it, as the telegram from an underling to which he was going to pay no attention, and he also showed him a draft telegram which he was going to send to the Nizam.

CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

That would show that when Mr. Jacob went out on that morning he had evidently read that telegram, he had brought a draft reply, and that steps were being taken to transmit the money. Mr. Cheetham also stated that Mr. Jacob had told him that he had an interview personally with the Nizam, but with regard to this there are contradictions. The story told on the other side by Mr. Jacob was that he did not open the telegram of the morning of the 27th, that he had first an interview with Mr. Cheetham, at which certain arrangements were made; that he went away back to his hotel; that he then found the telegram, and read it, and had a second interview with Mr. Cheetham at his office; and that at the time of the second interview he produced the telegram, and made the statement that it came from an underling, and so on. His Lordship then called the attention of the Jury to the telegrams which followed this. They had a very important bearing upon the events of the 1st when the bargain for 40 lacs was said to be made. The first was the long telegram spoken of as the long telegram in three parts, and was dated the 27th July and signed by Mr. Jacob, addressed this time not to Mr. Abid, but to the Nizam himself, and accordingly it was handed to the Nizam, who read it. The long telegram was here read by his Lordship, who went on to say that this was the first statement where they had Mr. Jacob's view of the transaction. On the other hand, the Jury had the story he had told Mr. Cheetham about being cut six lacs, and he told the same story here, but in more detail. He here mentioned that at that interview on the evening of the 21st between him and Mr. Abid the bargain was made on behalf of the Nizam, and he said that if it was not made by the authority of the Nizam, then Mr. Abid had told him a falsehood; on the other hand it was said that the telegram was adverse to Mr. Jacob if he really had a binding agreement or an agreement which he believed to be binding for the purchase of the diamond for 40 lacs why should he be making these generous offers to let the Nizam give him what he liked. Assuming him to believe that Mr. Abid had the authority which Mr. Jacob said he exercised on the evening of the 21st, assuming for a fact that it was a genuine bargain, it might well have struck him with surprise when he got the telegram asking for the return of the 23 lacs, and he said in his letter to the Nizam, "If you did not authorize, then I have been deceived." Though he might if he could prove the contract with the Nizam, though he might hold a strong position with regard to the Nizam, by doing so he would risk his relations with the Nizam who was the very best customer he ever had. These were the most important statements made by one side or the other.

THE TRIPLE TELEGRAM.

His Lordship went on to say that the Jury would recollect that he had carried down the correspondence to the 27th July, which was the date on which the accused and Messrs. Kilburn & Co. had carried out the transaction in reference to the diamond, for which 22½ lacs was deposited, representing the sum of £150,000. It was in reference to this transaction that the three sets of telegrams were despatched, and on which so much stress had been laid. It had been suggested on one side that there was no contradiction of Mr. Abid's statements in reference to this. It was admitted on the part of Mr. Jacob that Mr. Abid would have got his commission on the 40 lacs, which was spoken of as having been agreed upon on the second occasion. His Lordship referred to the telegram of Mr. Jacob to Nawab Mahaboob Yar Jung, the A.-D.-C. to the Nizam. Then the answer to this was the long telegram on which so much stress had been laid and containing the assertion that this was the first time that Mr. Abid and he had agreed to the transaction for purchasing the stone for 40 lacs. Then there was the letter which also had been referred to as bearing out Mr. Jacob's statements on this point. His Lordship did not propose to read all that evidence, but it was clear upon the evidence of Mr. Abid himself that he was aware that Mr. Jacob knew he was getting a commission upon all sales in the palace. The Jury would have to see what that letter meant, and would have to draw their own inferences from it. They would have to consider whether this document changed in any way the terms of the original contract, or whether there were any expressions in it which tended to show that Mr. Jacob had the right to the deposit made in his name as to the diamond, and whether any portion of that deposit he was entitled to or not. In following telegrams Mr. Abid says that the diamond was to be returned, and that there was no talk between him and Mr. Jacob as to the 40 lacs. Of course the Rs. 50,000 represented the equivalent at that time of the £2,000 which Mr. Jacob had agreed to forfeit, having the balance of 23½ lacs representing the equivalent of £150,000 to be accounted for. This evidence in regard to the Rs. 50,000 was more or less of a formal character, and his Lordship would now refer to the evidence of various witnesses.

MR. ABID'S EVIDENCE.

The first and most material one was Mr. Abid. This witness occupied lately a high position in the service of the Nizam, and though of humble origin at the same time occupied a position of considerable confidence, which enabled him to render very considerable assistance to people. His Lordship read a good portion of Mr. Abid's evidence, and then went on to deal with his examination-in-chief and cross examination as to his presence upon the occasion of the visit of Mr. Jacob to Hyderabad. His Lordship referred to Mr. Abid's letters and telegrams, and to the events which preceded the transaction of the 20th July, which among other things described the meeting at the Chowmala Palace. There was no dispute as to this and although the Nizam objected to the diamond, this letter referred to a discussion as to the 40 or 46 lacs, but went no further. It was to be remembered that Mr. Jacob pressed the Nizam to deposit half the amount of the value of the stone, and that the Nizam said, "Very well, I will deposit this on the condition of passand or na passand," and that there was some evidence in support of Mr. Jacob's statement that the money was paid or transferred to him upon the terms which he mentioned. Mr. Abid denies all the statements made by Mr. Jacob in reference to this transaction. He was cross-examined as to his position and antecedents, on which point his Lordship would not trouble the Jury, or as to the commission which he received from Mr. Jacob and other persons, or about the matter arising in reference to the jeweller named Panna Lall. His Lordship really did not think that much came out of these matters. The important matter was when he was asked about the "history of the diamond" which he handed to the Nizam, and which Mr. Jacob gave him. There was a great deal of evidence which went to show that the Nizam did not read this paper and that Abid was not anxious he should know. On the face of it this was improbable. His Lordship referred to the evidence on this point, and also to Mr. Abid's examination in the Police Court on this and other points, and also to his cross-examination by Mr. Inverarity. Mr. Abid was then asked about the telegrams he had sent; but these his Lordship considered were not essential parts of the case. But his evidence in relation to the deposit of the 23 lacs was a most important part of it.

The deposit was to be in the Bank in Mr. Jacob's name until the diamond arrived. The Jury had to ask themselves whether the owners of the stone had agreed to its coming out to this country in no one's name or in the name of anybody who could offer a price for it, and this was a stone which was valued at £150,000. This was a transaction the Jury would have to consider very carefully and understand. They were men of business, and it might be that they would consider it a very simple one. This was the whole of the oral evidence of Mr. Abid as to what took place upon the occasion the diamond was supposed to be bought by the Nizam.

His Lordship then proceeded to comment on and deal with the evidence of Mrs. Abid and that was more or less in reference to conversations with Mr. Jacob, and to certain letters which she had written, and which the jury had already before them. There was the question for the Jury to decide whether she took any interest in the matter. They had heard her evidence and could draw their conclusions from it. The next witness was Mr. Ker, the Alliance Bank Manager, to whom His Lordship would refer very briefly. This witness had given Mr. Jacob a good character, and had referred to the Rs. 13,000 which he had agreed to receive for the transfer of the 23 lacs from Hyderabad to Bombay or Calcutta. The next witness His Lordship called the attention of the Jury to were the witnesses who spoke to the transactions of the 20th and 27th July, in reference to the transmission of the 23 lacs to England. The 22½ lacs had been made over to Messrs. Kilburn & Co. for transmission to Pittar Leverson and Co. That money was drawn out on the 27th at a quarter past ten o'clock, and there was no question of this, and no point had been made in regard to it. Mr. Cheetham's statement bearing on the bargain on this point was somewhat important. His Lordship read this witness's evidence, and proceeded to remark that in the case of a gentleman like Mr. Cheetham it may have been that so far as his memory was concerned he may have been at fault. But the gentlemen of the Jury were aware that men in Mr. Cheetham's position from their avocations were very exact, and it could hardly be that he could be mistaken as to the time he saw Mr. Jacob on this occasion. The gentlemen of the Jury were essentially business men but it must be remembered that some time had elapsed since this transaction took place. Then there was the evidence on the side of the defence of Messrs. Davis and Penniger. If their evidence was true it did not follow that what had previously been said was untrue. The Jury had to consider on the face of these depositions, the question of bona fides.

THE MAIN POINT.

The main point in the case was, Was there any arrangement between the accused and Mr. Abid as to the offer of 40 lacs on the part of the Nizam? Did the Jury think that the approval of the stone was left to him on these conditions "passand or na passand." It was suggested that this had been arranged by Mr. Abid in his anxiety to earn his own commission from Mr. Jacob on the bargain. These were all the matters, his Lordship went on to say, which the Jury had to consider. The first three charges referred to breach of trust, and the others were charges of embezzlement of certain sums and criminal misappropriation of them. If the Jury was satisfied from the evidence of Mr. Abid, from the statement of Mr. Jacob, and from the letters and telegrams which he had referred to, without a reasonable doubt that the money was paid to Mr. Jacob upon the terms of this trust, they would be justified in finding that the accused was guilty of breach of trust. If the Jury was satisfied that the prisoner was not so trusted, that there was no misapplication of funds on his part, they would be justified in returning a verdict of not guilty. The first question was, did they think that the amount lodged in the Bank was deposited as a trust with Mr. Jacob; second, was there any question as to the misapplication of that amount of Rs. 50,000 by him; and third, did they think there was a distinct violation of that trust upon the 27th July; and fourthly, did they think there was a distinct misappropriation of the money, of the amount which had been deposited? These were the only questions which the Jury had to consider. His Lordship then proceeded to explain to the Jury what the law in charges of breach of trust as a merchant were. He referred to the evidence as to Mr. Jacob's standing and position, and told the Jury that they were the best judges as to whether he was a merchant or not.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

"TOO LATE."

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

A STORM without a cloud !
A sweeping whirlwind woke !
And Europe's wariest monarch bowed,
And Gallia's sceptre broke,
While Paris, with a maniac shout,
Exulting rent the sky,
And throngs in frantic zeal embraced,
They scarcely knew for why.

France, in her halls of power,
A gathering conclave eyed,
Elated with their sudden deed
Of wonder and of pride,—
While one,* who mused amid the stars,
And one,† who held more dear
The poet's thrilling reverie, poured
Strong counsel in her ear.

But as a fleeting dream
Doth shift its chart of flame,
Strangely, to that tumultuous scene
A mournful woman came ;
The widow's sable wrapped her form,
As one estranged from joy,
Yet graceful, with a mother's care,
She led a princely boy.‡

Bright was his sunny brow,
Though bearded warrior frowned,
And strong in childhood's innocence,
He fearless gazed around,—
While, gathering courage from that hour
Of trial and of dread,
She claimed for him the father's throne,
Who slumbered with the dead.

A hush !—as when the sea
Her stormiest wave hath borne,
And the old, seamed and riven rocks
Await its dire return,
In breathless silence of the soul,
Each listener bent his head,
For France with trembling pulse stood still,
In syncope of dread.

* Arago.

† Lamartine.

‡ After the revolution of Feb. 1848, a strong sensation was produced in the National Assembly, by the appearance there of the Duchess of Orleans, leading the young Count of Paris, and asking for him the throne of France.

A moment since, she deemed,
In ecstasy divine,
Her grasp was on the altar-horns
Of freedom's glorious shrine ;
What should she do ?—relapse ?—relent ?
Bewildered and amazed,
Almost to penitence she turned,
As on that child she gazed.

Then, from a deep recess,
Pealed forth the voice of fate,
Quelling that agony of doubt,
With the strong tones—"Too late !" "
"Too late !"—Those cabalistic words
The threatening billow swayed ;
And Bourbon's throneless dynasty
Passed like an empty shade.

"Too late !" those sounds of woe,
Alas, have sometimes hung,
Amid the parting gasp and groan,
Upon the quivering tongue—
Death hath no other pang so keen,
Though all his terrors roll—
The knell of life forever lost,
The funeral of the soul.

THREE UNPUBLISHED SONGS.

BY THE LATE THOMAS HOOD.

THERE is dew for the flow'ret,
And honey for the bee ;
And bowers for the wild-bird
And love for you and me !

There are tears for the many,
And pleasure for the few ;
But let the world pass on, dear,
There's love for me and you !

There is Care that will not leave us,
And Pain that will not flee ;
But on our hearth unaltered
Sits Love, 'tween you and me !

Our love, it ne'er was reckoned,
Yet good it is and true ;
It's half the world to me, dear,
It's all the world to you !

"THOSE EYES THAT WERE SO BRIGHT, LOVE."

THOSE eyes that were so bright, love,
Have now a dimmer shine ;
But what they've lost in light, love,
Was what they gave to mine.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

And still those orbs reflect, love,
The beams of former hours;
That ripened all my joys, my love,
And tinted all my flowers.

These locks were brown to see, love,
That now are turned to gray;
But the years were spent with me, love,
That stole their hue away.
Thy locks no longer share, love,
The golden glow of noon;
But I've seen the world look fair, my love,
When silvered by the moon.

That brow was fair to see, love,
That looks so shaded now;
But for me it bore the care, love,
That spoilt a bonny brow.
And though no longer there, love,
The gloss it had of yore;
Still memory looks and dotes, my love,
Where hope admired before.

A TOAST.

COME! a health! and it's not to be slighted with sips,
A cold pulse, or a spirit supine;
All the blood in my heart seems to rush to my lips,
To commingle its flow with the wine!

Bring a cup, of the purest and solidest ware,
But a little antique in its shape;
And the juice it shall be the most racy and rare,
All the bloom with the age of the grape!

Even such is the love I would celebrate now,
At once young, and mature, and in prime,—
Like the tree of the orange that bears on its bough
The bud, blossom, and fruit at one time!

Then with three, as is due, let the honors be paid,
Whilst I give with my hand, heart, and head,—
"Here 's to her, the fond mother, dear partner, kind friend,
Who first taught me to love, woo, and wed!"

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE next general municipal election for the town of Calcutta will be held on Tuesday, the 15th March 1892. The latest day for application for mutation of names—to enable the owner of any land or house or the occupier of any house, separately numbered and valued for assessment purposes at not less than Rs. 300 per annum, to vote at the election—is the 15th January next.

HER MAJESTY in Council has been "pleased to declare her consent to a contract of matrimony between his Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor Christian Edward, Duke of Clarence and Avondale and Earl of Athlone, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter and Knight of the Most Illustrious Order of Saint Patrick, eldest son of his Royal Highness the Prince and his Consort her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, and her Serene Highness the Princess Victoria Mary Augusta Louise Olga Pauline Claudine Agnes, daughter of Her Royal Highness the Princess Mary Adelaide Welhelmina Elizabeth and his Royal Highness Francis Paul Charles Louis Alexander, Duke of Teck, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath; which consent her Majesty has also caused to be signified under the Great Seal and entered in the books of the Privy Council."

The apartments of the St. James's Palace formerly occupied by the late Duchess of Cambridge, are being fitted up for the residence of the Duke and Duchess of Clarence and Avondale.

The Duchess of Teck has announced her acceptance, from the Ladies' Committee of the National Silk Association, of which she is president, of the wedding dress to be worn by her daughter. The Prince of Wales is glad and proud to think that his son marries one born in England, and living in England and who has the feelings of an English-woman. According to the wishes of the Princess of Wales, the travelling as well as the bridal costume of the Princess and the bridesmaids' dresses are all to be composed of purely British manufactured material.

Each of the younger sons of the Queen commenced married life with a Parliamentary allowance of 25,000*l.* The provision for the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, it is understood, will come out of the sum granted by Parliament in 1889 for the family of the Prince and Princess of Wales.

THE head that wears a crown and lies most uneasy, is that of the Czar. Various precautions are taken for his safety. The latest in that direction is the design for two armour-plated trains for his Majesty.

FROM observations made in Germany of the transit of Venus in 1882, Professor Arthur Auwers, the wellknown Berlin astronomer, has calculated that the earth is about 92,043,074 miles distant from the sun, and that the parallax of the sun is 8.800 seconds, with an error of three-hundredths of a second at most.

Two newspapers in Europe have been suppressed for speaking disparagingly of the Emperor William. Rays of Light, published at the German capital, is a Social Democratic periodical and professes to be "an organ for the Propagation of Popular Science and Atheistic Philosophy." Commenting on the "Suprema lex Regis voluntas" incident, it spoke of the German subjects who continued loyal for the future as "debased boot-lickers." Le Stamboul is a French journal published at Constantinople. It had the impertinence to allude in offensive terms to the Emperor.

DR. GREGG, the Young Czech Deputy, has been indulging himself in disloyal patriotism. On the 16th December, while the Reichsrath was occupied with the Appropriation Bill for the Budget for 1892, the Deputy broke out saying—Bohemia was being sucked dry by Austria, which behaved to it like a vampire. He continued :—

"The majority of the Czech population of Bohemia is utterly wretched in the midst of this alien empire, and the longing to emerge from their Babylonian captivity has already penetrated into the lowest strata of the Bohemian people. Could the Bohemians of long ago have foreseen what would become of their descendants, their choice of a King in 1526 would have been very different. Their nationality is oppressed and persecuted in this Austrian State, which is a State of violence and tyranny towards all Slavonic races. The bond between the Crown and Bohemia will be severed if the traditional rights of Bohemia are scouted much longer, and the future relations of the two countries will be those of the conquered towards the conquerors. The Mannlicher rifle will be of little avail in the hands of a people without loyalty and without enthusiasm, but instead of kindling that enthusiasm for the State by making the Bohemian people contented, they are brought to hate—I repeat, to hate—this State. And, mark my words, the day of reckoning will come."

He was twice called to order. This inflammatory speech elicited a reply from Prince Charles Schwarzenberg, a young member of the great Bohemian family of that name.

"He protested, as a Bohemian himself, against the unpatriotic speech of the Young Czech leader. He reminded him that whenever Bohemia had deviated from the choice of 1526—as, for instance, during the Thirty Years' War—the country had repented of it and added :—'If you and yours hate this State—and it is, unfortunately, a fact that hatred of Austria is spreading in Bohemia, through your teachings—what will you do with your country, which is too small to stand alone? Will you give it to Germany or to Russia, for you have no other choice if you abandon the Union?'"

IN a village in Western Hungary, a man aged thirty, who said he had come from America, asked for shelter over night from a peasant woman. To ensure compliance with his request, he displayed a purse of 7,000 florins. That display was at once a blessing and a curse. He received the shelter he sought, for the woman had coveted his silver. When the night was advanced and the wearied traveller was fast asleep, the hostess cut his throat and secreted the florins. On the return of her husband who was absent that night, the woman made known her exploit to him, but horror upon horror! it was discovered that the murdered man was their own son who had emigrated sixteen years before.

IN his meteorological summary of the monsoon period of 1891, Mr. Pedler, the meteorological Reporter to the Government of Bengal, thus speaks of the two cyclones of November last :—

"In November, two very severe cyclones formed in the Bay, one of which appeared in the Indian region on the 1st of November and afterwards travelled through Bengal, giving moderate amounts of rain, while the second was formed on the 21st to the west of the Andamans and advanced rapidly in a northeasterly direction crossing the Burma Coast on the night of the 23rd, or on the early morning of the 24th, between Akyab and Diamond Island, and then rapidly broke up in the Arakan Hills. It was a very severe storm, and did much damage at sea, and it gave rather heavy rain to Burma.

The cyclone of the early part of November was, on the whole, a small one in diameter, but its fierceness was very great and was quite equal to the majority of cyclones which have been previously described. It is probable that this cyclone was generated in the Gulf of Siam, and that it crossed the Malay Peninsula into the Andaman Sea as a severe storm. It certainly existed as a violent storm on the 1st of November, a little to the east of the Andaman Islands, and it crossed Port Blair on the night of the 1st and morning of the 2nd. Even at this time it was a very severe storm, though the diameter of the hurricane winds was probably not more than 60 or 80 miles, and it did a large amount of damage both at sea and on land at the Andamans. It then moved in a west north-westerly or north-westerly direction towards the Ganjam Coast, and as it began to approach that coast, it increased very decidedly in intensity, and became one of the most severe storms on record. On the morning of the 4th it was to the south-east of Gopalpur, but as it approached the coast it changed the direction of its movement and travelled first in a northerly and then in a north-easterly direction. The centre passed very close to False Point between 4 and 5 P.M. of the 5th, and passed over the Intermediate Light-vessel off the mouth of the Hooghly at 2.30 A.M. of the 6th.

It then passed through South Bengal between Saugor Island and Chittagong, and passed through East Bengal into Sylhet and Upper Burma and Upper Assam. In its progress it did a large amount of damage to the shipping and on land, but as it passed into South Bengal it commenced rapidly to decrease in intensity and soon became a feeble storm."

IN his new book of Travels in Tibet, Mr. Rockhill exposes the injustice and ingratitude with which native Indian explorers have been systematically treated by the Government of India in its survey department. The London Spectator reviewing the book writes :—

"The story Mr. Rockhill relates of Pandit A—K—, or Krishana, in reality Kishen Singh, ought to be investigated and brought to light, for if it be really true that the results of the wonderful four years' journey, in which he crossed Tibet from north to south, and from east to west, arriving at Ta-chien-lu from the Ts'aidan in 1882, having made an excellent survey, were really 'carefully pigeon-holed by the Indian Government,' such a proceeding can only be said to be simply disgraceful. Mr. Rockhill boldly says :—'If any British explorer had done one-third of what Nain Singh, Lama Urjienjyats'o, Sarat Chandra Das, or Kishen Sing (alias A—K—), accomplished, medals and decorations, lucrative offices and professional promotion, freedom of cities, and every form of lionising would have been his; as for those native explorers, a small pecuniary reward and obscurity are all to which they can look forward."

THE Gazette of the North-West Provinces and Oudh contains the conditions under which the Bishen Prakash Trust Fund, amounting to some Rs. 17,000, is to be applied for the benefit of the youth of the Fyzabad District. There will be two scholarships, of Rs. 12 a month in the first year of tenure and Rs. 15 a month in the second, for students passing the Intermediate Examination of the Allahabad University. Failing these, three scholarships will be awarded among those who pass the Entrance Examination.

AMONG the principal "lions" of Cashmere, is the Takht-i-Suleiman near Srinagar, which the Viceroy visited. It is thus described by a correspondent :—

"One of the things to be done at Srinagar is to climb the Takht-i-Suleiman. It is a stiffish climb of a thousand feet, but the view from the top is an ample reward. The city lies at one's feet, and the valley is stretched out like a map. In the upper part of the valley the Jhelum can be traced for many miles. No fewer than six of its serpentine loops or windings can be seen, and parallel to the river an almost continuous line of broad marshes may be traced, forming what looks like a still mightier river flowing through the entire length of the valley. On the west side lies the Dal Lake with its extraordinary network of islands and water courses, extending from the Dal ke Darwaza for nearly a third of its length. The fort of Hari Parbat, the Polo ground, the Poplar Avenue, the Chenar Bagh, all the features of the city are seen immediately below. The view of the snows from the Takht is in itself a sufficient reward for making the ascent. At this season when the snow has crept lower down and closer in, the valley is seen to be completely environed, and the hills to the south have a particularly bold and striking appearance. To the north of the valley some of the higher peaks of the more remote mountains are seen peeping over the shoulder of the nearer range. Of the Hindu temple on the top of the Takht to which, by the way, the Maharaajah sometimes goes to say his prayers, there is not much certainly known. It is a high octagonal structure, built of massive blocks of stone. According to some writers, it dates back to the time of Asoka, in 200 B. C."

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Influenza, Coughs and Colds.—In diseases of the throat and chest, so prevalent in our changeable climate, nothing so speedily relieves, or so certainly cures, as these inestimable remedies. These disorders are too often neglected at their commencement, or are injudiciously treated, resulting in either case in disastrous consequences. Whatever the condition of the patient, Holloway's remedies will restore, if recovery be possible; they will retard the alarming symptoms till the blood is purified and nature consummates the cure, gradually restoring strength and vital nervous power. By persevering in the use of Holloway's preparations, tone is conferred on the stomach and frame generally. Thousands of persons have testified that by the use of these remedies alone they have been restored to health after every other means had failed.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

DOCTOR Pfeiffer, a step-son of Dr. Koch, of Cholera bacillus fame, claims to have discovered Influenza bacillus. It is a distinct species and found in the bronchial secretion in every case of influenza. The infection, he believes, is communicated through the sputum. He is kept in countenance by Dr. Canon who has found in the blood of patients suffering from influenza the Pfeiffer bacillus.

MAHAMED TEWFIK PASHA, the Khedive of Egypt, is dead. He had been ailing from pneumonia following an attack of influenza. That death prolongs the British occupation of that country. The late Khedive leaves two sons—Abbas and Mehemet Ali—and two daughters—Khadijeh Hanem and Naemet Hanem. The sons were at Vienna at the time of the death, and have been summoned back to Cairo.

Tewfik, the eldest son of Ismail Pasha, was born in 1852, and proclaimed Khedive in June, 1879. He had been, since the deportation of Arabi Pasha in 1882, under the guidance of the British.

AT the instance of President Harrison, the American Senate voted one hundred thousand dollars for a cargo of breadstuff for the starving Russian peasants. But the House of Representatives negatived the vote, it is said, as a protest against the Russian treatment of the Jews.

M. de Laveleye is no more. He died at Brussels on the 3rd January of influenza.

ANOTHER notable death is that of Sir George Biddell Airy, late Astronomer Royal.

LORD Vivian, British Minister at Brussels, has been appointed Ambassador to St. Petersburg in succession to Sir Robert Morier. The Journal de St. Petersburg expresses regret at the departure of Sir Robert Morier, who, it says, has largely promoted good relations between Russia and Great Britain.

WE are surprised to learn that a circular has been issued in the Bombay Presidency prohibiting Government Pleaders from attending the Congress. This is distinctly unconstitutional. It is, besides, against the treaty concluded by Lord Lansdowne with Mr. Hume, as the only means of saving his Lordship's newly appointed Lieutenant of Bengal from the effects of the irrational letter written by Sir Charles Elliott's Private Secretary, in response to the Congress invitation. Well may Mr. Hume threaten, as he does in a letter to the Bombay Gazette, to bring the matter to the notice of the India Government, the Parliament and the Home public, unless the circular is immediately withdrawn. It will have to be withdrawn, sooner or later. And the dying Congress will score another gratuitous triumph from the folly of those who wish it no good. So much of the vaunted ability of the great Indian Civil Service!

THE Indian Spectator thus sums up its views on the National Congress which lately held its sitting at Nagpore:—

"For seven years have our Congress orators played at politics. It is time they thought of working at politics now. So long as earnest continuous work is avoided, the movement can make but poor impression on friends or on opponents, whether it asserts itself once every year or every five years."

THE same paper speaks with equal plainness of the other palaver:—

"If the Congress, on its practical side, does not encourage its friends much, the Social Conference is even less cheering. * * * the local working Committees, both of the Congress and the Conference, ought to show real work, however humble in character or limited in extent. The great annual gatherings can lay down any number of principles and go through any amount of talk. But all that can do little without everyday workers to work it into the life of the people."

There is not a truer friend of either Congress or Conference than the Indian Spectator. But the true friend will not stoop to falsehood or flattery.

THE Advocate reports that Babu Mahabir Prasad Chatterjee, a clerk in the Lucknow Audit Office, has been appointed Interpreter to the Resident at the Court of the Native Chief of Perak, on 864 dollars per annum. It is added that this lucky Kerani possesses an exceptionally good knowledge of Urdu and is the author of some works, published and unpublished, in that language.

It is a pity that our contemporary does not give the names of even the published works, to say nothing of the unpublished ones. Men of Bengali lineage domiciled in Upper India—the home of their early progenitors—ought to show themselves more frequently in the field of the literature of Hindostan. Our contemporary's news suggests another question. Is Urdu the court language at Perak? Or, does the learned Mahabir add to his other accomplishments command over the Malayan?

JOHN BULL is admittedly a greedy fellow. He so thoroughly believes in the efficacy of good eating and good cheer in everything, that he does nothing without its compliment of a bhoj. All his numerous progeny scattered throughout the globe are, however, not quite up to the parental mark. Some are more thurine, or rather canine, than others. The Anglo-Indians of the North-Western Provinces are more true British than those of any other part or Province. Thus, we observe that the Allahabad University signalises its Convocation with a public dinner. The eating, drinking and merry-making ceremony of the Prayāga Pandits for this year takes place on the 12th, under the presidency of the Chancellor ex-officio. Fellows who wish to partake of the fine things on the table, are told to apply to the renowned gourmand, Judge Straight.

By the bye, who pays the piper?

SIR Charles Elliott has relaxed the rule laid down by him in March 1891, in regard to any increased emoluments to the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation. The Commissioners having again voted the Rs. 500, not as an increase of pay but as house allowance, Sir Charles no longer requires that that vote should represent the deliberate opinion of at least half the number of total Commissioners and that sufficient reasons should be given that would satisfy their constituents. Under date Calcutta the 4th January, 1892, the Officiating Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Municipal Department, writes to the municipal Chairman:—

"I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. D-E 6/92, dated the 23rd December 1891, forwarding, for the approval of Government under Section 43 of Bengal Act II. of 1888, a Resolution passed by the Commissioners in meeting, granting to the Chairman a house allowance of Rs. 500 a month, and submitting a full report of the proceedings of the meeting.

2. In reply I am to say that it is clear from these proceedings that, although the conditions which the Lieutenant-Governor laid down in Mr. Cotton's communication of the 3rd March 1891, as those on which he would sanction an increase of salary, have not been fulfilled to the letter, still the intentions and spirit of those orders have been met in a fairly satisfactory way. The Commissioners have given very full consideration to this question, and the Resolution now submitted for the approval of Government has been passed by a substantial majority at a meeting attended by a sufficient number of Commissioners to represent the deliberate opinion of the Corporation. This being so, the Lieutenant-Governor does not desire to call in question the decision of the Commissioners to exercise the discretion, vested in them by the Act, of allowing their Chairman house-rent, nor will he insist on the condition that this decision should be affirmed by an absolute majority of the entire number of Commissioners now holding office.

3. I am to observe, however, that if the allowance which it is proposed to grant represents only house-rent, as seems to be the intention of the Act, and is not also of the nature of a sumptuary or entertainment allowance, to the grant of which very serious objections must be entertained, the amount fixed by the Commissioners appears to be excessive. In the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion, the proper measure of the house rent to be allowed to the Chairman of the Corporation should be not the entire amount which he might reasonably be expected to pay for a house in Calcutta (though even on this assumption Rs. 500 seems to be too much), but the difference between the rent of a good house in Calcutta and the rent that an officer of the Chairman's standing would have to pay for a house in the mofussil. Taking the former sum at from Rs. 350 to Rs. 400 and the latter at Rs. 100 or Rs. 150, it seems to the Lieutenant-Governor that Rs. 250 a month would be a fairly liberal sum to allow the Chairman for house-rent in Calcutta. I am therefore to say that on further consideration, the Commissioners decide to grant this amount, the Lieutenant-Governor will be prepared to accord his approval to their Resolution, under Section 43 of the Act."

There was a special meeting of the Commissioners on Thursday, when this letter was laid on the table. A resolution was moved and seconded, granting Rs. 250 as house allowance to the Chairman from January 1892. Objection being taken that the resolution was premature in the absence of notice thereof, the motion was not pressed. The matter will come up again in proper form next Wednesday. Sir Charles Elliott has bound himself to allow Rs. 250 as house-allowance to Mr. Lee. It still rests with the Commissioners to record a vote granting the allowance.

The fight over the five hundred has ended in a victory to both sides. Those who fought for it have gained at last the Governmental sanction to an increase and those who opposed it have the satisfaction that Government will not allow the full amount.

At the Special meeting, one of the Commissioners pointed out that the notice of that meeting which appeared in the morning papers on the 3rd instant, was dated the 2nd, but that the Government letter—the subject of that meeting—bore date the 4th instant.

The mystery was not explained, as we read the report in the Indian Mirror.

THE addresses delivered by popular preachers in Exeter Hall, are sometimes enjoyable enough. But the opium agitation is about to convert it to a recognised place of public amusement. The leaders of the crusade against opium, have managed to get hold of an Australian "Chinee" and a Mahratta Baiji, whose performances bid fair to surpass all that has yet been exhibited in any theatre or circus. The "Chinee" is a convert to Christianity and is the Superintendent of Church Missions in Melbourne, Victoria. As to the antecedents or position of the Baiji, nothing is known in this part of India. Under the stage management of Sir J. W. Pease and of the reverend members of the Church of England who have been made his cat's paw, they both played their parts with all the skill of carefully trained actors. At least, the reports to hand make them appear to have done so. An English paper writes:—

A largely-attended public meeting was held in Exeter Hall on Dec. 4, for the purpose of welcoming Mr. Cheok Hong Cheong (Superintendent of Church Missions at Melbourne, Victoria) and Miss Soonderbai Powar (of Bombay), who are visiting this country for the purpose of protesting on behalf of their fellow-countrymen and women in China and India, against the continuance of the British opium traffic. The Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe (St. Paul's, Onslow-square), presided, supported by the guests of the evening, Sir J. W. Pease, M. P., and others interested in the movement, letters expressing regret at inability to be present being received from Lord Polwarth, Lord Kinnaid, Sir Harry Verney, Mr. W. S. Caine, &c.

In opening the proceedings the Chairman said the question they had met to consider did not seem to have taken that hold of the Church of England which it should have done, and which it would do when the clergy were fully informed on the matter, and thus led to act on the right side. It was said that this was a question of finance, but if it was right that the traffic should be suppressed then it should be done whatever the cost. (Cheers.) Their forefathers paid £20,000,000 to free the slaves, and surely in these days, when the wealth of the country had doubled, they ought not to hesitate to make a similar sacrifice (Cheers.)

Mr. Cheong, who met with a hearty welcome, spoke from experience gained among the Chinese, both at home and in Melbourne, of the detrimental and often fatal results which attended indulgence in the drug, and announced, amid cheers, that the Government of Victoria had drafted a measure restricting the cultivation and importation of opium, and inflicting penalties upon those who kept smoking-dens or frequented them. He appealed to his audience to heed the cry of the perishing, and go to their rescue, earning thereby not only the gratitude of the victims, but the reward of Him whose reward they valued most (Cheers.)

Miss Soonderbai Powar drew a piteous picture of the results which attended the use of opium in India, where it was the fruitful cause of infanticide, suicide, and other evils. She brought many messages from the women of India to the people of England, asking for help in this time of difficulty. If, said Miss Powar, a man knocked down another and robbed him because he needed money, he was sent to prison. What then should be done to a Christian Government which was knocking down millions of men and women for the same reason?

Other speakers followed, and the subjoined resolution was adopted:—

This meeting, representing the aroused conscience of the nation, in view of the fact that the traffic in opium carried on by the British Government of India brings upon countless numbers of our fellow-men in China, India and Burmah physical and moral degradation, and upon their innocent families unutterable misery and ruin, is a grievous hindrance to the spread of the Gospel, by identifying this professedly Christian country with the sin of propagating an odious vice, and also dries up the sources of legitimate commerce, calls upon the Government to immediately direct the stoppage of the growth, manufacture, and sale of opium in India, except for strictly medicinal purposes, and its export therefrom, in harmony with the vote of the House of Commons of April 10 last, which condemned this traffic as 'morally indefensible.' This meeting further expresses its conviction that the people of the United Kingdom will not hesitate to repeat a sacrifice similar to that by which they put an end to Negro slavery in British colonies, and to give such moderate temporary assistance to the Indian Exchequer as may be needed to enable the Government of India wholly and at once to dispense with the revenue from the opium trade, without placing any fresh burdens upon the people of that country."

It is rather curious that neither the English priests nor their chellas had one word to say against English beer and French wines. The fact is that the Church of England has in these days become functus officio, and, like the puppet emperors of Delhi in the last century, it has now nothing but a great name, which it will readily lend to any adventurer whose movements serve to bring it into prominence. Its members were made to take a part in the agitation by which English merchants and shipowners managed to get the Government monopoly of salt manufacture in the sea board of Bengal abolished. The same sort of agitation has been got up again to break the monopoly of opium. But the Government of India cannot afford to do away with the revenue derived from it, and this time we are perhaps safe enough.

SNAKE HILL is a terrible name. It is in New Jersey, United States. But curiously enough, it is celebrated more for venomous mosquitoes than for reptiles like the cobra and the krait. We are told, that last year the New Jersey mosquitoes gave a very emphatic proof of their venom by biting to death a man who had lost his way in the swamp round Snake Hill. We have in India enough of little fleas to bite and disturb our peace now and then, but happily none yet of the exact American type. There may be hybrids, but these are quite as harmless as the pure indigenous breeds.

PRESIDENT Harrison's message presented to the Congress of the United States on the 9th December last, recommends that a full trial should be given to the existing laws, and that business interests should be spared the distressing influence which threats of radical change always import. He opposes free coinage, but it appears that he is a bimetallist at heart. He observes:—

"I believe that the majority of our people earnestly desire that full coinage use should be made of silver as soon as other nations co-operate and a ratio be fixed. The business of the world requires both metals. I endeavoured by official and unofficial agents closely to observe the state of public sentiment in Europe, and I did not find it to be such as would have justified me in proposing an international conference. I am sure, however, that there is a growing sentiment in Europe in favour of a larger use of silver, and I know of no more effectual way of promoting this than by the accumulation of gold in this country. The scarcity of gold reserves in Europe would be the most persuasive argument for the use of silver."

THE Tribune hears that Rai Dewan Chand, of Sealkot, intends bringing out an Urdu translation of "Shri Bhagwat." A most unfortunate idea. We suppose the Rai's vernacular is Panjabi. We do not know either the capabilities or the prospects of that dialect. Remembering that the nightingale of Lucknow, Jani, chose it for his passionate lyrics, going to reside in the Punjab on purpose to learn it, we cannot think it a contemptible vehicle of thought. At any rate, there is the sister tongue, the Hindi, which must come home almost equally to the Rai. Surely, there cannot be a moment's hesitation that that is the better language to translate the Bhagavat Purana into than the Urdu. We might understand a Mussoman's partiality for the latter. But that a Vaishnava, as we take Babu Dewan Chand of Sealkot to be, should think of that artificial, though charming, language in the connection, greatly surprises us, and seems to argue something abnormal.

THE annual examination for the titles conferred by the Nuddea College of Pandits took place during the Christmas, in the house of Babu Mohendra Nath Bhattacharya, M.A., B.L., of the Subordinate Executive Service. There were seventy candidates in all, most of whom came from a great distance. A few were from Benares with their professor Pandit Kailas Sumanani. The cost of the examination had to be borne this time, as on several previous occasions, by Babu Mohendra Nath Bhattacharya alone, and it is much to be regretted that the Pandits had no help whatever from any of the Rajas or Reises of the country, beyond a small sum of Rs. 20 promised by Kumar Binaya Krishna of the Sova Bazar family. Kumar Indra Chandra Sing, of Paikpara, who was honored by the Nuddea Pandits by being appointed their president, gave liberal rewards to the successful examinees and their teachers at the last two examinations. In a matter like this. The great houses of Darbhanga, Burdwan, and Kishnagur ought to take the lead.

THE titles conferred by the Pandits of the chief seat of Sanskrit learning in Bengal, have a value which the honors of the Government Sanskrit College cannot possibly possess, so long at least as it is not placed under the headship of a Nuddea Pandit. For nearly a thousand years, the superiority of Nuddea has been admitted by the whole country, and no Bengali Pandit considers it beneath his dignity to pay his allegiance to it. But with all the resources and prestige of the British Government at his back, a political Pandit, hailing from the country of the Pods, can never hope to command the respect of the giants of Sanskrit learning, to be still found in Nuddea and its neighbourhood. Pandit Mahesh Chunder was lately deputed by Sir Alfred Croft to inspect the toles of Nuddea. He might as well send the Headmaster of the Darjeeling Hill school to inspect the Oxford and Cambridge Universities.

WE read in the morning papers the following telegraphic report of a curious double-barrelled movement in Chittagong :—

"At a meeting of the Buddhist Association of Chittagong, held on the 27th December 1891, His Holiness Maha Thero Gnana Lankara Tissa, Head Priest, Maun Raja's temple, presiding, it was resolved to raise money from the Buddhist community of Chittagong in aid of Buddha-Gya movement of the Ceylon Buddhists, and for a feast in honor of Sir Alfred Croft, Director of Public Instruction, Bengal, and also to wait on him with a deputation of the leading Buddhist priests and laymen when he is on a visit to Chittagong, the Buddhist community being under obligation to that officer for what progress it has recently made in education."

Sir Alfred Croft certainly deserves the honor that has been and is intended to be accorded to him. But the demonstration smacks strongly of the hand of some underling, and even if it is the outcome of genuine gratitude and regard, still the dragging of a High Priest to join a movement which is at least partly for secular purposes, may not appear commendable in the estimation of the orthodox.

THE Marquess of Ailesbury contracted with Lord Iveagh for sale of the Ailesbury settled estates in Wiltshire and Berkshire, for 750,000*l.*, and applied to Court for the necessary sanction to complete the transfer. Lord Henry Bruce and others, interested in the property, strongly opposing the sale, Mr. Justice Sterling refused the permission. The matter went up to the Court of Appeal which, however, granted the application of the Marquess. Lord Justice Lindley in his judgment said :—

"Although the Marquess of Ailesbury was only thirty years old, he had managed since he came of age to get through a great deal of money, and he could not describe him otherwise than as a spendthrift who had ruined himself by his own extravagance and folly. The Marquess was not a person with whom the Court was disposed to sympathise; still, he was the master of the situation unless it could be proved that he was sacrificing the pecuniary interest of the remainder men. The consequences of handing over the estate to a mortgagee might be disastrous. Indeed, the estate was so situated that, unless it were sold, everyone connected with it would in all probability be ruined. Sympathising as he did most acutely with those interested in the property, yet he dare not take the responsibility of refusing sanction to the sale."

Lord Justice Bowen and Lord Justice Fry concurred, the latter saying that it could scarcely be to the honour of the family name that the property should remain for years in the hands of money lenders and mortgagees.

There are occasions when opposing remainder men or coparceners do not understand their own interests, though they must be supposed to be acting on that understanding, and the Judge who is scared away by such mere opposition, fails in his essential duty.

WE read in the English papers :—

"At Bridgeend County Court, on Dec. 16, Judge Williams had to hear an action in which 50*l.* was claimed as compensation for damages caused by careless driving. The evidence of one important witness had still to be heard when the hour arrived for the Judge to leave by train, and it being deemed desirable to finish the case without adjourning it to a future date, his Honour, with the legal advocates, and the remaining witnesses, travelled together to Llantrissant, the witness giving his evidence in the railway carriage en route. On reaching Llantrissant Judge Williams gave his decision in the station-master's office, finding for the plaintiff."

Will the decision be upheld in appeal? In India, the law is different, though there be Judges who would follow Judge Williams and commit other and more grave illegalities.

THE following Notification appears in the Calcutta Gazette of January 6 :—

"The 31st December 1891.—It is hereby notified for general information that, in exercise of the power vested in him by section 139, clause 2 of Act III (B. C.) of 1885, the Lieutenant-Governor confirms the bye-laws set forth below, which have been framed by the District Board of Nuddea under clause 1 of the said section—

Bye-laws relating to roads, tanks, water-channels and cattle-pounds, framed by the District Board, Nuddea, under section 139 of the Bengal Local Self-Government Act, 1885."

Then follow the bye-laws.

The law quoted runs as follows :—

"Every District Board or Local Board empowered in this behalf by the Lieutenant-Governor, may make bye-laws for carrying out all or any of the purposes of this Act.

Bye-laws made under this section shall have the force of law when confirmed by the Lieutenant-Governor and published in such manner and for such time as the Lieutenant-Governor may direct."

The authority of the Board to initiate bye-laws does not appear in the notification. Nor will their confirmation by the Lieutenant-Governor and publication in the official Gazette give them the force of law unless "published in such manner and for such time as the Lieutenant Governor may direct." What may be that manner and what that time necessary to fully give the bye-laws the force of law, yet remain to be known to the general public.

In the Interpretation section of the Act, the District Engineer is not defined to mean the Chairman of any District Board or any Local Board, yet the explanation to one of the bye-laws, says—"Orders passed by the District Engineer in anticipation of the sanction of the Chairman of the District Board or any Local Board in emergent cases will have the force of orders passed by the Chairman of such Board." The order of the Engineer may not be sanctioned by the Chairman, yet a person disobeying the order of the Engineer will be punished for breach of the byelaw. The worst absurdity is that the legislature delegates its power to the Lieutenant-Governor, the Lieutenant-Governor delegates his to the Board, and the Board transfers its to the District Engineer. Here is delegation to the fourth degree, whereas the accepted law allows only one transfer.

THERE was a theft of jewellery at Government House this week. Three gold bangles, valued at Rs. 10,000, belonging to Lady Lansdowne, were missing at 6-30 P.M. of the 6th instant. They were in an open box on the dressing table. This is the second instance of the kind. The Police was communicated with and Mr. Lambert himself enquired into the matter. Suspicion fell on the body-guard in charge of the room, where no other native servant has access except in presence of the sentry. An immediate search of the body-guards on duty in the House at the time being demanded by the Police, Lord William Beresford opposed it on the ground that they were honorable men of respectable birth and position in life. Mr. Lambert still suspecting, they were searched when off duty, and the bangles were traced to the body-guard Aroor Singh—a Shikh—at the Ballygunge Line. He was placed before Mr. Marsden on Friday, who sentenced him this day to eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment. It is lamentable that a man in such confidence should be found in such a disgraceful situation.

EDUCATIONAL SHAMS.

THE authorities of the Calcutta University are credited with having under consideration a set of rules for controlling the management of the private schools and colleges affiliated to it. These institutions are not subject to the supervision of the Director of Public Instruction, and the abuses that have grown up in connection with them, can be checked only by the interference of the University. With very few exceptions, the private schools and colleges in Calcutta and in the larger towns in the interior, are set up solely with an eye to profit, and their proprietors direct their efforts only to securing the largest income with the minimum of expenditure. Without any regard to the extent of accommodation at their disposal, they admit to their institutions as many boys as they get. A law, similar to that which restricts the carrying capacity of public conveyances, is, it seems, required for all school buildings, though, in its practical application, it would perhaps only arm the subordinate inspecting officers with power to enforce the adoption of their worthless compilations, which would be a still greater infliction to the boys and the teachers. In some of the private educational institutions in Calcutta, it is common to find a single teacher in charge of a class of more than two hundred boys, all closely packed up in a small, ill-ventilated room. The health of the little prisoners, who are there thus kept in confinement for five hours every day, is undermined for ever, and surely their case is far more pitiable than that of the objects of Manchester philanthropists.

And, after all, what do our boys gain by their daily incarceration? The amount of instruction which they get in school is very often nil. The progress which they make in their studies is due, either to their self exertion, or to the assistance that they derive from their parents, friends and private tutors. The teachers in the private schools are so ill paid, that the service can very seldom attract competent men. The energy of those who do accept such service is paralysed by their having no prospect of prospering in life, and generally they can have no zeal for their work. When the proprietor takes a part in the work of teaching, he exerts his best to make his adventure successful. But the case with the other teachers is quite different. Even those that possess the necessary amount of zeal and capacity, find themselves terribly handicapped by the number of boys they have to manage. With a large class, it is exceedingly difficult for the best teachers to make themselves heard by their pupils with interest, and their task becomes an impossible one when they have to correct exercises in translation, composition or mathematics.

The success of an educational institution at the University Examinations, is generally taken as an indication of the efficiency of its teaching staff. But the fact is well known that, even in the colleges which have been from year to year achieving the best results in the University tests, there have been professors who were almost quite innocent of any knowledge of the subjects they had to teach, or were too indolent to give their pupils the benefit of their learning. On the very appearance of some of these luminaries, the students left the class, or had to be kept in their seats by the terror of punishment. The state of things in the Government colleges may have improved of late years. But the private colleges are now the most important factors in the educational system of Bengal, and they require careful looking after. The rules which are said to be in the contemplation of the University, will compel their proprietors to increase their teaching staff. That would be a step in the right direction. But a great deal more is required, and we wonder that so little has yet been done, either by the University or by the Department of Public Instruction, to insist upon even the most elementary requisites of a sound system of education. New schools and colleges are affiliated to the University as a matter of course, and neither its wise senators, nor the inspecting officers under Sir Alfred Croft, ever think of directing their attention to the real educational needs of the country.

Every affiliated institution ought to have a good library or at least a sufficient stock of dictionaries, maps, atlases, globes, &c., for the use of each class. But what is the case at present? There are, we believe, even higher schools and colleges which have no library at all. An old copy of Webster's dictionary, or a few tattered and antiquated maps may be found in some of them. But really good books of reference and charts very seldom form part of their stock in trade. The students are told that the earth is a spherical body, and that it moves round the sun, but without globes and other accessories they cannot grasp the ideas thoroughly—the result being that very few of them can intelligently explain even the proofs regarding the rotundity of the earth, which they have all learnt by heart. In the absence of good charts and properly qualified teachers, history too is learnt only by cramming. The boys are made to get by heart the narratives of the Peninsular War and the war of American Independence, without acquiring the least idea of military strategy. The provisions of the Regulating Act, Pitt's Bill, Fox's Bill and the Charter Acts, are similarly committed to memory without any insight into the policy of which they were the outcome. Among the teachers and students of this country, very few have even any idea that history can be enjoyed or mastered. Their belief is that it must be swallowed in the solid condition, in order to be vomited in the examination hall in the same state. The usual method of teaching it, is to ask questions, and the teacher is satisfied if these are answered verbatim et literalim in accordance with what is stated in the text books on the subject. Maps, being generally non est, are very seldom referred to in connection with history. Thus the students are trained to rely, in all things, on the habit of cramming, and the humdrum way in which the questions set in the University Examinations are usually framed, serves only to strengthen the habit. To eradicate it completely, may not be within the range of practical politics. But surely the University can insist upon the colleges affiliated to it that they must have in their possession such books and other school requisites as are indispensable in educational institutions. We believe there are law colleges affiliated to the University which have not a complete set of the Indian Law Reports, or even of the Acts of the several legislative councils in India. Shams are the order of the day in every department, and, in the department of education, we have had of late years too many of empty phials with gilded labels.

Some of these may, by proper management, be made really useful, and need not be demolished altogether. But there are others which deserve no mercy whatever. The educational shams which require to be weeded out completely, are the text books favored and patronised by the department under the control of Sir Alfred Croft, or rather that of his lieutenant—a Rai Bahadar himself. These books, as we must call them, are mainly of two classes:—

1. Works written or compiled by authors like the late Pandits Iswara Chandra Vidyasagara and Akhoy Kumar Dutta, within the first decade, after the despatch of 1854.

2. Books brought out within the last twenty-five years, by the subordinate officers of the education department, by their relatives, and by their friends.

Authors belonging to class 1., have acquired too firm a hold to be excluded from the patronage of the education department at once. Some of their books as, for instance, the Bodhodoya and the Charupatha, fully deserved, at one time, the popularity which they still enjoy. But there are other books by the same authors which are a regular nuisance. The Charita-boli, the Jibana Charita and Bahya Bastu are preeminently so. Had the department of education been properly regulated, not only these, but even the genuine coins claiming the same authorship would have been withdrawn from circulation long ago. The absurdity of appointing as text books such primers on scientific subjects as were first brought out thirty-five years ago, and have never been subsequently revised, is too obvious to require expatiation.

To avoid doing injustice to the educational officers, we must mention here that it is due to no fault of theirs that the works of Pandits Vidyasagar or Dutta are still patronised by the department. They have never betrayed any partiality in favor of an author outside the circle of their kith and kin and obliging friends. In fact, for a time, the works of a village school-master and of an influentially connected limb of the press, entirely superseded the Sitar Banabash and the Charupatha. But this arrangement could not last long. The milkman who adulterates his milk with water, knows that there is a limit. When complaints became too loud, the question arose, How to maintain a show of decency without incurring the danger of losing the preserve altogether? The de facto rulers of the department are far too wise in their generation not to know that a live dog is decidedly more powerful than a dead lion. For their own safety, they had to prefer the stuffed lion to the more dangerous living animal that would claim the entire field, if once ennobled by being admitted to the sacred enclosure. While they howl and bark from outside, they may be treated as pariahs for whom it is preposterous to claim to be fed on the same table with the lions that people actually worship. The latter may be only skins stuffed with straw and paper. But they are nicely adapted to bamboozle the people, as well as the responsible head of the department, who, with all his learning, cannot constitute himself a judge of Bengali books. He has been long enough in the country to know well that Pandits Vidyasagar and Dutta, who were the authors of the oldest Bengali school books, are both regarded by the people as the best writers in Bengali prose. When complaints are made to him about the selection of text books by his subordinate authorities, and he asks for their explanation, they point to the two aforesaid names in the list, and succeed in satisfying him at once.

Looked at from outside, the machinery for selecting text books is unexceptionable. There is a text book committee which decides what books are readable and what books are not. This committee is strong enough so far as English is concerned. But the number of members in it whose judgment with regard to the merit of Bengali books can be accepted, is very small. At any rate, judging the tree by the fruit, the work that they have hitherto done, cannot ensure for them the confidence of the public. In the list of books approved by them, we find the names of some which are a tissue of nonsense from beginning to end. Whether the favor shewn towards them is due to the obliging nature of the judges, or to their want of sufficient critical power, the result to the public is all the same. The committee has been recently strengthened by the appointment of Rai Bahadar Bankim Chundra Chatterjee as member. A few more similar appointments may go some way towards improving matters. But the real source of the mischief has taken too firm a root to be easily eradicated.

Until recently, the text books for the Vernacular and Middle English schools were prescribed each year by the Divisional Inspector of Schools. This system, which led to great abuse, has now been abolished, and a list including a large number of approved text books on each subject was, by order of the Director of Public Instruction, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 15th July last. At the same time, it was announced that the school authorities were left at liberty to choose any book they liked from among those declared eligible. The list, however, was not given publicity in any other manner. And the intentions of Sir Alfred Croft are, we are told, about to be frustrated by a rumour, which the school authorities have been led to accept, that the list of text books prescribed in the previous year by the Inspector of Schools is to be taken to be in force for the current year also. If there is such a rumour, it is the inevitable result of the indefinite character of the list that has been prescribed authoritatively. Other mischiefs flow also from the same cause. The books of several authors being declared eligible for selections on each subject, every one of them is advertising that his is the only authorised text book on the subject. In the absence of a list of authorised text books specially sent to them, the school authorities are confounded by these conflicting advertisements, and are placed in a great difficulty in arriving at any decision. It seems to us that, instead of presenting an indefinite list, the better course would be to give, by turns, a chance to all approved authors. If Sir Alfred Croft will thus try to give a share of his patronage to every true votary of literature, really good books would come into existence, in much larger numbers than at present, and the country would be benefited in every way. At present, mere compilers sometimes get lacs of rupees, while really good writers have very often to pine in the cold shade of neglect. This state of things is prejudicial to the best interests of the country, and the sooner it ceases, the better for the cause of education and for the reputation of the department over which Sir Alfred presides.

AGRICULTURAL INDEBTEDNESS IN THE PUNJAB.

NOTE BY THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

THE opinions both of Revenue and Judicial Officers have almost all been given carefully and earnestly. They show a strong feeling of the existence either developed or commencing of a lamentable state of things, and even those officers who have least apprehension of political danger, who have least sentiment or repress it most carefully, and who are disposed to expect least advantage from radical alterations of law and procedure, virtually admit the great unsuitability of some parts of our legal system to the condition and circumstances of the agriculturists of the Province. On the other hand, there are a great many officers who feel that unsuitability so keenly as to find a difficulty, as Mr. R. Clarke says, in repressing intemperate language in writing about it. I have the advantage of knowing more or less well all the officers, European and Native, who have given opinions, and am able to judge of their weight even when they give them without full argument. There is great unanimity on certain points, but on other important ones the men of most weight are much divided. But from the whole body of opinions as well as from the statistics it may, I consider, be safely assumed to be proved that it is a fact, as we have already reported, that under the influence of indebtedness and of our present law and Civil Court procedure transfers of land are proceeding in all districts in an increasing ratio, and in many with dangerous rapidity, and that measures to check this process, so far as it is due to the action of our laws and Courts, are required throughout the Province. The fact that by a large proportion of these transfers the possession of the land passes from the old agricultural classes to men of the old commercial money-lending classes greatly increases the political danger of this state of things; but, on the other hand, even transfers from one agriculturist to another agriculturist, so far as they are due to unsuitability of our law and Civil Court procedure to the condition and circumstances of the poorer agriculturists, are also a serious reproach to our system and tend to make our Government unpopular. The whole body of opinions and the statistics also prove that the indebtedness and transfers are not due, except perhaps in certain tracts, and there to a most insignificant degree, to too great fixity of the land revenue demand, or to any other fault in our revenue system which can be cured. No one ventures to say that we can go back from the gift of proprietary right, and it is generally admitted that it existed before our time, and that what we have really done is to make it more valuable, and thereby to promote its being encumbered and eventually transferred. But there is no opinion of any weight in favour of seeking a remedy by reducing the value of the proprietary right by high land revenue assessments and short term settlements. Officers who are in contact with the agriculturists of the Punjab and in sympathy with them know how they would regard such a policy, and feel how little we can afford at the present day to shake the belief in the liberality and friendliness of our Government by adopting such an attitude. It was that belief, based mainly on the recognition of their right, and the improvement of their position in the early land revenue settlements, which reconciled the Punjabi peasant proprietors to our rule though an alien one, and made them throw in their lot with us at the time of the Mutiny, and it is from these peasants that we have since recruited the bulk and the flower of our Native Army. Mr. Kennedy's phrase of "sullen acquiescence" is I think a true enough description of the attitude to our Government of a large part of the rural population of the Montgomery District. This is due to hereditary temper and to forest reservations and mistakes made in land revenue and tinni management. To other districts it would be a gross exaggeration to apply it, but we could easily make mistakes which would make it generally applicable, and that there has been a marked tendency to a decline of good feeling in many if not in all districts is, in my opinion, very evident.

2. After carefully reading all these opinions, I am more strongly of opinion now than I was when we last addressed the Government of India that a remedy is required, and that a measure of reform of the nature of the Dekkhan Rayyets Relief Act is the only measure by which much can be effected. I think an Act very closely following most Chapters of that Act should be passed without delay for the whole of the Punjab. The Chapters on Village Munsiffs, Conciliators and Village Registrars would be permissive in their application as in the Dekkhan Rayyets Act. I believe they will all be useful, at once in some tracts and in time generally. In drafting our Village Munsiff Chapter I think we may get some good hints applicable to the Punjab from the Madras law. Another fact which points to the urgency of dealing strongly with the matter by special legislation is this, that, as I shall show later on, certain parts of our existing law which are calculated to accelerate the transfer of land from agriculturists to money-lenders, such for instance as the provisions for imprisonment and insolvency of the Civil Procedure Code, have till quite lately been practically inoperative against Punjab agriculturists, but are now beginning to be used to deprive them of their lands, and our special rules under Section 327 of that Code, which have hitherto immensely retarded the natural effects of the general law, are too loose and vague to be continued much longer without alteration. We have in fact come to a point where we must soon make a decided change in some direction.

3. I will now as the simplest method of dealing with this very difficult case go through the Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act, and see how far in my opinion a Punjab Agriculturist Relief Act could be based on it.

Chapter I of the Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act would do for Chapter I of the Punjab Act with the omission of the local extent clauses, and of Section 2 A. As to "local extent" our Act might extend I think to the whole of the Punjab.

Chapter II of the Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act could be adapted to apply to our Subordinate Judges' Courts. Its effect would be (1) to give the Subordinate Judges' power to hear (a) suits by an agriculturist for an account unlimited in amount, and (b) suits of classes w, x, of certain limited values (whoever parties may be), and suits of classes y and z (when defendant is agriculturist in one case and when plaintiff is in the other) according to a certain simplified procedure (Sections 7, 8, 9), and (2) to prevent appeals from the decrees and orders passed by the Subordinate Judges under the Chapter. But to make the Chapter have sufficient extent to be useful in the Punjab I think power should be taken in the Punjab Act to confer all or any of the powers of a Subordinate Judge of the 2nd Class under the Chapter upon Munsiffs of the 1st or 2nd Classes, and upon Special Judges and Benches appointed under Section 28 of the Punjab Courts Act. With a Chapter for Superintendence and Revision similar to Chapter VII, Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act, I do not think this would be dangerous, and the relief to litigation would be great. I think it would be better than the Small Cause Court procedure for rural tracts at all events. The definition of class (x) suits would have to be amended so as to exclude suits for rent for agricultural land. Suits for damages might also probably be excluded with advantage.

I think it would be necessary, as suggested by Mr. R. Clarke, Deputy Commissioner of Delhi, to appoint officers under the title of Registrars or Assistant Munsiffs to the establishment of the Munsiffs' Courts with powers to examine the parties as witnesses and make the inquiry into the history and merits of the case under Section 12 for the Court. This would be a good training for these officers who would rise to become Munsiffs if fit. At present the establishment of the Munsiffs' Courts in the Punjab is, as many officers note, scandalously small: it is about 5 times as large in Madras.

4. Chapter III of the Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act applies generally to trial of suits to which agriculturists are parties in all original Courts.

Section 11 would be adopted in our Act. It is in accordance with the first instructions for trial of civil suits issued when we annexed part of the Punjab.

As to Section 12 I think that after the words "hereinafter provided" the following sentence might be inserted: "Provided that when a registered bond or deed has been executed by the parties which purports to declare the amount of the creditor's claim at the time of execution thereof the Court shall so enquire and take account from the date of the said registered bond or deed only, unless the debtor denies execution of the bond or deed, or alleges that it is voidable under the Contract Act for want of free consent, and the Court for reasons to be recorded by it in writing deems it advisable to enquire into transactions antecedent to the said bond or deed for the purpose of testing such defences to the suit." This proviso would of course give a great stimulus to registration which would I think be good. I would leave the rules as to compulsory and optional registration as they are. The cost in time and money of registration is a heavy burden on business.

After Section 12 I think a Section 12A. might be added to following effect: "In suits and proceedings under this Act Section 16 of the Contract Act shall be read as if it contained the following additional clause: Clause (3). When a person obtains a grossly unfair advantage from a person who is ignorant and improvident, or hard pressed by debt or want." This is Mr. Benton's suggestion. It seems to me that with this addition to the Contract Act we might refuse to open accounts behind registered bonds and mortgage deeds, in the case of which we have generally some security that the debtor did deliberately settle accounts knowing what he was doing. There is no real security for this in the case of unregistered bonds or deeds, or balances of account struck in money-lenders' books.

Section 13 would have to be amended so as to be consistent with the principle of not going behind any registered bond or deed on the question of amount due at execution so long as the bond or deed is not declared to be void. This might be done, I think, sufficiently by inserting the words "with a view to taking an account between the parties" after the words "under Section 12." In other respects our section would follow Section 13 of the Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act except that I would leave out the words "or setting off the profits of mortgaged property without an account in lieu of interest," as this is a very old and common form of taking interest in the Punjab, and it is almost impossible to say to what the interest amounts, much or little, in such cases, and it would be very difficult to take the account. It is also a convenient form of agreement for paying interest for illiterate zamindars which I do not think ought to be upset. The last words of this section embody the important principle that the Court after taking account shall not award interest in excess of principal. This, as pointed out in many opinions, is in accord with old Punjab native custom.

5. A section of the nature of Section 14 is I think very necessary, but I should prefer to add at the end of clause (b) the following proviso: "provided that the Court shall not except for special reasons to be recorded award under this clause a higher rate of interest than $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum on cash (2 annas in rupee) and 25 per cent. or one-fourth per annum on transactions in kind." A rule of the kind, by which the Courts would ordinarily refuse to be instruments in recovering higher rates of interest in accounts between agriculturists and their creditors, would be in accordance with native feeling and old custom, and would not, I hold, prevent agriculturists getting necessary loans. It would prevent their getting improvident loans, and taken under the rule of interest not to exceed principal it would make creditors shy of going into Court unnecessarily and also shy of letting accounts run on too long. The principle that the Courts should award any interest agreed on, however exorbitant, rests, I suppose, on the Act of 1855 for the repeal of usury laws, which was extended to the Punjab in 1874. Before that, by the provisions of the old Punjab Civil Code, the Courts were directed not to decree more than 12 years' interest, and were empowered to cut down exorbitant rates of interest. Under the law, Regulation I of 1798, as to bai bil wafa mortgages or conditional sales still applicable in the Punjab, the lender cannot recover more than 12 per cent. interest, whatever the terms of the contract may be. This rate of 12 per cent. used to be called the legal rate in old Regulations and orders, and was commonly so regarded in early Punjab days.

6. Section 15, Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act, is very important. Some such section is in my opinion urgently necessary in our Act, as with creditors whose honesty is commonly open to the gravest doubt, and debtors who are commonly ignorant and illiterate, the unregistered bonds, deeds, or account books produced in support of a claim are constantly quite unreliable, and so is the oral evidence in Court of witnesses produced by the parties. The consequence is that the Court, being satisfied that there have been dealings between the parties, and being unable to satisfy itself as to the details, ends by attaching a weight to the bonds, deeds, or account books to which it feels that they are not really entitled. Arbitrators from their knowledge of the persons and the locality are in a better position to judge in such cases, and if doubts have to be solved by guesses at the truth, they are better qualified to make such guesses, and it is better that this duty should be put upon a body of arbitrators, and not upon the Court itself. It was on this account that in the first rules for administration of civil justice issued for part of Punjab in 1847-48 the Courts were specially enjoined to refer questions of account and some similar questions to arbitrators. The same instruction was contained in the old Punjab Civil Code, which was treated as law till some 20 years ago. But the last clause of Section 15, Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act, which applies Sections 508 to 522, Civil Procedure Code, to the arbitrations by order of Court under it, would be unpopular in the Punjab, and would not, I think, work well.

I think that our Section 15 might run as follows. After the words "may, of its own motion," insert the words "suggest that such amount be ascertained by arbitration under Chapter XXXVII, Civil Procedure Code. If all the parties agree and put in the necessary application the Court shall pass the order of reference under that chapter and proceed accordingly. If all the parties do not agree the Court may, with the consent of both parties, or with the consent of one of the parties only if he is the debtor, direct that such amount be ascertained by arbitration in accordance with the provisions of Sections 128 to 135 (1) of the Punjab Land Revenue Act and proceed accordingly." As to Section 131 (3) of the Land Revenue Act, which refers to appeals from orders in compulsory arbitration cases, if strong powers of supervision and control are taken, I do not know that power to appeal would be necessary, and if appeal was allowed it would only be where the decree was appealable if passed without arbitration, and perhaps not then if the Court accepted the arbitrator's award. The rest of the Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act section would not be wanted.

7. Sections 15 A. to 18, Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act, seem required in the Punjab and fit to be incorporated in our Bill without change. They will facilitate redemption and check the tricks of those mortgagees who having got possession dishonestly oppose redemption.

They will also greatly check those money-lenders who encourage agriculturists to take improvident loans and to run deeply into debt with a view to getting their land by means of mortgages with conditions of foreclosure and sale.

These sections would of course apply to registered as well as unregistered mortgages. The only difference would be as to going behind the deed to take account.

8. Sections 15A. and 15D. (1) are, in accordance with the existing Punjab law as to bai bil wafa mortgages, Regulation I of 1798, though I am not sure that that law is not overlooked. They will tend no doubt like the interest sections to restrict the borrowing credit of the agriculturist, but not I believe to a dangerous extent. I agree with those officers who think that the money-lending capitalists in the Punjab will and must go on loaning money to the agriculturists. What we want to do is to discourage those who lend not with a view to get back their money with interest, but with a view to get hold of the land by forcing the agriculturist to sell, or by selling him up through the Courts. It is the transactions of these men which come most into the Courts. I think that clause (2) of Section 15 B. should run in our Act after the words "in writing" as follows: "either (a) instead of making an order for the sale of the entire property mortgaged or for foreclosure, order the sale of such portion only of the property as it may think necessary for the realization of that sum, or (b) with the consent of the mortgagor transfer the mortgage of the whole or any part of the property mortgaged, with such modifications of the terms as may be agreed upon, to any person of the classes mentioned in Section 12 of the Punjab Laws Act who pays into Court the amount remaining payable by the mortgagor under the decree, or gives security for paying such amount within one month. Where security for payment in one month is accepted, the Court shall postpone the case to allow of such payment being made." A similar addition should be made to clause (2) of Section 15 (c).

These additions would help to keep money-lenders from obtaining a footing in village communities by foreclosure or sale under deeds of mortgage, and would meet the views of many officers who advocate the extension of right of pre-emption to mortgages, which proposal does not seem to me advisable and presents many difficulties.

9. Section 19 and Chapter IV of Insolvency have proved I believe inoperative in the Dekkhan, and Section 19 should I think be omitted in our Act. I doubt whether any Insolvency law by which an agriculturist can be made insolvent except on his own application is wanted in the Punjab, or whether any could be devised which would not do more harm than good. I believe the existing Insolvency laws (Punjab Laws Act and Civil Procedure Code) have hardly ever been applied to them yet. See as to this my note on Chapter IV below.

10. Section 20, giving power to fix instalments in execution, is I think much wanted in a Punjab Agriculturist Relief Act, as is held by the great majority of Punjab Officers, Revenue and Judicial. The power should be not only to fix instalments where none were fixed by the Court of decree, but also to revise instalments fixed by that Court; but, in the latter case, and in the case when the Court of decree had refused in writing to fix instalments, the Court of execution should record its reasons for revising or allowing instalments after hearing both parties and recording their statements. The Court of execution should also be allowed to revise, for reasons given, any order passed by the Court of decree or by itself to effect that if any one or more instalments are not paid on due date the whole decree money will be recoverable at once.

If full powers of supervision and control are secured to District or Divisional Judges in the Act, I doubt if any appeal against orders in execution revising or allowing instalments will be necessary, but this is a question to be considered in drafting the Act.

After the above section I think we should want in our Act another section (1) directing the Court of execution to fix an upset price on cattle and other moveable property of agriculturists attached and to release the property absolutely or on security if that price was not bid at auction; (2) empowering the Court with consent of the debtor after the upset price was fixed instead of proceeding to auction to require the decree-holder to take the property at the upset price under penalty of either (a) auction at his risk to the extent of the difference if any, or (b) release of the property from attachment at his cost. The opinions of most officers are in favour of some provisions of this kind. The Court might be directed to fix the upset price as near as might be 2 annas in rupee or $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. below the estimated full value. The price to be fixed by arbitrators if either of the parties objected to the valuation of the Court or of the officer deputed by the Court.

The section might also empower the Local Government to direct with regard to any district or tract that proceedings for attachment and sale or sale of agriculturists' cattle should be transferred to the Revenue authorities for execution. That is already the rule in the Punjab as regards all sales of agricultural land and standing crops in execution of decree.

Another section is also I think wanted in this Chapter modifying Section 258, Civil Procedure Code, by giving Courts of execution discretionary power to admit evidence as to and recognize uncertified payments out of Court in the case of illiterate agriculturists presumably ignorant of the law and also imposing on decree-holders under penalty the duty of certifying all payments. The law as it stands is too advanced for the mass of agriculturists and should be made looser.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE FIRST SNOW-STORM.

BY EPES SARGENT.

As for the first wild flower,
In the early time of spring,
As for the summer shower,
When earth is languishing ;
As for the rainbow's blending ;
As for the day-star's glow—
Have I looked for the descending
Of the first November snow.

It comes ! on pinions airy
The virgin flakes alight,
Like the torn plumes of a fairy,
Or the apple-blossoms white ;
With undulating motion,
The frozen ground they reach,
Or melt into the ocean
That booms along the beach.

Why watch I thus the falling
Of the first November snow
Because on me 't is calling
In the voice of long ago ;
Because it ever blendeth
With the memories of the boy ;—
Each flake, as it descendeth,
Enshrouds a perished joy !

O ! for those days when, rushing
Into the powdery air,
I felt the free, wild gushing
Of a spirit without care !
How, through the drifts that whitened
Our widow-sills at home,
I dashed, with heart unfrightened,
Like a dolphin through the foam !

And then the merry ringing
Of the sleigh-bells at the door,
And the winter evening bringing
A thousand pleasures more !
And the dear friends who surrounded
Our log-devouring hearth,
And the old songs that resounded,
And the hours of blameless mirth !

Ah, first snow of November !
Thou joys thou dost recall ;
But with them I remember,
They shall no more befall.

Companions have departed,
With whom that season fled ;
And some are weary-hearted,
And some are with the dead.

THE DAISY.

The daisy is the meekest flower
That grows in wood or field ;
To wind and rain, and footstep rude,
Its slender stem will yield.

And when they 're passed away again,
As cheerfully it springs
As if a playful butterfly
Had bent it with his wings.

The daisy is a hardy plant,
And in the winter time
We find it by the sheltered nooks,
Unhurt by snow and rime.

In spring it dots the green with white,
It blossoms all the year,
And so it is a fav'rite flower
To little children dear.

Before the stars are in the sky
The daisy goes to rest,
And folds its little shining leaves
Upon its golden breast.

And so it sleeps in dewy night
Until the morning breaks ;
Then, with the songs of early birds,
So joyously awakes.

And, children, when they go to bed,
Should fold their hands in prayer,
And place themselves, and all they love,
In God's almighty care.

Then they may sleep secure and still,
Through hours of darksome night,
And with the pretty daisy wake
In cheerful morning light.

LINES ON LIFE.

JOY comes and goes ; hope ebbs and flows,
Like the wave ;

Change doth unknit the tranquil strength of men ;
Love lends life a little grace,
A few sad smiles ; and then,
Both are laid in one cold place,
In the grave.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be

Dreams dawn and fly ; friends smile and die,
 Like spring flowers.
 Our vaunted life is one long funeral.
 Men dig graves, with bitter tears,
 For their dead hopes ; and all,
 Mazed with doubts, and sick with fears,
 Count the hours.

We count the hours ; these dreams of ours
 False and hollow,
 Shall we go hence and find they are not dead ?
 Joys we dimly apprehend,
 Faces that smiled and fled,
 Hopes born here and born to end ;
 Shall we follow ?

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Convocation of the University of Calcutta will be held next Saturday. Particulars will be found in the notice in the advertisement columns.

SIR John Edgar, K.C.I.E., C.S.I., has been taken in as an Additional Member of the Council of the Governor-General for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations. It is an honor done to the Bengal Secretariat. Another new Member is Mr. Palli Chentsal Rao Pantulu, C. I. E. We have already noticed the appointment of Dr. Rash Behari Ghosh and the reappointment of Mr. J. L. Mackay, C. I. E. These four members took their seats yesterday.

THE new Honorary Presidency Magistrates for Calcutta, are Babus Hem Chunder Ker and Brahmo Nath Sen and Messrs. John Gillham, Womack and Walter Davies. The two Bengalis are retired Deputy Magistrates.

WE are glad to find that fresh honours await our distinguished countryman Babu Bankim Chunder Chatterji, every day since his retirement from Government Service. An Anglo-Indian contemporary hails him "the patriarch of the Bengali Pundits."

THE Saturday Review of the 21st November contains a puzzle. There is a political leading article with a queer heading as follows :

1885-6—And

What does it all mean ? one wonders. Let the intelligent reader try his wits at it.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has exempted Maharaja Khetish Chundra Roy Bahadur of Kishnaghur, in the Nuddea District, from personal attendance in Civil Courts.

MR. T. G. S. Hodgkinson, C. S., Commissioner of the Irrawady Division, Burma, and formerly Manager and Guardian of the present Maharaja of Huiwa, having died, the Maharaja, now in Benares, has, in honored memory of the deceased, ordered the closing, for three days, of the Raj offices in Huiwa.

WITH the concurrence of Rani Surja Mani PatmahaDeyi, Superintendent of the Temple, the Pooree Temple Repairs Committee have decided "to put up a memorial tablet in a conspicuous part of the Temple precincts, shewing the names of donors from Rs. 100 and upwards." The Committee evidently think that that inducement will spur those who still lag behind.

THE Dogras too are up and doing. On the 9th instant, a great meeting of the representatives of the Dogra Rajputs, previously duly elected by their brotherhoods in meetings held specially for the purpose in the Sialkote, Gurdaspur, Kangra and Hushiarpur Districts, took place in the Town Hall, Lahore. There appears to have been some good speaking. The principal resolutions adopted were these :—

"(1) Raja Indar Dew of Dina Nagar was elected President and Babu Daswandhi Ram, Choudhari Malah Singh, Sardar Changan Singh and Mian Ghasitoo were nominated Vice-Presidents and Mian Moti Singh and Pundit Maghar Ram Dogra were appointed Joint Secretaries and Babu Beli Ram, B. A., was made Assistant Secretary and Choudhari Malah Singh accepted the post of Treasurer. (2) That in view of the growing poverty of the Rajputs and their incapability to afford to pay the high fees levied in the schools and colleges of the Province, and considering the peculiar mode of living of the Rajputs, a Central Rajput College be established somewhere near Rajput homes. (3) That an association under the name of Rajput College Establishment Association be formed with Headquarters at Gurdaspur and branches in the Districts of Sialkote, Hushiarpur and Kangra to collect funds and do such other things necessary for establishing such a College. (4) That a deputation wait upon His Honor the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab with a memorial asking the support of the Government to the proposed College."

THE facts brought to light by scientific investigation, are oftentimes far stranger than anything we read in works of fiction. We are told that there are plants which not only seize and prey upon insects, but have the power of assimilating animal food and being nourished by it. One of the most important of this class of plants is the Disnæa muscipula which is a native of America. The following is a description of it in the Popular Science News :—

"The appearance of this plant is so peculiar that when once seen it is not readily forgotten. A leafless scape, 6m. in height, rises from the root, and terminates in an umbel of white flowers ; these are, however, of a distinctly subordinate interest. Its winged leafstalks spread themselves out like a kind of rosette about the root, each bearing a broad leaf, so curious in the strange powers which it displays as almost to convince one that the plant can lay claim to a sentient life. The leaf proper is orbicular in shape, and has a hinge-like mid-vein, upon which the halves swing smoothly, opening and shutting with great speed and ease. Each half is somewhat concave upon the upper surface, and is bordered by a row of spines thickly placed around its outer edge, and set at such an angle as to cross when the blades are closed. They have also a power of separate movement, and interlock like the fingers of two hands. They remind one irresistibly of the teeth of a steel trap, which, in fact, they also resemble in the use for which they are designed. On the central part of each blade we find three conspicuous hairs. These are of the greatest sensitiveness, delicate, irritable, and so placed that even a small insect can hardly alight or move about upon the leaf without touching one or more of them. Over the surface of the blades are also strewn many small red globules, or glands, which are most numerous in the vicinity of the hairs. Provided the leaf upon which it grows be vigorous, no sooner is one of these irritable hairs touched—be it ever so lightly—than the blades spring together, the spines cross at right angles, and presently a slightly glutinous secretion begins to flow from the red globules, which is supposed to be the active agent in the process of digestion. It is not improbable that the fluid from these glands may also serve to attract insects and cause them to alight upon the plant."

If this curious plant can afford any protection against mosquitoes, its cultivation would certainly be worthwhile in every Indian home.

IN the papers brought by the last mail, we read a curious love story of which the hero is a retired army surgeon, 55 years old. In spite of his age and the experience which he presumably has in the business, he seems to lack altogether the wisdom which usually guides the movements of successful strategists. He was hauled up before a London Magistrate on a charge of indecently assaulting a young lady of 24—Miss Maud Ridley. He saw her at a railway station and, resolving at once to honor her with his attention, pursued her through the streets, and finally rushed after her into her bedroom. The foolishness displayed by him in his plan of campaign, characterised also the defence that he made in court. He virtually admitted the complaint of his lady love and declared before the Magistrate that he "merely put his arms round her waist, pressed her and asked her to be his wife." The lady who was the object of this demonstration gives a different version as to the details. Whatever was the case, the adventure was cut short by the police coming in and taking him into custody. Samuel Gamble White, the gay Lothario we are speaking of, does not seem to have figured in any criminal court during his Indian career. But in his native country he has apparently that renown for which he is destined. At any rate, the adventure related above is not the only one of the kind for which he has come to grief. During the hearing of the case under notice, it was proved that he had pestered other ladies with his amorousness and had been, at the instance of a fair damsel, kicked out of her house by her footman.

Holloway's Pills.—In general debility, nervous tremor, and mental depression, these unrivalled Pills have a marvellous effect. They have won the confidence of millions in all parts of the civilised world. Constitutions shaken by sensual excesses, or by long residence in unwholesome climates, or by sedentary habits, are wonderfully renovated by a course of this extraordinary medicine, which, powerful as is its action on the whole system, is perfectly harmless to the tenderest frame. The Pills are composed of rare balsams, without the admixture of a grain of any mineral whatever, or of any other deleterious substance. They operate directly, powerfully and beneficially upon the whole mass of blood, nor can we question the fact when we see indigestion cured, liver complaints arrested, the oppressed lungs brought into healthful play, and every physical function renewed and strengthened by their agency.

THE Tribune says that Pandit Radha Kishen has been removed from his post of Governor of Jummoo. Our contemporary gives no reasons for the step. Is he the same as the former Governor of Ladak, who was ordered down to render an account of his stewardship, and who, while under this cloud, employed his comparative leisure to such purpose, in conjunction with his brother-in-law become a member of the Maharaja's cabinet, that his disgrace was turned to a triumph, and he obtained the prize government of Jummoo, by turning out the popular and highly respected incumbent? The latter was the head of one of the oldest families in the hills and a man of seventy years of age and of sensitive honour. Hearing that they had got up a balance against him of 30 years back, he discerned the aspect of the times, and for personal safety decamped with his family to Lahore, his two eldest sons throwing up high and lucrative posts. It seems another turn of the wheel has come and with it crushing the once lucky Radha Kishen.

It appears that the late Governor of Jummoo is charged with numerous instances of corruption.

THE Cashmere State Council have appointed a Commission to enquire into the judicial administration of the Poonchi Principality, which part of the country yet remains in a backward condition.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THIS has been a sad week—of dire want, disease, and death. Men are dying on all sides, here under the slow tortures of starvation, there from sickness—here the masses are being swept away, there the ranks of the upper ten and of the magnates are being thinned. While Famine is decimating Russia, deadly sickness has invaded other countries.

INFLUENZA is raging in a virulent epidemic form in England. Over two hundred employes in the Enfield Arms Factory are down with it. The London barracks may be said to be so many hospitals. Lord Knutsford, Secretary of State for the Colonies, has been seized, and, most lamentable of all, the Duke of Clarence and Avondale has fallen a victim to the disease.

The Queen is deeply affected by the death of her grandson. The Princess of Wales is crushed by the blow, and the Princess May of Teck is inconsolable and restless, refusing to partake of food.

The bereavement of the English Royal Family has evoked the greatest sympathy from all quarters. All the European Powers telegraphed messages of condolence. The President of the Italian Chamber of Deputies in a touching phrase expressed the Southern sentiment, saying England's sorrow Italy's own. The American President conveyed the grief of the United States. All the British Colonies, as in loyalty bound, were equal to the occasion. Lord Lansdowne wired to the Queen the consternation with which the news was received in India, Her Majesty replying "Many Thanks: I am sure of the sympathy of my loyal Indian people."

In Calcutta, the demonstration of sorrow bids fair to be complete. The Governor-General's Council held a meeting of mourning on Friday. All public business was suspended. While Lord Lansdowne spoke for the Empire, Sir Charles Elliott, in a handsome way, represented the loyal feeling of the Province. Nor does he rest there. On Monday, a public meeting will be held at the Town Hall, the Lieutenant-Governor presiding, "to give expression to the sorrow which fills all classes of the community at the untimely death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale."

The Mahomedan Literary Society have postponed their Conversazione fixed for the 27th to a future day to be notified hereafter. Theatres and Schools have been equally alive to the sadness of the hour, and joined the general mourning.

IN Russia, the famine is unabated. The peasantry is reduced to burning the roofs of their dwellings for fuel. The Russian Treasury has assigned a further sum of sixty-five million roubles for relief. A Committee has been formed in London to raise funds in aid of the distressed subjects of the Czar.

THE complications arising out of the death of Mahomed Tewfik Pasha have been tidied over. The Sultan of Turkey has accepted Prince Abbas as the Khedive of Egypt, and the son has been proclaimed in place of the father.

THERE is great indignation in European circles against Tewfik's Haqueems. The Native Doctors are said to have bungled in their diagnosis of the late Khedive's disease. So did the European Doctors who tortured the poor ex-Emperor of the French to death. But "natives" are game for European tables, and certainly there is no more mercy for Native Doctors in British Egypt than for Native Surgeons and Assistant Surgeons and medical graduates in British India. A medical enquiry into the Khedive's death has been ordered.

THE German Reichstag has wisely accepted the proposition to pay the members.

To descend to the Calcutta Corporation, Sir Henry Harrison had such a scheme for our municipality, but the unselfish representatives on the Board rejected it—hoping for higher rewards than what it would allow.

THE Army Signalling School at Aldershot has been totally destroyed by fire, as also the Abbey of Fecamp, where the Benedictine Liquor is manufactured. We hope we shall no more hear of the saints' proficiency in the unsaintly, not to say sinful, art.

HIS Eminence Henry Edward Manning, Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, has been gathered to his fathers.

IN India, the notable loss is that of Pandit Ajodhya Nath, of Allahabad. He was a fine Persian and Arabic scholar, a learned Hindu and Mahomedan lawyer, an able advocate, thoroughly almost rudely independent, a public-spirited citizen, and withal an honest man. He had latterly identified himself with the National Congress and his death is almost a deathblow to the prospects of the annual palaver in Upper India. The Calcutta Congressists, overpowered by the loss, committed the mistake of closing their schools in memory of the deceased.

IN the early days of the East India Company when it was only a trading corporation, the skill of its medical officers in the healing art secured for it many important privileges, which its agents had in vain sought to acquire by diplomacy and costly presents. The history of the success achieved by Boughton and Hamilton is too valuable to be lost sight of, and it cannot be a matter of surprise that the Government of India invariably deputed efficient medical officers to open hospitals in the tracts it is desired to bring under its influence. The exploring party deputed lately to the Pamir under Captain Young-husband had in their staff a native doctor. He opened camp hospitals at Yarkhand and Kashgar, and was so highly appreciated that he was formally thanked by the local magnates for the services rendered by him to the people. A smart medical subordinate is permanently stationed at Chitral in the frontiers of Cashmere, while recent events have made Gilgit not only one of the most important cantonment towns in the frontier, but also the headquarters of a little army of surgeons and hospital assistants. However much they may impress saint, savage, or sage, they will not, we are afraid, charm the Bear.

To realize the outstanding rate bills before the close of the municipal or official year, it is proposed to cut the water connections of those premises, the owners and occupiers of which have been defaulters for the three previous quarters, if they fail to pay up, after due presentation of the bills, within the current quarter. Indeed, the law allows the Commissioners to "cause the water to be turned off or cut off from the house or land in respect of which such water rate is payable," "if any person supplied with water shall neglect to pay the water-rate at any of the times of payment thereof." But there is no separate water rate bill, all the four rates—the general rate, the water rate, the lighting rate and the sewage rate—being included in and recovered as one bill. The penalty of deprivation of water can not consistently be levied for realization of other than the water rate. The law does not give the Commissioners the option of turning off water from a house when any or all of the other three rates remain unpaid.

This is another instance of the haste and carelessness with which Bills are passed through the Legislative Councils in this country.

THE so called General Booth, Field Marshal commanding the grotesque Christian body called the Salvation Army, has been in Calcutta and gone, after some paltry demonstrations got up by his handful of garrison here and the usual palaver.

On Tuesday evening, he left for Upper India. His followers issued out of their miserable barracks in Bow Bazar Street and formed a procession, partly of the military and partly of the native wedding kind, in his honor. Foremost were placed the Native converts and others more or less salvationised, in all scarcely two scores in number, followed by the dancing and psalm-singing girls with tambourines, and backed finally by the band and officers. The poverty of the demonstration was made still more palpable by the rows of talcose lights which make native processions of gods and men so ludicrous. Of course, a great crowd was attracted by the noise to see what it was all about, whether the Commander-in-Chief was going to marry in Indo-European pomp some Indo-Lusitanian heiress, the owner of a dozen kintals, or what. The General left the poor people waiting for him for more than a quarter hour beyond his appointed time. At last, there arose a shout He's come! He's come!—the Conquering Hero! He came in a barouche and pair which took its appointed place in the procession between the Salvation lasses and the Salvation Band. Thus the whole body marched to the Howrah Station, where the General rewarded his followers, for all their toil and trouble, with a short speech. The spectacular effect was necessarily pitiful, but there was something almost scandalous in a great religious and philanthropic prophet risen to rebuke the luxury and corruptions of the historic Faiths and of a degenerate Age, lording it over his followers, while in the very act of marching in procession in his honour and for the glory of the cause, from his state coach, and disdaining to come down for the nonce to walk the firm earth with them for fifteen or twenty minutes.

THE Christian Vernacular Education Society, which was established in the year 1858 as a memorial of the Mutiny, has recently changed its name, with a view, it seems, to extend the scope of its operation. Its appellation is henceforth to be—The Christian Literature Society of India. We are told that the number of books and tracts issued by the old Society exceeds fifteen millions and a half. Even at four annas per volume, the cost of these publications must have been about 40 lacs of rupees.

Surely, the amount could have been better spent than in printing books in the vernacular, which, on account of their diction and style, serve only to excite ridicule, and damage the cause of Christianity in India quite as much as the martial music, the monstrous placards, and the odd uniforms of the Salvation Army.

O wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as others see us!
It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
An' foolish notion.

ON Wednesday, the Municipal Commissioners, on the motion of Baboo Kally Nath Mitter, decided to grant their Chairman a house allowance of Rs. 250 a month, commencing from the 1st January 1892, the sum the Lieutenant-Governor was prepared to sanction. There were two amendments—one moved by Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee and the other by Mr. N. N. Ghose. Baboo Banerjee was in no hurry and would refer the whole question to the Budget Committee for consideration. Mr. Ghose preferred granting the allowance from the next municipal year in April. Baboo Norender Nath Sen charged Baboo Kally Nath with inconsistency in bringing forward the present motion. He had, while moving at a previous meeting his resolution for giving Rs. 500, informed his colleagues that Mr. Lee would either have the Rs. 500 or leave the municipality, and that nothing short of the full amount would induce him to forego the furlough he was entitled to. Could, Babu Norender Nath argued, inconsistency go farther? Would the mover, he asked, be equally ready with a proposition for Rs. 100 if Sir Charles Elliott had come down to that sum? Baboo Kallynath claimed that he was not inconsistent and was true to his municipal conscience. And then he gave his audience the nature of this elastic moral property. He said that he had moved for Rs. 500 because Mr. Lee wanted that sum, as it had been allowed to other Chairmen. Now that Mr. Lee was agreeable to Rs. 250, he felt no hesitation in moving for it. If Mr. Lee were willing to accept a rupee, he, the magnanimous Baboo, would be equally prepared to grant him that increase, and not a two-penny dam more. Whatever the logical strength or personal propriety—not to say decency—of the argument, Baboo Kallynath was in Saturnia regna, and he had the ball at his feet. A fig for charges of inconsistency! As a lawyer, he had done nothing without warrant. With the change of front in higher quarters, he too had changed his. The event having been settled by secret treaty, he appeared on the field of Plassey in mufti, in a smoking cap instead of the usual turban, and was so confident of success of his motion that he simply moved it, jauntily referring the meeting to what he had said on the subject on previous occasions. Both the amendments were lost. To the surprise of all, however, there was a tie on the substantive motion which was carried by the casting vote of the Vice-Chairman who presided on the occasion. A poll being demanded, the result showed that 18 were for the immediate increase against 16. The native Commissioners were equally divided and, in consequence, the European votes decided the question. It was remarked that a European first voted against, and then for, Baboo Kally Nath's motion.

QUITE accidentally, a literary treasure of great value has been recently brought to light from a quarter where it was least expected. No one ever suspected that the immortal "Sage of Chelsea" had left to the world any wealth beyond the rich heritage of which it is in possession already. Far less did it occur to any that a part of his "estate and effects" would be discovered for the first time in India. For the preservation of the property which has lately been unearthed, the republic of letters is indebted to the late Mr. Chisholm Anstey of the Bombay bar. About the year 1838, Carlyle undertook to deliver a course of lectures on the history of literature. Though based upon written notes, they were virtually delivered extempore and would have been lost to the world, but for the presence of Mr. Anstey who took them down, and transcribed them in a book which, upon his death, came into the possession of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. For nearly eighteen years, no notice was taken of them. But at last they have been published by Messrs. Curmen, Kim and Co. with an Introduction and notes by Mr. R. P. Korkoria. For this precious windfall, the grateful acknowledgments of every scholar are due to the memory of the preserver of the relic, and also to the editor and the publishers, who have brought it within the reach of the public.

THE London correspondent of the Indian Spectator writes:—

"Why should India be left out of this 'World's Fair'? As matters stand at present, that is the position. Probably I have already referred to a serious omission: but if so, there will be no harm in my again sounding the note of warning, though the blundering of the authorities concerned is so astounding that it may have been overruled by wiser heads: if not, it must be. The matter stood in this wise: the Commissioners for the United Kingdom, who have had £25,000 placed at their disposal by the British Government, proposed to the Secretary of State for India that £3,000 would be a suitable sum to be applied for from the Indian revenue to assist in the collection of Indian products and assistance to exhibitors. What Lord Cross said to his Council or they to him, or how they fumbled over this simple matter, you will never know until next century; but the feeble course was taken of asking the Indian Government what it thought; and this, I believe, was done in a telegram which was cyphered or economised into obscurity. In any case, seeing that the Indian Government has set its face hard against spending a rupee on industrial reform or social improvement of any kind, so that it may squander over the border every lakh that can be squeezed out of the Indian people, such a request—put as if to be refused—was useless. Thus India is to be excluded from Chicago!"

And she will be all the better for it. There is no occasion for grief. If the Government of India deliberately set their face against the proposition to exhibit India at the Chicago Fair, their courage as well as their wisdom is to be congratulated. Of course, their courage will be truly tested when the call to exhibit India comes from the promoters of a European, particularly a British, Show. But, whatever the attitude of Government, it would be sufficient if the people clearly understood their own interests and resolutely kept clear of these gigantic fairs.

THE Punjab Patriot of the 11th January current contains its notice of the last year. The reason for this deferred treatment is given. The conductors thought it proper to celebrate the anniversary of the paper with the review of the past twelvemonth.

"On the 5th of January last year we published our first issue, and to-day we publish the fifty-third." &c.

As at the outset, so in this retrospect, our contemporary justifies its birth. In doing so, it necessarily implies, if it does not in so many words pronounce, a condemnation on the existing organs in the press.

"The Punjab Patriot was badly needed. Before it appeared upon the scene, no two loyal citizens could meet and talk upon the prospects of the Province and its Press without lamenting that even the capital of the Punjab did not boast of a well-conducted Native paper of reliable and useful news for the people, printed in the language of our rulers. The time had, indeed, arrived when, after long tolerance of mischievous and racial writing, the Punjabis yearned for some newspaper of their own which would give them, in handy weekly form, the news of the week, with plain and sensible comments thereon in good English and good taste, and which would not have the appearance of existing solely for the purpose of creating ill-feeling between the Europeans and the natives of the Province. The Warburton libel case may be said to have been the spark which set fire the smouldering heap of desire that the Punjab should have its own loyal and patriotic press; and our first issue of January last year was brought out with an accompaniment of general congratulations from all sorts and conditions of men in the Province. This cheered us greatly at the start; and now that we are strong enough to run alone, it is our first duty to acknowledge with fullest gratitude the cordial encouragement which we received from officials and non-officials, from Christians, Sikhs, Hindus and Muhammadans, from rich and poor, from Liberals and Conservatives. For a long time scarcely a day passed without our receiving in the daily dak some cheery letter of welcome and approval from some unknown friend in the Province, and our conviction grew daily stronger that, with so many good friends in the Province, our venture in the good cause could not fail.

And it has not failed. To-day we occupy a sounder stronger position than we had ever hoped could have been ours within one year. We have taken a good place at the start, and we shall stay to the finish."

Amen! we say. The position and prospects of the native press in India at large, are in general so cheerless, that it is an agreeable surprise to hear a journal recount thus its Cæsarian triumph. The Punjab Patriot is young and prosperous and sanguine. It not only deserves success, but seems prepared to command it. It talks amiably of its future.

"It is the first two years of a newspaper's life that tries its strength, and the second year is, as a rule, more trying than the first. But the Punjab Patriot has, like a strong sapling, struck its roots so deep in the first year of its growth, that it could, if need were, remain stationary throughout the second year and yet be proud of its two years' progress. But we do not mean to be stationary."

There is a silvery ring, as of buoyant healthy childhood, in that utterance which is most pleasing and which disarms criticism. Yet, the wisdom of the nursery ought not to be taken too seriously. All danger is not over with infancy, and may our contemporary never know the decrepitude of age from which some journals, one at least of the same ilk though of another Province, suffer! Looking back upon the year that is gone, the Punjab Patriot sees

"from beginning to end the triumph of the principles which the Punjab Patriot came into existence to contend for. The Warburton libels, which quickened desire into action, have ended in a complete apology on the part of the offending newspaper and the payment of a large sum of money by its proprietor. The Bengali Congress, which had threatened to introduce political strife into this Province, is decently conducting its own funeral at Nagpur; while a general feeling remains that a properly and modestly conducted Conference of educated Indians would be respectfully listened to by our rulers. The Age of Consent Bill has been passed without awakening any excitement at all in this province, but it has indirectly resulted in the formation of a Press Association at Lahore, from whose working much good may be confidently anticipated."

It is satisfactory to see that the Punjab Patriot, which from its birth was wont to be so miserable on the subject, is now satisfied with the Government of India's treatment of Cashmere, and expresses "heartily approval of the K. C. S. I. bestowed upon Raja Amar Singh for his Civil, and of a Colonelcy in the British army upon Raja Ram Singh for his military services, as well as the title of Rai Bahadur given to Sirdar Rup Singh, the Governor of Cashmere."

We are glad to hear such good news of our contemporary. It is an able well-conducted journal of sound principles. Such a journal would be a boon to any part of the empire, to counteract the wild radicalism of thought and recklessness of expression to which so many of our publicists are prone, but it was peculiarly appropriate to a frontier Province of prime importance.

HITHERTO, the Peterboat, capable of going either way with equal facility without turning, has been the highest point reached by us in versatile vehicling. The latest novelty of scientific mechanics is an amphibious car which can be made to run on both land and water with equal facility. It is neither a boat nor an omnibus but partakes of the character of both. The credit of this wonderful invention belongs to a country whose science and invention are out of all proportion to her political status. We take the following account from a contemporary:—

"A steamer which can be propelled on land by means of its own engine has just been constructed at the Ljunggren Engineering Works at Kristianstad, in Sweden. It is intended for the traffic on two lakes close to Borås, which, however, are separated by a strip of land. Rails have been laid between the two lakes. The steamer which has been christened very appropriately Svanen (the Swan) can run itself across from one lake to the other. At a trial trip, if one may call it so, at the works, the vessel fulfilled the tests very well. The engine is ten horse-power, and the Svanen can accommodate some sixty passengers."

The "Swan" may be an appropriate proper name. The linguistic difficulty of inventing a common for the conveyance remains.

It was brought into prominence during the dissension over the last Burdwan adoption, that the two Members of the Board of Revenue exercised separate powers while empowered only to act collectively. The illegalities thus committed by them were condoned and authority was given by the Governor General in Council to continue the old practice. The old law has now been done away with, and the Lieutenant-Governor feels himself competent to authorize the Members of the Board to act separately in their respective departments. A notification in the Cuttack Gazette of the 13th January 1892, under orders of the G. H., assigns the duties in the department of Land Revenue—including Revenue, Survey and settlement, Land registration, Land improvement, the Sale or lease of waste land and Government estates, the Management of Wards and Attached Estates, the collection of cesses, the realization of arrears of revenue, and the recovery of public demands, rent suits, embankments, pensions, the examination, enrolment, &c., of Revenue Agents, opium sales, and the supply of provisions for troops—to Sir H. L. Harrison, the Senior Member, from the 30th October 1891. The Departments of Miscellaneous Revenue—including Excise, Income-tax, Salt, Opium, Customs, Stamps and Stationery, Mines, the partition of estates and the acquisition of land for public purposes—are placed from the 16th December 1891—the date on which he took charge from the retired Mr. A. Smith—are placed under independent supervision of Mr. C. C. Stevens, the Junior Member. The notification also announces that Mr. A. Smith exercised the said powers from the 30th October to the 15th December 1891. But it does not, in so many words, confirm what Mr. Smith, independently of the other Member, did during his Junior Membership of the Board. A general authority without any retrospective force cannot, we are afraid, legalize an unauthorized act or an omission. Its legalizing ought to be specifically mentioned, if such power exists.

THE Dacca bribery case commenced in the High Court on Monday and continues. For the first four days, it was virtually a trial of the chief witness Guru Churn Bhattacharjee, the foreman of the Jury in the Belati murder case, said to have been offered a bribe of Rs. 4,000 for a favorable verdict. Under the cross-examination of Mr. Woodroffe, counsel for the chief accused Anand Chunder Ray, he seemed to lose his senses, and on Wednesday before the proceedings commenced he addressed the Judge saying—

"Some of my statements made yesterday, were incorrect from loss of memory, inadvertence and temptation to protect myself. I ask to be spared further cross-examination. I may tell one or two lies and it will be a great sin to tell lies. I have committed a great many sins in my life and I have been suffering for that. After my visit to the Bramachari, I have tried my best to lead a moral life. In course of the Belati case when Ananda Babu interfered, then only I had a temptation. Since that temptation I thought of taking the money at one time and resolved not to take it at another time. Then I became weak, and through the persuasion of several people, surrendered my judgment to their advice and I had the inclination to take the money."

Mr. Woodroffe, availing himself of this opportunity, enquired if the prosecution were still prepared to proceed with the case. Mr. Pugh, the Standing Counsel, left the matter entirely to the Judge who saw no immediate necessity of stoppage of proceedings. So poor Guru Churn had no escape. He then took a bold step which brought him to grief. He began to be unmannerly, declining to answer the questions of Mr. Woodroffe. The Judge warned him of the gross contempt of Court he was committing, and he, still persisting in his conduct, was sent to jail for a night to regain his ordinary frame of mind. Next day, on better consideration shewn and provided with a seat by the Clerk of the Crown, he allowed himself to be cross-examined for a couple of hours, when he began to feel unwell, and was allowed by the Judge to go home for medical treatment, for the operation of the next day by the counsel of the second accused. That day—Friday—Guru Churn commenced with the statement—"I am guilty, the others are not guilty." That trial was, however, a short time, which also tried the temper of the Judge. Guru Churn then had permission of the Judge to leave the court. It was a relief to both the witness and the Judge.

THE DEATH OF THE DUKE OF CLARENCE AND AVONDALE.

SINCE, in response to the prayers of a multiracial people dispersed throughout the globe, the Prince of Wales was saved from death's very door, the empire on which the sun never sets hardly ever experienced from any casualty a greater shock than that which it has received this week by the death of Prince Albert Victor. The announcement came like a thunderbolt in a perfectly serene and cloudless sky. It seems as if but yesterday Calcutta was en fête for giving a fitting reception to the Prince. But a few weeks ago, every loyal subject of Britain's Queen-Empress rejoiced at the tidings that Her Majesty's grandson and heir to her throne's heir-apparent was betrothed to a cousin of his and that the marriage ceremony was to take place before long. Congratulations poured in upon the happy pair from all quarters. In India, the good luck of Her Majesty became the topic of conversation in every household. For once the whole subject population were at one. On the natives of this country, domestic as they are to a fault, the charm of such a home life as that of Her Majesty exercises its highest fascination. Accordingly, both Hindus and Mussulmans, Jains and Parsees, Jews and Gentiles, welcomed the news of the approaching union with demonstrations of delight. The good Queen's happiness was on every lip. And, truly, it does not fall to the lot of every individual to witness the marriage ceremony of a grandchild. How very fortunate—it was universally felt—the Queen-Empress of India must be to be endowed without stint with the choicest of earthly blessings!

But lo! the panorama changes all at once. On Sunday last, Reuter announced that the Duke of Clarence and Avondale was suffering from influenza. A few bulletins followed which were of a dubious character. Then on Thursday came the sad announcement that has plunged half the world in mourning. It is not in the power of human condolence to assuage the sorrow of the bereaved parents for the "loss of a finished man" in their heir, or to console the grand old grandmother for the sudden arrest of all her splendid self-satisfaction as a female sovereign reigning undisturbed over the greatest empire of the globe, who has been privileged to see an adult grandson worthy of his race, and the dissipation of the dreams of all the further happiness she had reckoned upon from the marriage, all but celebrated in due form, of her beloved grandson with a loved and loving cousin. That must be the work of Time—

Time, the beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin, comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled.

But even the Old Physician General of the Universe will, we are afraid, long fail to bring any balm to the bleeding heart of the young bride mourning the loss of her royal bridegroom. To her the Fates have been cruel Furies. Her grief is inconsolable. She has been crushed down. For our part, all we can do is to pray to God to give the several members of the stricken family the required strength for bearing the weight of grief with which it has been His will to load them.

A Gazette of India Extraordinary thus announced the death:—

"Calcutta, the 14th January, 1892.

Intelligence having been received of the death of His Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor Christian Edward, eldest son of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales—Duke of Clarence and Avondale, Earl of Athlone, K.G., K.P., LL.D. (Cantab. and Dublin), the Governor-General in Council hereby directs that the Officers of Her Majesty's Civil, Military, and Marine Services do put themselves into mourning until further orders.

The Governor-General in Council requests that a similar mark of respect may, on this melancholy occasion, be observed by all other classes of British subjects in India.

The Flag at Fort William will be hoisted half mast high from sunrise to-morrow until further orders.

By order of the Governor-General in Council,
C. J. LYALL,
Secy. to the Govt. of India."

THE RUSSIAN MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

THE Minister for Foreign Affairs of a Great Power is obviously an important person. He is, as such, one of the chief moving forces on our globe. It behoves us to watch his movements and to know all that is worth knowing about him. The present head of the Russian Foreign Office is one of the leading statesmen of the day of the civilized world. His recent visit abroad has more than ever brought him to special prominence. Yet he is not so well known out of his country that an account of him will not, we take it, be welcome. Our fortunes as Indians and British subjects, and the whole prospects of our race, depend so much upon the expansion of the great Northern Empire, that it is highly necessary for us to study the nature of Russian Policy and the personalities that mould it. Accordingly, we gather, for the benefit of our readers, the following account.

Russia has always maintained a bold front before the Powers. She has the good fortune of having preserved a strong and disciplined diplomacy, impregnated with traditions which assure the continuity of her foreign policy. She has been well served. The present chief of the Foreign Affairs is M. de Giers. This important post has always been worthily filled, his two predecessors having been the illustrious Count Nesselrode and Prince Alexander Gortschakoff.

Nicholas Carlovich Giers was born in 1820, at Radziroilovo, on the Austrian frontiers, where his father served as Director of Post Offices. The family is of Swedish origin and had been established in Gottenburg. One of his ancestors was Quarter Master-General of the Swedish army, and having been made prisoner by Peter the Great, had settled in Russia. The son was Consul-General of Sweden at St. Petersburg towards 1740. His sons entered the Russian service and soon allied themselves with the best Russian families by marriage. The mother of the present Foreign Minister was a sister of the illustrious Admiral (afterwards Count) Lütke, who was the President of the Academy of Science.

At the age of eight, Nicholas Carlovich was sent to St. Petersburg, where he entered the "School of Nobles," which has the privilege of sending every year five best students to the Lyceum of Alexander. He was one of the five who were sent to that institution, of which Pouschkine and Gortschakoff were students. At eighteen, he left it and soon entered the Asiatic Department of the Foreign Office. This Department comprehends not only China, Japan, Persia, Central Asia, but also Greece, Roumania, the Slav States and Turkey. The Chief of this Department directs, by correspondence with those countries, not only the political and consular affairs, but also debatable and financial matters. M. de Giers bore the heavy burden of this Department for seven years, during which he was admirably prepared: the first part of his career was passed in the East, and his qualities of grasp, coolness, patience and conciliation were eminently developed and matured.

In 1841, he was sent to Moldavia, which was then regarded as a place of considerable importance in Russian politics.

In 1849, when Count Luders invaded Transylvania, M. de Giers joined him as his diplomatic agent. He filled afterwards the post of the First Secretary to the Embassy at Constantinople, of Consul at Yassy, and, during the Crimean War, he was chief of the office of the Chancellor Count Strogonoff at Odessa.

He was successively Consul-General at Alexandria, at Teheran, at Berne, and at Stockholm. In 1873, he was called from the Swedish capital to the post of Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs. He succeeded the distinguished diplomatist M. de Westmann.

The spirited attitude and skilful diplomacy of the British Conservative Ministry, did not allow Russia to reap all the advantages she expected from the Russo-Turkish War. Her patriots lament that she was represented at the Berlin Congress by Prince Gortschakoff, who, instead of being useful in defending the results of the war against the demands of England and Austria, proved rather an obstacle and hinderance. It was lucky for M. de Giers that he was not responsible for what was done in the Berlin Congress; yet it fell to his lot to carry on the hard and ungrateful task of settling the laborious negotiations of detail which followed. On his return, the Prince again went abroad, and M. de Giers became the real minister from that time.

From 1878 to 1880, M. de Giers accompanied the Emperor Alexander II in the Crimea and gained the confidence of not the Emperor only but of the whole court. It was thus that, after the criminal assassination of the liberal Czar, he was retained in his post by the new Emperor.

M. de Giers has seen the accomplishment of the two important events under his ministry, vis., the delimitation of the Afghan frontier and the restitution of Kouldja to China.

The incidents connected with the settlement of the Afghan boundaries, threatened at one time a rupture between England and Russia, and the danger was averted, as it is believed in the continent of Europe, by the firmness of Russia in maintaining on the diplomatic ground the position she occupied from the opening of the negotiations. In 1874, the Russians occupied Kouldja, then abandoned to discord and anarchy, and returned it to the Chinese when they were able to establish a regular Government there.

M. de Giers is an indefatigable worker, and appreciates that quality in his assistants. He is simple and modest in his manner of living, in his tastes and even in his intrigues. In all the towns where he was accredited, he left the best memories. Under a reserved appearance, he conceals a kind and warm heart. He is an honest man and is passionately devoted to his country.

THE WIFE-MURDER IN TALTOLA.

AFTER four days' enquiry, the trial in the sessions of Jonah Hall Farland, for murder of his wife, Elen Maud, closed on Thursday, last week. In opening the case on behalf of the Crown, on Monday, the Standing Counsel said that the case was a simple one and that any difficulty the Jury might have would be such as would arise from the defence which might be taken, and that much would be made by the defence of the jealousy of the husband with regard to the relations between the wife who lived separate and a fellow lodger of hers, one Hippolite. But that jealousy, even if well founded, could in no way justify the murder.

Mr. Morrison defended the prisoner. His plea was temporary insanity and grave provocation. He specially laid stress on the adultery of the wife in justification of his client's crime. In his address he asked the Jury

"to consider very carefully what they thought was the state of mind of the prisoner at the time he committed this offence. Supposing there was no medical evidence, supposing he had been unable to show them that he had been suffering from any mental disease, or from any injury to the head, or sunstroke, they would then have to consider whether the man had any provocation, and that such provocation was both grave and sudden. The law had always admitted that adultery was grave and sudden provocation—adultery in flagrante delicto, of course. A blow would very often excuse a murder and bring it within culpable homicide. There was nothing in the Penal Code which said that a husband finding his wife in flagrante delicto should be justified in killing her; but if the act was caused by a blow or a slap, with aggravating words, this would excuse murder. It depended upon the amount of aggravation. It was entirely for the jury to consider whether circumstantial proof of adultery would aggravate a man as much as a slap in the face or anything of the kind. The prisoner was a man of advanced years; and all the witnesses had spoken of him as a kind and quiet man, and that he was fond of his wife. He himself in his confession says that he liked his wife, and the whole tenor of that confession was affection towards her. He said: 'While I did do the act I tried to shoot myself, but I did not know what I was about, as I was perfectly mad.' The jury would have to say whether the man had provocation sufficient to deprive him of the power of self-control. Apart from any question of medical illness, was that provocation sufficient to deprive him of the power of self-control?"

In his reply, Mr. Pugh thus disposed of the adultery contention:—

"That it would be impossible to accept the doctrine that where a man came to know that his wife was living in adultery with another man, it would not be murder if he was to go up at any subsequent time and kill the man. The section showed the impossibility of accepting any such doctrine. It would render society impossible in Calcutta, and a great many lives would be lost if that was the law. The circumstances were different if the parties were caught flagrante delicto. The matter did not end there, as it was said there was grave and sudden provocation, and the crime was reduced from murder to the lesser offence. It did not appear the prisoner saw anything but Hippolite's furniture."

We give below the Judge's charge to the Jury. It will show how Mr. Justice Wilson viewed the whole case and how he expounded the several sections of the Penal Code bearing on it.

"He said the prisoner was charged with the murder of his wife by shooting her on the 1st of October. He need not go into any elaborate definition of murder, as it was always murder if a man took the life of another by an act done with the intention of taking life. That the prisoner killed this woman by shooting her twice with a revolver could hardly be disputed. Presumably if a man shot his wife with the intention of killing her it was murder. About that there could be no dispute. But the real test in the case was whether the case fell within one or the other of the exceptions which the law introduced. The first was when a person was so completely incapacitated by mental defect from knowing that what he had done was wrong. In this case he was excused on the ground of his mental defect from the penal consequences of what otherwise would be his crime. The second exception which had been relied upon in this case, provided that if a man acting under grave and sudden provocation which deprived him of self-control, took life, that would be no excuse for his crime, but it would reduce its character from murder to the less grave offence of culpable homicide. His Lordship then proceeded to read and deal with the evidence. He dealt first with the witnesses who saw the deed; second, with the group of witnesses who spoke to previous events as bearing upon motive and intention; third, with the arrest of the prisoner and what transpired immediately; fourth, with the witnesses for the defence; and lastly, with the very important statement made by the prisoner, and the medical evidence in detail. His Lordship then charged the Jury, and told them that if the story told by the witnesses for the prosecution and by the prisoner in his own statement was true, they could have little hesitation in coming to the conclusion that he must have shot his wife with the intention of taking her life. He then dealt with the elements which made up the charge and with the two exceptions. One thing was clear—the law laid upon the prosecution the burden of establishing the elements of the offence. When the prosecution had done that, and if the prisoner was to escape punishment or secure a mitigation by reason of the case falling within the exceptions, the burden then lay upon the other side, and it was for the prisoner to prove that he came within them. If they were asked to acquit him upon the ground of insanity, it lay upon him to prove that he was insane, not by guess, but proof. If the circumstances of the case were such as to reduce the nature and gravity of the crime from murder to culpable homicide by grave and sudden provocation, it lay on the accused to prove grave and sudden provocation. Again this must be no mere surmise or speculation, but it must be proved. There was no evidence of unsoundness of mind, and no one had been called to prove insanity. The second point was whether there was grave and sudden provocation. If this was established, it would only reduce the crime to culpable homicide, and it lay on the prisoner to establish this exception. The elements in this event were these: that the offender was deprived of his self-control; that he really and completely lost self-control by provocation which was both grave and sudden. No continued provocation would do. The provocation must be sudden as well as grave, and it must have come from the person whose life was taken. This could not be in the present case, unless the prisoner could show that he had lost self-control by grave and sudden provocation coming from the deceased woman. Then as to the question of provocation. The prisoner knew the woman was living in adultery for a long time previously, but the mere knowledge that a man knew his wife was living in adultery was not such as would reduce an act of this kind from murder to culpable homicide. This had never been held in any court. It was for the Jury to come to conclusions on all these points on the evidence which was before them."

The Jury, a special set composed of seven Christians and two Hindus, after a deliberation of ten minutes, returned a verdict of "guilty, with a strong recommendation to mercy."

The Judge then sentenced the prisoner thus:—

"Jonah Hall Farlam: You have been convicted of murder by the unanimous verdict of the Jury, and I do not think they could have come to any other conclusion than that to which they have arrived. They have at the same time strongly recommended you to mercy, and I am very thankful to think that there are circumstances in the case which are palliating, and which justify me in giving effect to that recommendation. A judge is always bound to give effect to any recommendation which may fall from a Jury if he can possibly do so, and I feel justified, therefore, in not passing upon you the extreme sentence of the law, but passing the lesser sentence, though a heavy one, of penal servitude for life."

MONGHYR.

Jamulpore, 7th January, 1892.

We are now in the enjoyment of the happy New Year.

Merry Christmas as usual was celebrated with some enthusiasm. There were sports in the maidan on the 28th and 30th ultimo, such as foot race, hurdle race, &c. Prizes in money were awarded to successful players (both European and native lads) on the spot. The District Magistrate, the Commissioner of the Bhagulpore Division, and the elite of this station, I mean amongst the Sahab logues, were present. Our Railway magnates, such as the Loco. Superintendent, the District Loco. Superintendent, the Assistant Loco. Superintendent, the Assistant Auditor, the Inspector and Adjutant of the local Volunteer Corps, were of course on the spot, indeed Stewards. The Station Band was in attendance and a Fancy Dress Ball in connection therewith was given in the Mechanics' Institute on the 31st December.

A suspicious death of a Bengalee woman of ill fame occurred in the Jamulpore Market, towards the end of December. I understand that a post mortem was held in the Monghyr Hospital by the Civil Surgeon and the contents of the stomach of the deceased sent to the Medical College, Calcutta, for chemical analysis.

Another fatal occurrence took place a few days back in this station a few yards from the Railway station platform. As a Down Passenger train was coming to the station, an unfortunate Beharee was run over and killed. It has not yet transpired whether the man was run over accidentally, or whether he committed suicide by throwing himself in the way of the train.

Pundit Sashadhar Turkochooramony, of Lower Bengal, was here among us a few days ago and delivered an address in Bengalee before the native public in the local Hari Sava Hall on Aryan Religion. He defined Hindooism and Brahmoism as idol worship and monotheism or monism respectively. He endeavoured to show, reciting texts from the Sastras to that effect, the intimate connection between the two, how the Veda pays adoration to the elements and specially enjoins the worship of the Fire-god. It was an interesting and instructive address. In particular, the Pandit's chanting of the Vedic mantras had a most impressive effect.

An upcountry Baisnab, carrying a Saligram—the Hindu deity in stone—with religious paraphernalia and grand equipage, accompanied by a number of followers, is here. His mission, I am told, is great. He purposes to hold a grand religious festival or Yagna somewhere in Upper India, not with hundreds or thousands but with hundreds of thousands of Hindoos, by subscription among Hindu Princes and nobles and landlords and merchants and other well-to-do members of the Hindoo community at large. This divine stone-bearer is of course highly regarded by the orthodox Hindoos, mostly upcountry and Behari, who credit him with the possession of some extraordinary power. He is reckoned Yoga Sidha. Of the practice of Yoga, he is supposed to be proficient in nine kinds, while withal he owns a pair of long arms falling down to his knees.

The prices of food grains have considerably risen and shew a tendency to farther rise. Rice, the staple food, (best quality) can be had 9½ to 9¾ seers for the Rupee and ordinary, 10 seers for the Rupee. With this state of things, people cannot but surmise that famine is at hand.

AGRICULTURAL INDEBTEDNESS IN THE PUNJAB.

11. I think Section 21 goes too far, but that a section should take its place in our Act declaring that the Court, except for special reasons to be recorded, shall hold the agricultural judgment-debtor's unwillingness to sell or otherwise transfer or encumber ancestral agricultural land or land which he cultivates himself sufficient cause for inability to pay within the meaning of Section 337 A. of Civil Procedure Code.

The powers of the Rules of 1858-59 which are still in force under Section 327 of the Civil Procedure Code in virtue of our notification, Judicial, No. 1297 S. of 10th September 1885, prohibiting sale of land in execution of decree for money without the sanction of the highest Judicial, afterwards changed to highest Revenue, authority, never contemplated that the Civil Courts, though unable without such authority to sell the land, would be able to imprison a man for not agreeing to sell by private contract. It is only lately that a few Civil Courts have held themselves empowered without applying for Commissioner or Financial Commissioner's leave to sell land to imprison a man on the ground that he could if he liked satisfy a decree by himself selling or mortgaging it; and if this view of the law, which is technically correct, becomes generally known and acted upon, creditors will commonly apply for imprisonment as a means of compulsion, knowing the difficulty of getting sanction to sale of ancestral land under Punjab rules.

12. I think Section 22, first clause, should be embodied in our Act, and take the place of our notification of September 1885, which with preceding rules on which it was based has had equivalent effect. But the last three lines of the section will have to be altered (if we leave out the Insolvency Chapter as I propose) by adding the necessary provisions of Sections 29 and 31 to the section, or as a separate section to be referred to. I think also that the words "not mortgaged or hypothecated as security for any other debt" should be added after the words "to the possession of which he is entitled."

But I think our section might be confined to ancestral land and houses and other buildings belonging to and occupied by the agriculturist debtor which would exclude acquired land and buildings and standing crops.

It may be strongly urged as to this section that it will be no new law in the Punjab as it was in Bombay or would be elsewhere; that in 1858-59 the Punjab Government saw applications to sell up lands of debtors in execution of decree were commencing and that money-lenders were beginning to recognize the value of land and to lend money to agriculturists with the express object of involving them and then getting hold of the land through our Courts; that seeing the unfairness of this to ignorant and improvident peasant proprietors and the political danger as shown in the Mutiny in the North-Western Provinces, they framed the Rules of 1858-59. The Punjab Government explained that it did not propose to abolish sale altogether because the knowledge that as a last resort it may be put in force will make land-holders careful. The Governor-General in sanctioning the rules suggested that where decrees could not be executed by other means, and sale of land is therefore proposed, it might be leased instead of sold and proceeds applied to gradual liquidation of debt. This suggestion was not, however, acted on, and practically land was neither leased nor sold, and even standing crops were very rarely attached and sold. These rules have ever since made applications to sell land few, and all authorities, judicial and Revenue, have discouraged such applications, which have been hardly ever granted as regards ancestral land and often refused as to acquired. The consequence was that till very lately the execution of decrees against agriculturists was practically confined (in the absence of mortgages with conditions of foreclosure or sale) to execution against moveable property or the person of the debtor. An active and persevering decree-holder could often bring pressure in these ways on an agriculturist debtor so as to drive him into selling or mortgaging part of his land by private contract; but as the Courts of execution were not disposed to press agriculturist debtors too hard, this did not generally succeed. Recent amendments of the Civil Procedure Code, exempting moveable necessities, have made this method of compulsion more difficult to decree-holders; but, on the other hand, by attaching land and without getting sanction to its sale moving the Collector to either get sanction to its sale or to take action under Section 326, the Civil Courts have lately begun to increase the temporary transfer of land in execution of decrees, and many of these transfers are equivalent to permanent transfers. We have been afraid in the Punjab to notify under Section 320, seeing that it would inevitably lead to far greater transfers of land in execution of decree than have hitherto been allowed. Sections 320 to 326 of the Civil Procedure Code which were introduced to moderate the free power of selling land by Civil Courts in other Provinces of India have had, or would have, quite the opposite effect in the Punjab so far as applied, which is a curious but not uncommon instance of the effect of enacting elaborate Acts for all India.

13. Chapter IV—Insolvency.—This Chapter has I believe proved inoperative in the Dekkhan, and in the Punjab where sale of agriculturists' ancestral property in execution of decree has hitherto been practically prohibited, and where the Insolvency provisions of the Punjab Laws Acts and of the Civil Procedure Code (except quite lately in the case of the latter Act and then in a very few cases) have not hitherto been applied to agriculturists, I think such a Chapter would do more harm than good.

In place of this Chapter I would have a Chapter with sections declaring that no agriculturist judgment-debtor shall be declared insolvent under Chapter XX of the Civil Procedure Code except on his own application to be declared insolvent under that Chapter; and that if the Chapter is applied at his request the Court in determining under Section 352 of the said Code, the amount of any claim of the nature referred to in Section 12 of this Act (the Punjab Agriculturist Relief Act) due by an insolvent agriculturist shall proceed in the manner prescribed by Sections 12 to 15 of this Act, both inclusive. Other sections should refer to the Insolvency provisions of the Punjab Laws Act, and should declare (1) that proceedings under them against agriculturist debtors shall be held in the Courts of Revenue Officers only; (2) that such Courts in inquiring into the amount of any claim against an agriculturist debtor of the nature referred to in Section 12 of this (Punjab Agriculturist Relief Act) Act shall proceed in the manner prescribed by Sections 12 to 15 of this Act, both inclusive; (3) that the Court may refuse to sell any or all of the agriculturist insolvent's ancestral land or buildings, and may instead thereof after excluding land and buildings required in his opinion for the support of the agriculturist and the members of his family dependent on him manage the rest for the benefit of the creditors by letting them on lease or making them over to the creditors on usufructuary mortgage for terms not exceeding 20 years; on the expiry of such terms of lease or mortgage the liability of the said lands or buildings or their rents or produce for the balance of the debt if any to be extinguished; (4) as in Section 31, Dekkhan Agriculturist Relief Act.

The history of the Insolvency law in the Punjab is curious, and requires to be borne in mind with reference to the above proposals. Till the Punjab Laws Act of 1872 was passed it was an open question whether the old Punjab Civil Code of 1854 had not full legal force, and as a matter of fact the local Courts treated it as having such force. That Code contained Bankruptcy provisions, but I believe they were intended to apply to commercial insolvents only: at any rate I know that they were generally so understood, and I believe they were in no single case applied to indebted agriculturists.

The Insolvency provisions of the Punjab Laws Act of 1872 were adapted with little alteration from the Bankruptcy provisions of the old Punjab Civil Code. Under this Act the only Courts invested with Insolvency jurisdiction in 1872 were the Small Cause Courts at the large towns of Lahore, Delhi and Amritsar, and this was only for the purpose of dealing with commercial insolvents, as these Courts did not hear suits for debt against agriculturists. It had been held by the Punjab Government that the Small Cause Court procedure was not fitted to do justice in such suits, and after a short trial most of the Small Cause Courts first established had been abolished. No Courts have subsequently been invested with Insolvency jurisdiction under the Punjab Laws Act, but in 1877 an Insolvency Chapter appeared in the Civil Procedure Code of that year, and under it the Courts of all Deputy Commissioners (which by the Punjab Courts Act of that time were the District Courts) acquired a certain Insolvency jurisdiction, but this Chapter only allowed judgment-debtors to be made insolvent on their own application, and it may be safely assumed that if any judgment-debtors ever did apply in the Deputy Commissioner's Court under this Chapter they were not agriculturists. No Punjab agriculturists, protected as they were and are by special rule against sale of land in execution of decree, would have so applied.

The provisions of the present Insolvency Chapter of the Civil Procedure Code, which allow the holder of a decree for money to apply to have his judgment-debtor declared insolvent with or without the consent of the latter, first appeared in the Act of 1882, and this most important change seems never to have been submitted to Local Governments for opinion. Again, two years later, in connection with the Punjab Reorganization Scheme, the Punjab Courts Act, XVIII of 1884, was passed, and by this the Court of the District Judge became the District Court, having Insolvency Jurisdiction under the Civil Procedure Code. By this a great change was inadvertently made, for in most Punjab districts the officer holding the appointment of District Judge is a Native or European gentleman of the Extra Assistant Commissioner class. In a few cases he is either the Deputy Commissioner or a Junior Civilian. In other Provinces the District Court is the Court of the District and Sessions Judge, who is a Civilian of high rank and standing.

But in spite of this change down to the last two or three years the Insolvency provisions of the Act of 1882 seem to have been as inoperative against agriculturists as those of the Act of 1877. It was no doubt generally thought that as the Civil Courts could not sell land in execution of decree without sanction of the Commissioner or Financial Commissioner, they could not be meant to have the power in Insolvency proceedings without the consent of the judgment-debtor. In the last two or three years, however, some lawyers have perceived in the Insolvency provisions of the Civil Procedure Code a way to get round the special rules prohibiting sale of ancestral land in execution of decree, and some District Judges have sold such land under those provisions, as will be seen from the remarks of Rái Būta Mal, Extra Judicial Assistant, printed in the Appendices to the Civil Justice Report of 1889, a copy of which is given below. These cases have, however, it is believed, been very few as yet.

"Under the existing law, no property in land paying revenue to Government or applied to agricultural or pastoral purposes can be sold in execution of decrees, except with the sanction of the Commissioner, and, if it is hereditary or joint acquired property, of the Financial Commissioner. Such sanction is accorded only in clear and exceptional cases, and if the letting value of the land is not sufficient and the Collector does not think fit to intervene, the decree, in the absence of other property which is generally difficult to find or indicate, remains unsatisfied. In the perplexity of checks provided by law, one way of compelling the sale of landed property, independently of execution proceedings, has been discovered. Thwarted by refusal of sanction by proper authority, the judgment-creditor applies, under Section 344 of the Civil Procedure Code, for the judgment-debtor to be declared an insolvent. The latter is so declared as if he had himself wished it, and all his property, moveable and immoveable, is vested in the receiver appointed under Section 351. The proviso of Section 356 requires that in any local area in which a declaration has been made under Section 320 and is in force, no sale of immoveable property paying revenue to Government, or held or let for agricultural purposes, shall be made by the receiver. But as no such declaration has been published in the Punjab, that officer, unfettered by any restriction, proceeds to sell land as well as other property, and the object of the law in placing restrictions on the sale of landed property in execution of decrees is frustrated. I mention this to draw attention to the anomalous state of the existing law under which a decree-holder baffled in execution may succeed in insolvency proceedings."

14. Chapter V.—Though the Village Munsiff system under this Act is said not to have been generally effective in the Dekkhan of Bombay, a similar system has worked well in Madras, and might, I believe, work well in many parts of the Punjab. I think a Chapter founded on this Chapter and on the Madras Act should be embodied in our Act, leaving much to be settled by rules made by the Local Government. The experiment could be then tried. I have consulted many meetings of agriculturists in my tours in the last three years, and they are in favour of it, and so are many of the best Native officials. Many of the best opinions now collected are also strongly in favour of it. It may be added that on general grounds of policy it is very important to try to help the people to govern themselves instead of carrying on the whole administration through stipendiary officials. If the experiment succeeds as regards petty civil justice it will soon be extended to petty criminal justice and other matters.

15. Chapter VI.—Conciliators.—The same remarks apply to this Chapter. I think the power may very usefully be taken and the experiment tried in selected tracts.

Chapter VII.—Supervision and Revision.—A Chapter of this kind would be required, and I do not think the work would be heavy, not at any rate if the Insolvency Chapter is left out, and until Village Munsiffs and Conciliators are generally appointed. But the District Judge in Bombay is, I understand, equivalent to our Divisional Judge. I think our Divisional Judges would have to do the work. They would not have time by present arrangements, but if my scheme for amalgamating the Divisional Judge and District Judge sanctioned appointments, thereby increasing the number of Divisional Judges and creating a certain number of Assistant Divisional Judges appointments, were to be carried out, the necessary machinery would, I think, be obtained without extra cost, and without injury to the Judicial administration. A short description of that scheme is appended to this note.

Chapter VIII.—Village Registrars.—This supposes that the Village Registrar will write the deeds or have them written under his skilled superintendence. I don't think we could supply the machinery, or that it is necessary to compel the registration of all instruments executed by agriculturists of which registration is now optional.

The modification I propose above of Section 13 will give a great impulse to optional registration, and that section by allowing Courts to go behind unregistered bonds and deeds and take account will make the necessity of registration to prevent injustice to ignorant men less in their case.

I think this Chapter may be left out in our Act. We are doing our best under the Registration Act to increase the number of non-official Registrars.

Chapter VIII A.—I think this Chapter will be a useful protection to our agriculturists, and should be repeated in our Act, sections being added giving the procedure detailed in Sections 57 and 59 of the preceding Chapter which it is proposed to omit.

Chapter IX.—This would do no harm even if it proved mainly inoperative, and so I would add a similar Chapter to our Act.

16. Chapter X.—Legal Practitioners.—Section 68 should be repeated in our Act. In place of Section 69 I would have a section prohibiting the appearance of Pleaders, Vakils, or Mukhtars in any suit or proceeding under the Act to which an agriculturist is a party below Rs. 100 in value before a Subordinate Judge or Munsiff, and prohibiting their fees being made costs in suit in any such suits or proceedings of larger value under the Act in Munsiffs' Courts. At present some money-lenders regularly employ certain Pleaders in certain Munsiffs' Courts to act as their debt-collectors; and if the money-lenders appear by Pleaders the agriculturist usually feels bound to do the same, and if he does not he is at a great disadvantage in most Munsiffs' Courts. It seems fair therefore that the appearance of Pleaders in Munsiffs' Courts should be discouraged by making those who employ them pay for them. This is in accordance with the opinions of the great majority of the best officers consulted. The provisions of the old Punjab Civil Code did not allow Pleaders or Vakils to practise in the Courts. There was no Pleaders or Vakils Act till 1866.

17. Chapter XI.—Miscellaneous.—Section 70. I am not sure that this section is required in the Punjab, though I believe that in late years verbal contracts with possession recognized by mutation of names in the Land Revenue Records tend to increase. Our Courts are not so likely to do injustice in such cases as in suits on written contracts. Whether the section should appear in our Bill requires more consideration.

Section 72.—Limitation.—The majority of officers consulted and of the men to whose opinion I attach most weight are in favour of adopting this section, but there are also good men against it. Some of the arguments relied on by these officers are, however, met by the proposals to fix a maximum amount of interest recoverable through the Courts, to go behind bonds and balances struck and take account of principal and interest, and to refuse to carry out strictly the conditions as to sale or foreclosure of deeds of mortgage. The history of this matter in the Punjab is as follows: In 1856 the Chief Commissioner proposed to reduce the period in actions for debt on bonds or accounts, not being partnership accounts, from the then term of 12 years to 6 years. This was sanctioned by the Government of India. Two years later the Chief Commissioner proposed to leave 6 years as the period on registered bonds, partnership accounts, &c., and to make 3 years the period for other cases relating to debt on accounts, disputes between master and servant, maintenance, claims to hereditary fees, &c., &c. This was sanctioned in 1859. At that time I was an Assistant Commissioner in the Punjab and much of my time was spent in hearing suits between sahukars or bankers and peasant proprietors. I remember that both classes complained strongly that the three years' period was too short for their dealings and dislocated their old business relations, and many officers at that time thought the objection a sound one. The classes concerned are still strongly of the same opinion and the agriculturists in particular attribute much of their indebtedness to the short period of limitation, asserting not only that the frequent writing of bonds for the balances turns interest into principal more rapidly than before, and involves their getting less "chor" or remission of interest than they used to do, but also that the expenses of getting these bonds written, witnessed, stamped, and sometimes registered, are very heavy, and that finally they are run into Court unnecessarily often and quickly either as a means of registering and securing the debt or of forcing them to sell or mortgage their land. I am convinced that this complaint is true, and I attach little weight to the arguments of those officers who argue that the law ought not to have these effects, that by acknowledgments in writing or part payment of principal or interest new periods of limitation can be obtained, and that the interest which capitalists demand and take depends simply on market rates and the security. These arguments belong to an atmosphere higher and dryer than that in which these village bankers or money-lenders and these illiterate peasant proprietors carry on their dealings, without legal assistance or with legal assistance which is unreliable. The practice of demanding and agreeing to pay much more interest than you expect to get or intend to pay is ingrained among them, but when the lender has got his stamped bond or has launched his suit in Court he is disposed to hold to the letter in the matter. So again the ordinary money-lender's ignorance of all but the broadest points of the law, and knowledge of the suspicion of fraud, perjury and forgery which pervades the Courts, induce him to be with good reason very shy of any but the simplest methods of securing himself against his claims being barred by limitation. Hence frequent bonds and frequent suits in Court with the result that the amount our Government takes out of the peasant proprietors' pocket in the shape of stamp duties of kinds is very formidable, and to a large extent depreciates the lightness of our land revenue assessments. It must be remembered that almost everywhere in the world where peasant proprietorship prevails, dealings with some kind of banker are a general necessity of the peasant's business.

For these reasons I am strongly of opinion that Section 72 should appear in our Bill, and that the period of limitation in all suits of the description mentioned in Section 3, clause (w), should be six years, but whether the distinction made in clause (a) of Section 72 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists Relief Act should be repeated is I think open to much doubt. If it is intended to encourage registration, that is I think sufficiently secured by the proviso I propose to add to Section 12. In any case I think that 12 years is a dangerously long period of limitation for suits on registered bonds, looking to the fact that fraudulent personation before Registrars is always not improbable in India, and that ignorant debtors will continue to pay without receipts or will lose receipts if they take them. If, therefore, a special term is allowed for registered instruments, which I do not myself advocate, I would reduce it to 9 years.

18. Section 73 should, I think, be repeated in our Bill, and also 73A., with the necessary verbal alterations in references to sections. Sections 74, 75 and 76 seem also necessary and suitable.

I think we should also have in this Chapter a section declaring that from a certain date properly kept Day Books and Ledgers shall be deemed necessary to make books of account "regularly kept in course of business" within the meaning of the Evidence Act in dealings between bankers or professional money-lenders and agriculturists. This was proposed by the Chief Commissioner of the Punjab as a rule of law in 1858 and sanctioned by the Governor-General in 1859, but as it was not preserved by the Punjab Laws Act of 1872, it is obsolete. Some of the reasons given above in my note to Section 15 apply to this question, and the proposal is put forward by many officers in their opinions. I also think that, as suggested in Mr. Clifford's opinion, there should be a section declaring that balances struck in a banker or money-lender's account book and signed by the debtor and witnesses do not require to be stamped as bonds or promissory notes. This is the old and natural way of keeping accounts between agriculturists and their bankers, and it should not be hampered by the demand for stamps; and as by the proposed law the Courts will be able to go behind such balances and take account of interest and principal there will be no danger.

19. I would also have a section repealing as against agriculturists the words in Section 256, Civil Procedure Code, which allow immediate execution by warrant against the person of the judgment-debtor. The power is not necessary, as agricultural judgment-debtors do not abscond, and the power is only used to harass them.

I would also have a section giving the Local Government power to order the exemption of agriculturists from attendance in the Civil Courts subordinate to that of the Divisional Judge for one month during the rabi harvest. Such exemption not to interfere with proceedings for attachment of property in execution.

I would also have a section empowering the Local Government to remit (1) in any district or part of a district for which Conciliators have not been appointed half the institution fees in all cases under the Act in which the parties come to an agreement at the first hearing; (2) to remit in any or all districts institution fees on suits for redemption of lands mortgaged brought by agriculturists.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ELETA GRAY.

BY J. G. HOLLAND.

How oft amid life's phantom chase,
Some angel memory takes the hand,
And softened by her calm embrace,
In passive thoughtfulness we stand.
How fades before her startling tone
The dream of pride, the lust of fame;
How every thought and passion own
Her power in one low spoken name.

Dear Fleta Gray! the magic sound
Hath banished years of toil and pain,
And in love's youthful rapture bound,
I gaze upon your charms again.
The deep blue eye, the sunny smile,
The open brow, the girlish grace—
I see them all as when erewhile
Their praise illumed your gentle face.

The same fair earth is bright below,
The same pure heaven bends above,
The same sweet streams in music flow,
Bathed in the light of early love.
I stand within a world of bliss,
By sinless passion made divine,
And all its golden beauty is
Your own, dear Fleta Gray, and mine.

Intrusive feet ne'er enter here,
Its loveliness no eye may see,
Alike secure from foe, or fear,
It opes to none but you and me.
Then, seated on this bank of flowers,
Your head upon my shoulder laid,
We'll gaze upon this world of ours,
By Love's young hand so sweetly made.

'T is not the river, nor the hill,
'T is not the meadow, broad and green,
Nor mountain wild, nor leaping rill,
That fills for us the radiant scene.
These are the features of our love—
The mould in which our souls were cast
When, like the sunlight from above,
They filled, as on the scene they passed.

A world within a world is this :—
Though fashioned to the forms of earth,
And blent with earthly things, it is
Of love, the spiritual birth.
That river was our silent dream,
Yon mountain our aspiring thought,

Our wilder moods the flashing stream,
Our milder, this secluded spot.

Of Love's young dream the picture these,
And though we wander far apart,
The hand of some unconscious breeze
Will raise the curtains of my heart;
And I can sit and gaze as now,
On all its loveliness and bliss,
And tremble while upon your brow
I print Affection's holy kiss.

A few eventful years were passed,
And by unbroken absence changed,
Our love grew fainter, till at last
Our fading hearts became estranged.
In burning hopes and wilder schemes
I lost my heart's unsullied truth,
The simple purity of youth.

We vowed fidelity till death;
But when those fatal years were gone,
You questioned not my broken faith,
Nor did I claim what I had won.
Yet did we feel our plighted word
Redeemed, for truly both had died:
The girl, in woman's heart interred,
The boy, in manhood's colder pride.

And though these changes are unwept,
And we as strangers now should meet,
In changeless truth our dream has slept,
Secure in Memory's retreat.
And when disgusted with the strife
Of worldly lust and selfish art,
We can return to fresher life
In this blest garden of the heart.

What though in troth we both are bound
To other hearts and other hands,
We'll gather from this hallowed ground
Bright flowers to deck the sacred bands.
And on your bosom you shall wear
Their beauty, though another's bride,
And I will braid them in the hair
Of her, whose path is at my side.

What though the train of noontide hours
Are circling round us bright and calm,
We'll wreath their brows with morning flowers
Still fragrant in their early balm.
And when retiring day departs,
And shuts the portals of the west,
We'll bind them to our weary hearts,
And in their perfume sink to rest.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

WITH the concurrence of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, the Secretary of State for India has fixed the rate of exchange for the adjustment of financial transactions between the British and Indian Governments for the year 1892-93 at one shilling and four pence three farthings (1s. 4¾d.) the rupee.

THE Bengal Famine Code revised up to date, is published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 20th January as the revised edition of January 1892.

The full ration prescribed as sufficient to maintain able-bodied labourers in health and strength, is for a man,—flour of the common grain used in the country or cleaned rice 1lb. 8 oz.; pulse 4 oz.; salt ½ oz.; ghee or oil 1 oz.; condiments and vegetables 1 oz. For a woman, it is the same excepting 4 oz. less of flour or rice. For children, ¾, ½ and ¼ rations according to age and requirements.

A RECENT telegram in the Times from St. Petersburg gives a formidable list of the Russian Navy. The statement claims for the Czar 36 vessels of the first, 48 of the second, 88 of the third, and 20 of the fourth class—a surprising number. Such an armament of one of the greatest land Powers is enough to send a chill into the souls of the other Powers. Luckily, the list is too wild for credence and is devoid of specificity or other marks of authenticity. Mere numerical classification is nothing, unless you know what absolute quality is implied by each number. The discredit is accentuated by the Army & Navy Gazette, (from which we gather the news,) pointing out that

"Brassey gives Russia 48 armoured vessels, many of them dating back nearly 30 years, and 62 unarmoured vessels of and above 300 tons displacement. This gives a total of 110 ships, while the telegram makes a total of 212; the discrepancy, therefore, is not easy of explanation."

That totalling is an arithmetical error. The figure should be 192 instead of 212. Still the discrepancy is great.

THE Army and Navy Gazette, conducted by the veteran publicist Dr. W. H. Russell, has been evidently alarmed at the tone of insolence indulged in by so many British journals towards the Emperor of Germany. It thus gravely expostulates with the wits and politicians of the press:—

"The 'funny' gentlemen who delight in tickling Emperor William's ribs with their steel pens no doubt amuse themselves and some of their readers, and do not hurt their butt, who may, indeed, be ignorant of their attentions. But is it in very good taste? Our is it politic to indulge in the sport? This Kaiser is an earnest—a terribly earnest—young man! He is full of energy, life, and purpose. He is at the head of the greatest Military Empire in the world, and he rules almost absolutely the great German nation, which sees in him the incarnation of its Imperial Power. England and Germany meet in friendly rivalry in many parts of the world; and great as is our Fleet, our wealth, and our commerce, a change might be produced in the feelings of Germany towards this country by insults offered to, and by ridicule of, their Kaiser, much to be deprecated."

The editor of the Army and Navy Gazette has exceptional sources of information, having intimate friends in every European Court. He would not deliberately raise the voice of warning without occasion.

THE same paper writes on the 26th December last:—

"There is a spirit of unrest abroad in the Colonies. Somehow the action of the Colonial Office does not seem to please people in St. Vincent, Gibraltar, Newfoundland, Natal, &c. The relations of the Dominion and Newfoundland are very much strained, and in the Dominion itself there is an angry controversy between Ottawa and Quebec with which Downing Street has no active part. We believe it will be found that, among those best conversant with the questions he has had to settle, there is a general adhesion to Lord Knutsford's course of action. Nevertheless, this year now drawing to a close leaves an unusual number of troublesome questions to be disposed of, in addition to the Imperial difficulties with which not even Federation could deal, if that beau rêve were to be realised in 1892."

THE British are an eminently promising, docile people. The latest triumph of British intelligence is the discovery that no good is served by destroying smuggled tobacco. Just now in England contraband tobacco seized by preventive officers is burned and destroyed. This not in rage by any short-tempered god of the Customs department long tried by smuggling ingenuity and agility, but as a matter of course in the ordinary way of business, at every port in the kingdom, on every occasion, without distinction of officers or other parties. Not an atom is even allowed to be smoked in triumph by the successful captor. Not a pound, it may be taken for granted, is presented to the neighbouring Padre that he may smoke and bless the Government and be above an eye to smugglers' tithes. Such is the Dustoor. Such is the Law too. British wisdom knew no better disposal for smuggled tobacco fallen into the hands of the State than useless consumption into ashes. Happily, the British are not piggishly stubborn in their conceit. They are not fixedly wedded to their ways without the possibility of divorce. Their elders and wise men have found out that it is no good to waste good "backee," so the word has been passed, and now every body will quickly recognise what a fool the nation has been making of itself. Henceforth, only bad or injurious tobacco will be destroyed at the place of seizure as soon as practicable, but all sound confiscated leaf shall be sent to Her Majesty's warehouse-keeper in London. That officer is authorized to distribute it among the public establishments supported, wholly or in part, by the Crown. Such is the tenour of recent instructions.

Primus in Indis assuredly is Bombay—in open-handed charity and munificence, for one thing. There is no race of man on earth who habitually cultivate the noble art of giving like the Parsees, whose fragrant minority leavens into wholesome harmony and grace the sum total of life at the Western capital. The other sections of the community cannot fail to be influenced by the glorious example. The followers of Vishnu and the followers of Mahammad try to show that they are no unworthy neighbours of their Zoroastrian fellow-subjects. Scarcely a month passes when we have not a substantial act of liberality on the Bombay side to record. To-day, we have to report an act of princely charity by a Hindu merchant. Varjivandas Madhowdas, the gentleman in question, has not only shown his readiness to expend on good works, but has also distinguished himself by the breadth of his views. He has chalked out a new line of charity. Education and religion between them exhaust the possibilities of Indian charity. But this gentleman has neither started a school nor built a dispensary, nor founded a scholarship, nor given a clock to the University, nor opened a temple or a dharmshala. Baboo (as we should say in Bengal) Baboo Brojijivan Madhavadas has done something wholly different—he has erected a Sanatorium—the first Hindu sanatorium in Bombay. The want of such an institution has been long and cruelly felt. From far and near Hindus flock to the capital in search of health, from the sea breeze and the medical aid available, but there is no home to receive them. The same thing is true of Calcutta, though from difference of economic conditions in a less degree. Blessings on the man who has supplied the deficiency in the Western city! Varjivandas Madhowdas has dedicated this charity to the memory of his lost son, calling it the "Rancnoddas Varjivandas Ayuya Bhuwana."

BICARBONATE OF POTASH is said to be an infallible cure for influenza. This recipe occurs in the address of the President of the Border Counties Branch of the British Medical Association. Mr. Crerar gave 30 grains of the bicarbonate in a teacupful of milk every two or three hours, and had not had a case in which the medicine did not kill the disease at the second dose. He had found the action of the heart sometimes weakened, but a simple remedy had sufficed to avert any danger in this quarter. Yet we do not understand how it is that, although the address was delivered in July last, influenza has ever since been counting not a few victims in England. Are the people so stubborn that they prefer to perish under their time-honored treatment to being saved by a new-fangled method?

MR. A. C. Dutt, the Bengali Assistant Collector now in charge of the Madras District of Tinnevely, has already made himself felt. He is not to be imposed upon by any indigenous plausibility or clerical pretensions. He has shaken the whole collectorate into life and propriety. He was of course met by passive resistance, but his judicious firmness has prevailed.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has very properly reappointed our good townsman Mr. J. E. D. Ezra—the Hebrew millionaire who has so much stake in the city—a Municipal Commissioner of Calcutta. Messrs. O. T. Barrow and W. K. Eddis replace on the same board Mr. A. Smith, C.S., and Surgeon-Major R. Cobb, resigned.

But why have the claims of our Hindu millionaire Baboo Jadulal Mullick, a veteran in municipal work, been overlooked?

WE learn that in his annual report, just made public, Commodore George Dewey, Chief of the United States Bureau of Equipment, calls attention to the total solar eclipse to occur April 15, 1893, and recommends that expeditions be sent to Senar, Brazil, and Bathurst, Senegambia, for the purpose of observation.

MR. F. J. Marsden again goes on leave for nine months from the 25th February next. Mr. A. P. Handley, who has established his claim to the post, will, during the period or until further orders, be the acting Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta.

THERE is in the Gazette a declaration under the Land Acquisition Act for 5 plots of land, measuring about 6 bigahs, for the Midnapore Central Jail Cholera Camp. Can the land so acquired be utilized for any other purpose?

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

IT will be remembered that in April last a Court of Inquiry was ordered at Manipur into all the circumstances of the evacuation of the Residency and the British retreat. Colonel Evans, Major Trevers, and Captain Birch formed the Court, which sat long and collected a mass of evidence, all the surviving officers of the escorting Goorkhas contributing their valuable quota.

Obvious considerations suggested this limitation of the investigation. For Colonel Skene, the Commandant of the escort, was detained in the Palace and perished there with the Chief Commissioner and the Political Agent. It were useless to criticise his military conduct or disposition of his men. In Colonel Skene's absence, the command devolved on Captain Boileau who was senior to Captain Butcher. It was these two officers who were on their trial. The proceedings of the Court have not been published, but the evidence recorded was forwarded to the Commander-in-Chief and the Government of India. Upon that evidence, the Viceroy in Council came to a very unfavourable view of these two officers' conduct and recommended their removal from the service. And so their names have been erased from the Army List. The blow has been tempered with mercy, however. These officers are not sent adrift on the world at a late period of life. Captain Boileau, who had served 20 years, has been granted an allowance of £200 per annum, and Captain Butcher, an officer of ten years' service, has received £90 a year.

Strange conviction and sentences! To curse and bless in the same breath! To punish with one hand and to reward with the other! For the grants to these officers are not mere compassionate pittances intended more for the support of blameless wives and children than for the culprits, they are substantial annuities.

THE Indian Spectator's London correspondent notices the prize-distribution to the students of the Crystal Palace Engineering School. Sir Robert Rawlinson, who presided, reminded the large number of aspirants to the profession that they could not possibly all find room for its exercise within the narrow bounds of the British Isles. Many of them must naturally have to travel for employment out of Europe and of Christendom. He gave them a bit of wholesome advice as to their bearing in distant and alien regions:—

"With regard to their conduct as men he commented upon the impropriety of Englishmen calling dark-skinned people 'niggers,' and expressed the hope that none of the students would ever, in India or elsewhere, treat natives of the countries to which they went, so as to cause them to lose their self-respect and to have feelings of envy and hatred towards Englishmen. (Cheers.)"

Others besides young engineers from Great Britain and Ireland would do well to act up to the advice of the "veteran mason and delver." Still we are bound to say that there has been a change for the better in India. "Niggering" the people, we believe, is now reckoned a piece of ill breeding, not to say brutality, of which respectable men are ashamed. The spirit, however, has not so decidedly changed as manners have improved. Many, we are afraid, give vent to their coarseness and vulgarity still under the plausible disguise of the words "native" and "Baboo." We have no objection to the words by themselves; it is the use made of them that makes them good or bad. We have no sympathy with those of our countrymen who are ashamed of calling themselves, or being called, natives or Baboos. But we certainly object to the conversion of the harmless words into terms of abuse. Some Europeans, we regret to observe, seem from their manner of accentuating them to make native and Baboo synonyms of nigger. If they have the moderation to spare the people that last term of reproach, they are not ashamed to speak with undisguised scorn of "those natives," or "pack of Baboos." This is low and contemptible.

DR. W. W. Sheppard, Russian Imperial Staff, writes to the Indian Daily News that "the country of the Sheah Push and Lall Kafirs is declared under Russian protection, in fact Russian territory. British Officers will not be allowed to cross the frontier with an armed corporal's guard." Where is it declared? What is the authority for the doctor's peremptory ukase? And who is this Doctor of the Russian Imperial Staff? He hails from somewhere in Calcutta and has been here these many years. What can be his possible business in Bengal so long? We never heard of this doctor of the Czar's Staff during the visit of the Czarewitch. Is he on the same mission as that of the Yaksha of Kalidasa's "Cloud Messenger" in the Hazaribagh hills? Anyhow, he must be an interesting character, and has, besides, for a representative of Russian interests, the advantage of a pronounceable name. His political instructions seem to be imperfect, though. There is no such thing as "Sheah Push," any more than "Soonnee Bush."

IT is said that between Great Britain and America, 4,00,000 copies of Robert Elsmere have been sold. After such almost unprecedented success, no author in these days could expect to remain in peace and leisurely enjoy his or her triumph. Neither the great publishers nor the editors of the magazines would permit the lucky writer to rest on the laurels won. Pestered with solicitations more or less importunate, besieged with temptations from all sides, the now unfortunate child of fortune is, notens volens, put to harness to work again and try another chance. Thus, Mrs. Humphry Ward has already another novel ready, "The History of David Grieve," which will be issued simultaneously in London by Messrs. Smith Elder, & Co. and in America by Messrs. Macmillan.

IN an article headed "Prodigal Chiefs," the Civil and Military Gazette says:—

"We think that in the interests of more than one youthful ruler and more than one Native State in the Punjab, it is time for the question to be publicly asked:—How long is it allowable for the supreme power to close its eyes to the process of rapid deterioration in the conduct of the Chief and rapid depletion of the treasures of the State owing to extravagance, idle pleasures and bad advisers? * * We do not mean to imply that immediate disaster is impending in any State. Although money may have been pouring out of the State treasuries, more than half of the hoard remains, and Government paper besides. There is the off chance, too, that when the young Chiefs have sown their wild oats, they may settle down. But, bearing in mind the troubles that have befallen other States from time to time, this is not a contingency to be predicted with any certainty. Nor, even if it were, would there be any excuse for acquiescence in the present state of things. It is not only the welfare of the States and Chiefs themselves which is concerned; but the progress of civilization and the reputation of English education among the higher classes in India generally."

These observations apply with equal force to many of our Bengal Zemindars. They are no doubt private citizens who eventually pay for their folly by having their estates heavily encumbered, or by being sold out altogether. But during the time that the process of destruction goes on, and for a considerable period after the completion of their ruin, not only their dependants, but very often their rayyets also are rendered extremely miserable. A Zemindar in a solvent condition can afford so to regulate the pressure of his demand as not to entail any hardship on his rayyets. But one whose estate is already subject to a mortgage is obliged to put the screw on before the due date for payment of Government revenue, without any regard to the state of the rayyets at the time. Sometimes the rayyets are called upon to subscribe to a fund for payment of their Zemindar's debts. In one well known case in which the Zemindar, by leading a life of dissipation in Calcutta, was sold out of his estate within a few years of his attaining majority, the rayyets were led to combine together for restoring him to possession, and for keeping out the purchaser by lawless acts. In their zeal for the effete victim of debauchery who was their landlord, the poor rustics set fire to the cutchery of the purchaser, subjected his men to every kind of maltreatment, and for a time successfully organised a little imperium in imperio. What followed may easily be imagined. The criminal law was set in motion, and order was restored only when the leading men of the estate, including many innocent persons, were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. Such demonstrations of loyalty toward ancient Zemindars are getting rare. But an instance of this kind suffices to show what power for good and evil the Zemindars possess. In the earlier Mahomedan times, and possibly in the times of the Hindu Kings also, the son of a Zemindar was never allowed to succeed to his estate unless he proved himself qualified for the responsibilities of the position. The Permanent Settlement of Zemindaris in Bengal has deprived Government of the power of questioning the right of a lawful heir to a Zemindar to inherit his estate. But, as observed by the Lahore paper, the ruin of the ancient families, though caused by their own fault, brings discredit on the British Raj. The intervention of the paramount Power is certainly not desirable where it is not absolutely necessary. But the policy of non-interference may be productive of quite as much mischief as over interference. In the case of the Zemindars, many of them would be too glad if the Court of Wards be vested with jurisdiction to take them under its protection in extreme cases.

THERE may be more things in poor Bengal than what we, who are natives of the soil, are aware of. In "A Letter from Rome," the correspondent of the Queen says:—

"I have lately become acquainted with a new and interesting figure in our Roman society, Princess Tagore, daughter of the ex Maharaja of that province, who, I believe, abdicated in favour of his brother on embracing Christianity. The principality of Tagore (which, by the way, is half as big as England) is in the province of Bengal, and the cousin of the young lady above named was one of the very few native princes presented by Lord Lansdowne to the Duke of Clarence on his rather hurried visit to Calcutta. The Princess is travelling very quietly, and chooses, while in Europe, to be called simply Miss Tagore. She is petite in figure, but graceful, and of very pleasing appearance, her face being lit up with intelligence. Her English is perfect, and she speaks with the accent of one accustomed to converse with refined and cultivated persons. She is enthusiastically loyal, and her face quite lit up when she spoke of the most gracious reception accorded to her by the Empress of India in the Jubilee year. She told me an interesting fact in connection with her reception at the British Embassy here by Lord and Lady Dufferin. A powerful Maharaja, the grand-uncle of 'Miss Tagore' was one of the first native Princes to come to England and study the customs and language, in the days before India had her Empress, of course. During his stay he knew and greatly admired and esteemed the Hon. Mrs. Norton, and had her portrait painted for himself. On her telling Lord Dufferin this, his Excellency was greatly interested in this incident referring to his gifted aunt, and desired to know by whom the portrait was painted."

The identity of the lady who is the heroine of that story and who presumably supplied all its wonderful materials, is unmistakable. She is, to be sure, a chip of the old block, though she has over-stepped the limits of prudence a little too much. A genealogy however apocryphal, may be made to pass as genuine. But it is not quite so safe to talk of a "Tagore principality" unknown to geography. This ambitious Tagorani (Th'akurani), however, would not be content with the honors of nominal royalty, but must claim a substantial dominion "half as big as England." A newspaper correspondent may be amiable enough not to deem it necessary to test the veracity of a fair informant by referring to any map, gazetteer or history. But there are such things, and "Princess Tagore" will do well not to ignore their existence. She is quite welcome to speak of "the powerful Maharaja who was her grand uncle." The latter lived as a "prince" in England, and, no doubt, among many of the good people there, passed as one. In Europe, he may safely be spoken of as a "mighty Maharaja." In truth, he lived and died an untitled Bengali gentleman, entitled to no other title than the then truly honourable one of Baboo. He was better than almost any Raja or Maharaja.

SCIENCE has given to man many things that were never dreamt of by any before they were invented. But the yearnings actually felt by mankind from remote ages are yet very far from being completely satisfied. The craving for being able to fly in the air like birds, was presumably felt by man from the beginning of his existence. Long before the date of Rasselas, we have the Greek legend of Icarus which seems to point to an unsuccessful effort to float in the air by means of mechanical wings. Our own ancient poets describe aerial voyages in cars of indefinite carrying capacity. They dealt in fictions, but the strain in which they sang clearly shews that the ideal was very prominently in their mind. Many and varied are the attempts which have been made in modern times to achieve the feat. They have all ended in failure. We are now told that Mr. Maxim, the inventor of the Maxim gun, has made very considerable progress in constructing a machine for aerial navigation. It is further said, that Mr. E. F. Frost, J. P., of West Wratting Park, Cambridgeshire, has already finished the construction of a flying machine on which he had been engaged for several years. We do not think it safe to take a hopeful view with regard to either, until they are actually tried. Sir James Douglas gives a good certificate to Mr. Maxim. But in such matters the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

SINCE the conviction of the sentry Aror Singh, the Sikh Bodyguard are under a ban in the Government House. Their number is not large. Of the 120 composing the Governor-General's personal force, only 10 are Sikhs, and these are no longer put in charge of most trusted duty.

THE nodding of Homer has passed into a proverb. The Saturday Review invented the phrase "Silly Season" to indicate the easy journalism of the recess when the Times ceases to be an example of care and accuracy. The inventor itself is not above tripping, however. In a leading article in its issue of December 12, we read:—"Now, as Lord Palmerston once said, there is nothing so delusive as facts, except figures." Our reading of the saying is, "there is nothing" or "nothing is so fallacious as facts, except figures." And was it Lord Palmerston that made that sentence? We have an idea that it was Lord Melbourne's. Lord Palmerston was a most happy speaker, whose speech on the Don Pacifico case was pronounced to be the most effective piece of Parliamentary eloquence in the age of the Cannings and Broughams and Lyndhursts and Greys and Peels. But it was Lord Melbourne who was the man of good things, the maker of epigrams.

THE Daily Graphic contradicts the announcement made in an American paper that the Inman steamers were about to use liquid fuel. The Company may any time introduce that combustion though, with, of course, the necessary modification of the engines. The Indian Daily News reminds the public that the express trains, which run up to 65 miles an hour, on the Great Eastern Railway, burn liquid fuel, and so do the Russian steamers in the Caspian.

THE prospects of literature are not cheering. The poets, whether in prose or metre, are being pushed to a corner. The scope for fancy or imagination is being circumscribed. One by one all our tropes are being vulgarised—the highest flights are turned to matters of hard reality. The most brilliant comparisons are losing their meaning.

Even so it is time enough to mourn with the spirit of Robert Hall over his image of "liquid fire." "Distilled damnation" may still do for sometime till some mahatma of the Church patents bottles of odium theologicum. But liquid fire is already a matter of fact.

THE Local Government has at last sanctioned the application of the Bengal Provincial Railway Company, "limited," for the construction of a Tramway between Tarkeswar and Mugra, in the district of Hooghly. This is Baboo Amrita Lal Roy of Hope's railway. The railway—a light one—or a steam tramway of 2 feet 6 inches gauge is intended to start from the existing Tarkeswar station of the Tarkeswar Railway and to run along its own alignment to the Mugra Gunj, near the Mugra station of the East Indian Railway, a distance of 30½ miles. It will take in Tarkeswar, Gopinagar, Dasghara, Bunpur, Dhanikali, Basua, Majinan, Bhastara (Gopalpur), Melkee, Dwarbasini, Mahanad, Kapastikree (Sultangacha) and Mugra. The total area of land required will not exceed 768 bigahs. The promoters are Messrs. Pearymohun Mookerjee, of Uttarpara, Nundo Lal Gossami, of Serampore, Chandi Lal Sinha, of Calcutta, Ahmed Bux, of Dhanikali, Annada Prosad Roy and Sirram Chandra Bose, of thana Dhaniakhali, and Amrita Lal Roy, of Calcutta. They have bound themselves to commence the construction of the Tramway within 3 months from the date of sanction and to complete it ready for opening and working for traffic with all necessary plant, buildings, stores, live-stock and rolling-stock within two years, that is 19th January 1894. The terms concluded between the District Board of Hooghly and the Promoters are :—

1. That for the purpose of making the proposed line, the Promoters shall not ask the Board for free grant of land.

2. That no portion of the proposed line shall be laid along any road under the control of the Board.

3. That the Promoters shall see that the construction of the Tramway is finished within a period of two years from the date of publication in the Government Gazette of the order authorising them to proceed with the works.

4. That the Promoters shall take care, in the event of their constructing the Tramway, to place the necessary level-crossings wherever the line crosses any of the roads belonging to the Board.

5. That in the event of the Board wishing to purchase the Tramway of its proprietors at the end of 21 years, under the provisions of section 41 of the Bengal Tramways Act, 1883, the Promoters bind themselves to make it over at a price two-fifths in excess of the original outlay of capital.

6. That the Promoters shall pay no rent to the Board for the crossings, and they shall not ask the Board to give them any guarantee of interest or other pecuniary aid."

THE suppression of the Tubbarrah in Moorshedabad was followed by a venetial criminal prosecution. The Shiah suspected in Moonshee Abdoor Rahim an active promoter of the Sunni movement against their revolting practice. They found it to their glory to see him brought to grief. Soon enough he was suspected of embezzlement and criminally prosecuted, convicted and sentenced to four years' rigorous imprisonment. The High Court, however, set him free. We give elsewhere the judgment which will shew how the law was distorted or set at naught to punish the Moonshee who had incurred the ire of the Shiah community of Moorshedabad. Both the Deputy Magistrate, Baboo Mohesh Chunder Sen, who tried the case, and the Deputy Collector, Baboo Bungshidhur Roy, under whose orders the Moonshee served, behaved in a way to call for particular notice of Government. The former was not ashamed to blast a man on a trumpery charge unsupported by evidence. And what shall we say of the latter giving his own servant up to those who sought his blood!

THE Duke of Clarence died at Sandringham on the 14th. His remains remained in the private church there till the 20th, the day fixed for the funeral, when it was removed to Windsor for deposit in the vaults of the Albert Chapel. The Prince of Wales walked to the station behind the coffin, the Princess and her daughters, Prince George of Wales and Princess May driving. The service was held at St. George's Chapel by the Bishop of Rochester. Foreign representatives and state officials were present.

The day was observed as a general mourning throughout Great Britain and the British Colonies. Memorial services were also held in every capital on the Continent.

The Government of India issued the following notifications :—

"Home Department, Calcutta, the 18th January, 1892.

In continuation of the Notification issued on the receipt of the intelligence of the death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, the Governor-General in Council now directs as follows :—

The Flag at Fort William will continue to be hoisted half mast high until the evening of the 20th instant, which is the date fixed for the funeral. On that day 28 minute guns will be fired from the Fort : the last gun to be fired and the flag to be dropped as the sun sets.

The Governor-General in Council directs that all Officers under the Government of India at the Presidency shall be closed on the 20th instant. Local Governments and Administrations are requested to issue similar orders in regard to Public Offices within their respective jurisdictions."

"Home Department, Calcutta, the 20th January 1892.

In continuation of Home Department Notification published in the Gazette Extraordinary of the 18th instant, the Governor-General in Council now directs as follows :—

It is expected that all persons will remain in mourning for three weeks from the date of the death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, or until February 5th, that being the duration of the general mourning which has been proclaimed for Great Britain and Ireland.

Officers of Her Majesty's Civil, Military and Marine Services will remain in mourning for six weeks, or until February 26th, that being the duration of the official mourning which has been proclaimed for Great Britain and Ireland."

The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal declared the 20th as a public holiday :

"Financial Department, Calcutta, the 8th January 1892.

Intelligence having been received that the funeral of His Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor Christian Edward, eldest son of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Duke of Clarence and Avondale, Earl of Athlone, K.G., K.P., L.L.D. (Cantab. and Dublin), will take place on Wednesday, the 20th January, the Lieutenant-Governor hereby declares that day to be a public holiday under section 25 of Act XXVI of 1881, entitled 'The Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881.'

The Military Secretary to the Viceroy issued the following notification :—

"Military Secretary's Office, Calcutta, the 18th January, 1892.

It is hereby notified that a Funeral Service will be held at 10-30 A.M., at St. Paul's Cathedral, on Wednesday, the 20th instant—the date fixed for the funeral of His late Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale.

All Civil and Military Officers and others are invited to attend.

Full dress will be worn by Officers entitled to wear uniform.

Gentlemen not entitled to wear uniform will appear in morning dress."

The public meeting to vote addresses of condolence to the Queen-Empress and the Prince and Princess of Wales came off on the 18th, under the presidency of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. It was a great success, being attended by representatives of all races and sections of the population, among whom perfect unanimity of sentiment prevailed. We give a report of the proceedings elsewhere. The Funeral Service at St. Paul's Cathedral was attended by the Viceroy and Lady Lansdowne. The whole house of prayer was literally crammed with mourners.

Meetings have been held in all parts not of Bengal only but of this vast Indian Empire, in cities and towns, in villages and hamlets, in camps and at wharfs, at all manner of places, and there has been a flood, not yet subsided, of resolutions and addresses and other tokens of sympathy and sorrow.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, January 23, 1892.

A SANSKRIT INSTITUTE FOR BENGAL.

THE great influence, not to say power, which the Pundits or the Brahman Sanskritists of the country possess over its Hindu population is admitted. That they should use their authority for good is the wish of every well regulated heart. One of our morning contemporaries has of late been reading them little homilies for leading them to light. They are told that if they want to maintain their power intact, they must set their house in order, and that they are sure to be deserted by their followers, if they perversely refuse to march with the times. The preaching is excellent, as it is, no doubt, inspired by very laudable motives. But, with such knowledge of the world as our old friend of British Indian Street possesses, can he expect it to be effective? We fear that it may be worse than useless. The Pandits, who have been acting as leaders of men for thousands of years, may be pardoned if they presume that they understand their business better than their amateur advisers. They must be either more or less than ordinary men, if, instead of resenting, they submit like children to the corrections administered to them.

The end which is sought to be attained is desirable. But we feel grave doubts as to the wisdom of the means suggested or adopted to encompass it. Generally speaking, the Pundits keep themselves aloof from politics; but, after all that has come to pass in recent times, there can be no doubt that they may at times be duped, by the misrepresentations of the Vernacular Press and of demagogues, to lend the weight of their influence against the innocent policy or necessary proceedings of Government. To keep the political agitators under adequate check may not be practically feasible. But the Pundits may certainly be placed in a position to appreciate the intentions of Government better than some of them did last year.

At the present time, the learning of the Pundits or the educational work done by them is not utilized or recognised by Government in any shape. A special title has been created for them; but they never wanted it, and the status of those who have got it has not been improved by it in the least. The title has not been conferred on Puudit Kristna Nath Nyapanchanan, yet he is regarded by his countrymen as a far abler scholar than any of those who have been favoured with it. What the Puudits want is not titles, but substantial encouragement. There was a time when the great Sanskritists of Nuddea refused to accept service under Government, and very inferior men had to be appointed as Court Pundits whose function then was to expound the Hindu Law. When Sir William Jones first tried to learn Sanskrit, he could not get a Brahman Sanskritist either for love or for money, and he had to be content with such light as he could get from a grammarian of the medical caste. With the march of times, the pride of the Brahmanical scholars has been so far rationalised that the Pundits of Nuddea are now having their sons educated in English, and one of them has actually accepted service as a Professor in the Government Sanskrit College of Calcutta.

The report of the Education Commission appointed by the Government of Lord Ripon, recommended the grant of small subsidies to the indigenous educational institutions, and it is understood that, with a view to give effect to the wishes of Government in that respect, Sir Alfred Croft deputed Mahamahapadhya Mahesh Chander Nyaratna last year to inspect the toles of Bengal, and to draw up a scheme for their encouragement. But, if we are not greatly mistaken, they will never, except under dire necessity, submit to be governed by the present head of the Government Sanskrit College or by any one who is not a leading Pundit of Nuddea, the chief seat of Sanskrit learning in Bengal. There are toles in Bhatpara near Hooghly, in Bikrampore near Dacca and in other places within the province; but they teach only local pupils, while the fame of Nuddea attracts scholars from the most distant parts of India—from Cashmere in the extreme North-West, from Mysore and Travancore in the South, and from Assam, Sylhet and Chittagong in the East.

Instead of attempting to place the Nuddea Pundits under the Sanskrit College, the more rational course would be to place the Sanskrit College under the Nuddea Pundits. At the present time, the Calcutta Sanskrit College costs Government at least Rs. 2,000 per month; but, considering the amount of work done by it, it cannot be said that it secures any corresponding advantage to Government or to the country. It is at present practically one of the numerous schools in the town for preparing candidates for the University Examinations. It has been in existence for nearly a century, but it can not claim among its alumni one single great name like that of Bhubun Mohan Bidyaratna or Krishna Nath Nyapanchanan. The students who receive instruction in it, are chiefly boys who desire only to have the ordinary routine education, and the true votaries of Sanskrit literature, such as are to be found in the Nuddea toles, never deem it worth while to resort to it, in order to gratify their thirst for knowledge.

Some of our contemporaries are for abolishing the Sanskrit College altogether. We are not for such a sweeping measure. Our idea is that its status may with advantage be changed to that of a Sanskrit Institute for teaching advanced pupils, for prosecuting antiquarian researches, and for editing Sanskrit works. It has already a few good Pundits on its subordinate staff, and if it be placed under a competent head, then it may one day prove to be a really useful institution, and also the means of keeping the Pundits in healthy touch with Government.

MISERIES OF MEN—NATURAL AND SELF-CREATED.

THERE are in this world miseries enough which are more or less unavoidable. The hand of death spares none. The mightiest monarch has to submit to it like the poorest of his subjects. The momentary sunshine in the life of any individual may at any time be converted by it into a gloom that nothing can dispel. That man is mortal, is not, however, his only grievance. There are other sources of misery which sometimes prove even worse than death. Despite the progress made in the healing art, most of the diseases, which flesh is heir to, are still practically incurable. The majority of men are to this day ill-housed, ill-clad, and ill-fed. Famines, inundations, cyclones, earthquakes and pestilences remind us very forcibly, every now and then, how powerless we are. These evils appear inseparable from the conditions which environ our life in this world. But as if not satisfied with the stock of inevitable woes, we create others by our own acts, and quite gratuitously aggravate our sufferings by self-inflicted tortures. We read in history of an English prelate who, though standing almost on a footing of equality with his sovereign in point of wealth and power, used to wear sackcloth, drink water rendered unpalatable by the mixture of unsavoury herbs, and have his back torn by flagellation voluntarily undergone. We read also of another divine who in order to obtain the honours of sainthood passed thirty years of his life on the top of a pillar in Rain, wind, frost, heat, hail, damp, and sleet and snow.

The cases of Thomas a Becket and St. Simeon, however, are not singular. In every age and in every country, there have been ecclesiastics of the same stamp who made both themselves and their followers miserable. When a man foregoes the comforts within his command from motives of policy, we need feel no more concerned about him than for the reckless speculator who risks all his fortune on a game of chance. The prizes of the priestly profession are not inconsiderable, and those who compete for them must be prepared for some sacrifices in the beginning.

The cases which are most pitiable are those of persons who are incapable of thinking for themselves, and are led by their advisers to increase their own wretchedness. Ambition without ability is dangerous. The man who does not possess any capacity for doing real good, and yet is eager for power, is sure to be mischievous. The high official who does not know how to exercise a healthy control over his department, generally insists upon the observance of useless formalities, and the compilation of meaningless returns. The case with the religious teachers is the same. They practically pretend to omnipotence. They offer to make a poor man rich; to cure any disease; to bring rain from the heavens in times of drought; to give children to barren women; to kill your enemies by incantations; to soften the obdurate heart of your lady love by charms, to propitiate the stars by poojas. All these by means of rites and observances, by themselves and by their clients. To keep up a show of active exertion for fulfilling these promises, they have to multiply cumbrous ceremonies. Where the event supports their claims, they make the utmost capital out of it. But sometimes they must fail, and in order to be provided with a loophole for retreat, they prescribe impracticable austerities for their followers. These are very often actual ly practised by them, and ultimately they become a part of their daily life. Thus arise the practices which, like hook-swinging, suttee, long fastings and ablutions in cold winter mornings, serve only to increase the misery of men instead of alleviating it. We once came across a Sanyasi who subjected himself to the fearful torture of never allowing himself any rest by being seated or by lying down. In his strange infatuation, he passed his days and nights in a standing posture, resting his hands on a pair of poles. The sores and swellings in his legs bore witness to the fact that there was no hypocrisy in him, and that he actually practised the terrible vow which he professed to have taken. Sanyasis of this order are happily rare. But there is no limit to the number of those who might, by honest industry, live in comfort and yet depend for their subsistence entirely on begging, for which they go about the streets barefooted and barelegged in the midday sun.

Accustomed as we are to the existing order of things, it is hardly possible for us to form an adequate idea of the mischief that has been, and is still being, done to the world by the abuse of priestly power. The time may yet be far in the distance when artificial rain-making will be a fait accompli; when meteorological science will be sufficiently advanced to predict early enough the occurrence of cyclones; and when an effectual cure for every form of disease will be discovered by the doctors. But surely there is no reason why men should patiently suffer from miseries which are due only to the moral tyranny of their priests. We are not now thinking of the masses who know no better; we can only pity them. But surely we have a right to expect something better from those who have been taught better. If our vaunted education fails to secure even this amount of good, the sooner our schools and colleges are abolished, the better. The intellectual culture which can not save a man from groveling in the mire of debauchery in the name of so-called religious rites, is worse than useless. The Pandits themselves never encouraged the beastly sensuality of the Kowls, but ascribed the shasters which sanction Bacchanalianism to a trick on the part of the gods to bring about the destruction of tyrants. Nevertheless, the orthodoxy which has been making itself prominent in recent times, is for the whole hog, and would hold up to admiration the most debasing rites. The cloak of religion is in many cases adopted only to hide the shame which would otherwise be inevitable. But, supposing that there is sincerity in any case, there cannot be a more pitiable spectacle than that of an educated man ruining himself by drinking and debauchery in the exercise of so-called religious belief.

A PAMPHLET ON CODIFICATION.

LATELY, we happened to come across a little pamphlet which deserves to be better known than it seems to be at present. The author is the well known attorney of the Bengal High Court, Mr. H. H. Remfry, and the subject is "The Codification and Improvement of Law in British India." The writer has not dealt merely in platitudes, but has taken a bird's eye view of the entire field of Indian Law. His grasp of the subject and his method of handling will appear from the following extracts:—

"To turn now to the effect of marriage on the property of husband and wife, the Indian Succession Act provides that 'no person is by marriage to acquire any interest in the property of the person whom he or she marries, or become incapable of doing any act in respect to his or her own property which he or she could have done if unmarried' (s. 4, Act X of 1865). This drastic law, which came into force on the 1st January 1866 naturally made important changes in the common law, rights, liabilities and disabilities arising out of the relations of husband and wife in the cases of persons to whom English law had theretofore been applied. As regards property it abolished by implication the doctrine of unity of persons between husband and wife. Another apparent variance from English law is that any thing a child may have received from an intestate in his lifetime by way of advancement is not deducted from its share or brought into hotchpotch. Our Succession Act also wisely excludes the home rule, which enables an executor to pay any creditor, even himself, preferentially to another, by enacting that after the liquidation of funeral and administration charges, and three months' wages due to domestic servants, labourers, or artisans, all debts, however secured, shall be paid rateably (Ibid. s. 282). By another Act no executor or administrator, save an Administrator-General, is justified in charging any commission for administering any East India estate. Even where a legacy is bequeathed to a person named as an executor, he cannot obtain it unless he proves the will or otherwise manifests an intention to act as executor."

"By a clause in the before-cited Succession Act no one having a nephew or niece, or nearer relative, has power to bequeath any property to religious or charitable uses, unless the will has not only been executed a year before the testator's death, but within six months from its execution deposited in an office indicated for that purpose."

"All estates, both moveable and immoveable (European and native), devolve in the same channel, and on one description of representative, namely, the executor or administrator, and thus we get rid of the useless distinction between the transfer or devolution of realty and personality which renders English and American systems of law so intricate. Executors, as persons supposed to have been selected by the testator himself, have full and uncontrolled power to dispose of not only the personal but also the real estates of their testators. So have the administrators of Europeans; the administrators of natives' estates are in no way hampered as regards disposal of moveables, such as Government securities and shares or outstandings, but it has not been deemed desirable to invest them with disposing power over immoveable property save with the leave of the Court. Here in India no derivative executorship is recognised in connection with wills or codicils executed or grants obtained since the beginning of 1866."

The summary that is given of the Law of Limitation is equally valuable. The author says with reference to the "rogue's law":—

"One year is allowed for actions of tort; three years for actions on contracts, simple or otherwise (unregistered), including suits for rent. A customer need, therefore, only preserve receipted bills for three years instead as in England, for double that time. On registered documents, as also on foreign judgments, a six years' limitation is given. All suits for the recovery of immoveable property, or to recover money charged thereon, are in time if instituted within twelve years, and to redeem a mortgage of immoveable property sixty years is allowed. It is noteworthy that the periods prescribed by this Act suffice to extinguish all remedy by suit save, (a) in cases of trusts or fraud; (b) where an acknowledgment has been obtained in writing recognising the claim as of right, before expiration of prescribed period; or (c) where the defendant has been for any part of the time absent from India. Lastly, decrees of the High Courts can be executed any time within twelve years; but decrees of other Courts not after three years, unless kept alive by execution or notice through the Court. Incidentally it may be remarked that a hard-and-fast rule prevails by which all Courts in India are bound to take cognisance of limitation questions whether raised by defendant or not."

The brochure under notice embodies only the substance of a lecture delivered by the author, and is necessarily rather too brief. But even its brevity has a value. It enables the reader to form a nucleus of ideas which may be expanded afterwards by studying the original codes.

Law.

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUDICATURE AT FORT WILLIAM IN BENGAL.

The 9th December 1891.

Criminal Jurisdiction.

PRESENT.

The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Norris, and the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Beverly, two of the Judges of the Court.

In the matter of Abdoor Rahim ... Petitioner.

versus.

The Empress ... Oposite party.

For the Petitioner, Messrs. Woodroffe, Jackson, and P. Mitter, Counsel, and with them Moulvi Mahomed Yousuff and Moulvi Syud Shamsul Hoda and Moulvi Serajul Islam, Pleaders.

For the Crown, Baboo Ram Charun Mitter.

We are of opinion that this Rule should be made absolute. I think this is a case of sufficient importance to warrant my going somewhat into detail with regard to the facts.

The prisoner, it appears, has been in the employ of the Collector at Moorsheadabad for a considerable number of years, and has been trusted in that employment, as appears from the fact that from time to time fresh and more responsible duties have been cast upon him—duties requiring the possession of ability and honesty; and he was called upon not long since to furnish security to the extent of a thousand rupees for a fresh duty imposed upon him, namely, the distribution of money.

It appears that there was passing through his hand, among other sums, a sum of 60 rupees a month, which it was his duty to distribute to certain pensioners. In August last he appears to have come down to Calcutta. The circumstances under which he came here, it is not necessary to enter into. In his absence the boxes containing his books of account, were taken away from his office, but when he returned to his office, he himself went to the Collector with the keys, opened the boxes and handed over all his accounts to the Collector, including a private memorandum book in which is shown the balance remaining in his hands of unexpended money. While he was here in Calcutta, he received intimation that he was required at Moorshedabad for the purpose of explaining something in his accounts. Immediately on the receipt of that communication he left Calcutta to return to Moorshedabad, and at Azimgunge, on the way, he was arrested by a police Superintendent under a warrant and taken into custody. Thereupon, according to the prisoner's own statement, and it is not contradicted, and I take it to be true, in the course of conversation, on the prisoner expressing surprise at being arrested when he was going back in obedience to the letter received by him, to render an explanation of his accounts, the Police Superintendent told him that probably he would be made Queen's evidence.

I pause here to observe, that if that statement is true, and I see no reason to think it untrue, it was a most improper observation for the Police to make. When a Police officer of whatever position, be he the Commissioner of this metropolis or any other officer, is armed with a warrant to arrest, his duty after arresting is to convey the criminal to the jail or to take him before a magistrate, without asking the prisoner any question, or discussing with him the nature of the offence with which he is charged.

The prisoner was taken into custody and before any enquiry had been held or any trial, he was subjected to a long cross-examination by the Deputy Magistrate. Under what provision of the Code the Deputy Magistrate did that I am at a loss to understand. Section 342 of the Code provides—"For the purpose of enabling the accused to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, the Court may, at any stage of any enquiry or trial, without previously warning the accused, put such questions to him as the Court considers necessary." At this time, as I have already pointed out, there was no enquiry and no trial. There existed no circumstance for which there was any necessity for calling upon the accused person to explain.

This examination seems to me to be absolutely irregular and illegal and unauthorised; and it under any provision of the law it could have been done it could only have been done for the purpose of enabling the accused person to explain circumstances given in evidence against him. It was never intended by the Legislature to put into the hands of a Deputy Magistrate an engine of oppression such as this to wring from a man who was not then upon his trial and who had simply been arrested—statements which might subsequently be used against him.

This examination, my learned colleague points out to me, purports to be made under Section 164 of the Code. That section says: "Any Magistrate not being a Police officer may record any statement or confession made to him in the course of an investigation under this chapter, or at any time afterwards before the commencement of the enquiry or trial."

As far as I can see there was nothing which was being investigated. The statements were not made "in the course of an investigation." The section goes on: "Such statements shall be recorded in such of the manners hereinafter prescribed for recording evidence as is in his opinion best fitted for the circumstances of the case. Such confessions shall be recorded and signed in the manner provided in section 364, and shall then be forwarded to the Magistrate by whom the case is to be enquired into or tried. No Magistrate shall record any such confession unless, upon questioning the person making it, he has reason to believe that it was made voluntarily; and when he records any confession he shall make a memorandum at the foot of such record to the following effect, &c." It does not appear that any such question was put to the accused person asking him, if his statement was voluntarily made. It seems to me, as I have said before, obviously, on the face of it, to have been extorted from him. The whole proceeding is irregular, tyrannical and overbearing to the last possible degree.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Shortness of Breath, Coughs, and Colds.—Thousands of testimonials can be produced to prove the power possessed by these corrective remedies in cases of asthma, incipient consumption and all disorders of the chest and lungs. The Ointment, well rubbed upon the chest and back, penetrating the skin, is absorbed and carried directly to the lungs, where, in immediate contact with the whole mass of circulating blood, it neutralises or expels those impurities, which are the foundation of consumption, asthma, bronchitis, pneumonia, and similar complaints. On the appearance of the first consumptive symptoms the back and chest of the patient should be fomented with warm brine, dried with a coarse cloth, and Holloway's Ointment then well rubbed in. Its absorption will subdue advancing symptoms, and baffle this formidable foe.

In the course of that cross-examination the accused made certain statement as to the alleged deficiency in his accounts. His attention was particularly called to three sums of Rs. 3-8 in the months of April, May, and June of this year, and he substantially said, "These accounts are in my hand-writing. It is quite true that the totals do not tally with the items, that the totals are three 3 rupees 8 annas in excess of what they should be." He was then asked, having regard to the items written down in the account, how do you explain that? He said, "I explain it in this way. I was directed by Baboo Bungshi Dhur Roy, Deputy Collector, under whose directions I acted and whose instructions I had to follow in regard to the payments I made of this sum of 60 Rs. per month, to make the payment of 3 rupees 8 annas to a man named Kurban Ali to be paid over to the wife of Mirza Ali Hossain." To a further question by the Deputy Magistrate "Why was not the name entered," he says "That there is a standing rule which has been in existence a very long time, that no payment out of this charitable fund was to be made of more than two Rupees. It was therefore a breach of the rule to make the payment of Rs. 3-8, and so that it might not appear that the rule was broken, this payment was not put in, but the total was, as it were, falsified in this way."

Subsequently, he is brought up for trial before the Deputy Magistrate, and Bungshi Dhur Baboo, the Deputy Collector, is in fact the only witness against him excepting his own statement and his own books. The only oral testimony given against him substantially is that of Bungshi Dhur Baboo; and, Bungshi Dhur's statement substantially amounts only to this:—"The statements made by the prisoner, when you examined and cross-examined him, are untrue. It is not true that I ever directed him to make these payments. This statement is false."

Upon this, the Deputy Magistrate has believed the Deputy Collector and disbelieved the prisoner, and convicted and sentenced him to four years' rigorous imprisonment, and the conviction and sentence has been upheld on appeal by the Sessions Judge. We think that the circumstances under which this statement was elicited from the prisoner were utterly irregular, and that the statement ought not to have been used as evidence against him. We are further of opinion that the prosecution ought—when the accused vouched both the man, who took this money Rs. 3-8, and the woman, to whom it is said to have been paid, month by month, in obedience to the order of the Deputy Collector—to have called those persons, the woman to prove or disprove the statement that she had received the Rs. 3-8, and the man who acted as a conduit-pipe for the conveyance of the money to prove or disprove that he received that amount from the prisoner for payment to the woman.

It is impossible to believe that the prisoner has not been seriously prejudiced by the admission of his statement, and there has been an error in law in placing the onus on the prisoner to produce the two witnesses to whom I have just referred. Therefore upon that ground we think that we cannot uphold the conviction.

As regards the sentence passed, assuming that the conviction is correct, the sentence is altogether disproportionate to the magnitude of the offence, and in thus characterizing it I use very moderate and mild language.

The rule must be made absolute and the conviction and sentence set aside.

THE DEATH OF THE DUKE OF CLARENCE.

PUBLIC MEETING IN CALCUTTA.

At 4 P. M. yesterday (Monday, January 18) a very largely attended and representative meeting of the citizens of Calcutta was held at the Town Hall for the purpose of voting addresses of condolence to Her Majesty the Queen-Empress of India and their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in their recent bereavement. Among those present were the following:—Sir Charles Elliott, Sir Comer Petheram, the Hon. Justices Pigot, Prinsep and Macpherson, Sir H. L. Harrison, the Hon. G. H. P. Evans, the Hon. Sir John Ware Edgar, the Hon. Mr. Woodburn, the Hon. Lieutenant-General Pemberton, the Hon. Mr. Bliss, the Hon. Sir Charles Paul, His Highness the Maharaja of Cooch Behar, Sir Jotendro Mohun Tagore, the Maharaja of Durbhunga, the Maharaja of Bettiah, Maharaja Durga Churn Law, the Hon. Nawab Bahadur Khwajah Ahsunullah, Prince Jehan Kadir, Nawab Mir Mohamed Ali, the Hon. Mr. H. J. S. Cotton, Mr. J. Lambert, the Hon. Sir A. Croft, Dr. Simpson, Captain E. W. Petley, Mr. H. Lee, the Rev. Father Lafont, Mr. J. G. Womack, Mr. J. Kimber, Mr. C. J. Johnston, Mr. C. H. Tawney, Colonel Pritchard, Mr. R. Steel, Mr. G. L. Garth, Mr. A. H. Wallis, the Hon. Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, Babus Joy Gobind Law, Sewbux Bogla, O. C. Dutt, and S. N. Bannerji.

The Sheriff, the Hon. Mr. J. L. Mackay, said.—Your Honor, Your Highnesses and Gentlemen,—The untimely death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence, under circumstances probably unequalled for pathetic sadness, is the reason for calling together the citizens of Calcutta to-day. I beg to declare the meeting opened.

Maharaja Sir Narendra Krishna, K. C. I. E., in proposing His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor to take the chair, said:—Mr. Sheriff, Your Honor and Gentlemen,—With feelings of boundless and unutterable grief we have met here this afternoon to pay our tribute of respect to the memory of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, the eldest grandson of our revered Queen-Empress, who died in London on the 14th instant from influenza. After receiving an education befitting his exalted position, he was enrolled as a cadet in the English Navy, and travelled over the greater portion of the world by ships of war in order to gain that experience which would be of use in ruling wisely over the Empire at a future date. His amiable disposition allowed him to cultivate the acquaintance of the people during his visit to India a couple of years ago, and the good opinion which he then formed of his future Indian subjects was communicated by him to his august grandmother, and they would have much profited by his favourable impression of them had not cruel death snatched him away in the prime of life from the world. His untimely end is deeply and universally mourned by the people, and must have plunged his Royal parents and the pious Queen of England in an intense grief which no worldly sympathy can allay. And on this most melancholy and painful event we can only offer them our humble, respectful and heartfelt condolence. May Almighty God in His hidden way give solace to their burning hearts. I now beg to propose that His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor take the chair.

Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadur, C. I. E., in seconding the motion of Maharaja Narendra Krishna, said:—I have great pleasure in seconding the proposal of my noble friend the Maharaja Bahadur, and in doing so, I do not wish to speak more than one word. The heart-rending calamity which has overtaken the Royal Family of England is at this moment the topic of mournful conversation throughout the whole civilized world. If there is anything which can to any extent soften the keenness of the sorrow of Her Imperial Majesty and of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and last, not least, of the Princess May of Teck, it is the genuine and sincere sympathy in their distress which this sad event has evoked in the hearts of all who have heard of it. The people of India yield to no British subjects in their loyalty to the throne, and speaking for the great community whom I have the honour to represent, I can say that the Mahomedans of this country have been deeply moved by the cruel blow received by the Royal Family, and they heartily pray to God that He may grant Her Majesty as well as her son and daughter-in-law consolation and sufficient strength to bear this heavy affliction.

Sir Charles Elliott, on taking the chair, said:—The presence of so large and influential a company as I see assembled here this afternoon is a sufficient proof that you, Mr. Sheriff, were justified in summoning this meeting, and that there can be no dispute that one common feeling of grief and sympathy animates all classes in Calcutta, all ranks in society, all religions and all races who are represented here. And not only is Calcutta represented, but we know that all classes and all races in this province of which Calcutta is the focus and capital are sharing in the same thought and the same feelings. I have received numerous letters, telegraphic messages from important personages and representative bodies in different parts of Bengal, desirous of expressing their adherence and associating themselves with us on this occasion. I will not detain you by reading any of these communications. The views of these are couched in very graceful and tender phrases and I will only mention the names of the senders. They are from the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, the Calcutta Naval Volunteers (by letter), the Behar Light Horse, the Northern Bengal Mounted Rifles, the Assam Valley Mounted Rifles, the Central Bengal Light Horse, the Behar Planters' Association, the Assam Branch, Indian Tea Association, the Patna Municipality, the Patna District Board, Khodabux Khan of Patna, Members of the Anjuman Patna, and Khawajah Abdul Alif, of Dacca, the Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad, the Maharaja of Hutwah and several zemindars of Azimganj. The Sheriff also informs me that he has received about fifty similar messages.

I have no doubt that had time allowed and had the news of our meeting been more widely spread, the number of these messages would have been greatly multiplied. Indeed, there was little need of such messages as these to assure us of the existence of these feelings; for it is difficult to conceive any event short of the loss of our beloved Queen herself which would be more certain to cause widespread sorrow or to excite the most general sympathy. The death of a young Prince who if he had lived would in all human probability have been our Sovereign, whose character was blameless and attractive, and who was standing on the threshold of a life which bade fair to be honourable and useful, is an event which is sufficiently pathetic in itself, but it is doubly so when it occurs at a time when his engagement to a charming English Princess had just been announced, and all hearts were touched with pleasure at the thought of his contracting a happy marriage. The fact that he so lately paid a visit to us in India, that it is only two years ago that we were busy in a preparation to welcome him and do him honour, and that while here he endeared himself so much to all who met him by his simple and courteous demeanour gives a personal poignancy to the keenness of our grief at hearing that he has been so suddenly cut off. A fortnight ago and we were all ready to say of him in the words of Virgil

And now in a few brief days the hope and the joy of the nation has been dashed to the ground, and we are left to muse upon the vanity of earthly wishes and to wonder at the inscrutable ways of Providence, which orders all for the best in a manner no man can understand. We know that in the case of private bereavements it is very rarely that any spoken words can bring comfort, but that some consolation is given to the sufferers by feeling that they are not alone in their sorrow. This is all that we can hope to effect by offering our heartfelt condolence to-day. We are met here in unison with countless mourners in all parts of the British Empire, not with English speaking mourners only, but with those who use the 130 languages of India, and the innumerable tongues of our fellow-subjects in all quarters of the globe to express our grief at the disaster which has befallen the nation, and our deep and respectful sympathy with those near relatives whom so terrible a bereavement has overtaken. The only other thing we can do for them is to pray that the Almighty Father may in His tender love towards mankind shed comfort and balm into the stricken hearts of the sorrowing parents, and of the young Princess who was almost his wife. And now, gentlemen, with these brief prefatory words I will ask Sir Jotendro Mohun Tagore to move the first Resolution.

Maharaja Sir Jotendro Mohun Tagore said:—Your Honor, Maharajas, Rajas, and Gentlemen,—On a melancholy occasion like the present, silence is perhaps the best expression of an overpowered heart. I will not therefore attempt even to say how deeply grieved we all feel for the sad bereavement with which our beloved Sovereign the Queen-Empress and the Royal Family have been afflicted. To us, Hindus, a calamity in the family of our Sovereign is almost a personal calamity, and in the present case the late visit of Prince Albert Victor to our country has doubly emphasised this feeling in us; but what makes our grief still more bitter is the sad thought that death has laid his unrelenting hand on him in the prime of life, when he was about to lead to the altar the bride of his own heart. For my humble self, personally, I will cherish to the last of my days a vivid and grateful memory of the kind and condescending treatment which His Royal Highness was graciously pleased to accord to me when I had the honour of serving on the Reception Committee during his late visit.

There is, I believe, scarcely anything on this earth which can bring consolation to a stricken heart on such a mournful occasion, but it is said that sorrow shared is sorrow soothed, and it behoves us therefore that we should at such a time approach the Throne in all humility and respectfully offer our sincere and loyal condolence and sympathy, and shew that millions of Her Majesty's Indian subjects fully share in Her grief and deeply mourn the loss of His Royal Highness the Prince with a heavy heart.

With these words I beg to move the following resolution:—

That the citizens of Calcutta and the inhabitants of the Province of Bengal have heard with profound sorrow of the early and lamented death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, Heir Presumptive to the Throne, and desire to humbly approach Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India, and His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with an expression of the most heartfelt sympathy and loyal condolence, for the grief which this melancholy event has caused the Royal Family.

Sir Comer Petheram, in seconding the resolution, said:—Your Honor, Your Highnesses and Gentlemen,—The resolution, which has just been read to you by Sir Jotendro Mohun Tagore, is one which recommends itself to all of us, and I am sure it requires very few words of mine. I don't think that this is an occasion upon which many words ought to be used by anyone. It is clear, I think, from this large meeting and from the various telegrams and letters which have been received by His Honor and by the Sheriff that the people of this country do feel very widely the sympathy for our beloved Queen and other members of the Royal Family on whom this blow has fallen. With these very few words I will content myself with seconding this resolution.

Maharaja Durga Churn Law, in supporting the resolution, said:—We have all assembled here to-day to publicly deplore the sad loss we have sustained by the untimely death of the heir presumptive to the throne. It was only, it seems to me, the other day that His Royal Highness was among us, and we did all we could to honour and please him, not knowing that his end was to occur so soon. Gentlemen, such is life, and it is impossible to calculate upon the future. So much has been said expressing our deep sorrow at the distressing event that I can find nothing more to add. I have therefore no wish to take up your time by recapitulating what you have already heard. I will conclude by saying that I consider it is our duty to approach the Royal Family with an expression of our grief and loyalty and profound sympathy in their severe affliction.

His Honour the President said,--We can respond in no other way than by general silence as approving and accepting the resolution.

The Maharaja of Darbhunga moved the second resolution, which runs as follows :--

That this meeting accepts and adopts the humble address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress, which has just been read, as an expression of the feelings which pervade all ranks and all classes at the sorrow which has fallen upon our beloved Sovereign.

The Hon. Mr. Mackay in seconding it said, that it was unnecessary to add anything. His Excellency the Viceroy would be asked to be pleased to lay the letter before the Throne as sympathetic and respectful expressions of loyal condolence on their part.

His Honor the President said,--I will assume that the second resolution has been accepted by this meeting.

The Maharaja of Bettiah proposed the next resolution which ran as follows :--

That this meeting having heard read the address to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, accepts and adopts the same as expressing the respectful and affectionate sympathy felt by all ranks and classes with His Royal Highness and the Princess of Wales at the bereavement they have so suddenly sustained.

He said,--Your Honor, Maharajas and Gentlemen,--In proposing the above resolution for your acceptance I may be permitted to bring to your recollection the visit of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence to Calcutta about a couple of years ago. Many of you may recollect the amiable and agreeable manners which the late Prince possessed and the favourable impression made in the minds of the people of the country. It is very much to be regretted that the life of the Prince who was destined to be some day the reigning monarch of the vast territories possessed by British Crown should be so suddenly cut short, and all our hopes doomed to disappointment. In moving this resolution I only ask you to give your approval to it.

The Nawab Bahadur Khwajah Ahsunulla seconded the resolution with a few well chosen words.

His Honor the President said,--I make no doubt you will all agree in passing this resolution.

Mr. H. Lee moved the next resolution as follows :--That this meeting authorises a Committee, to consist of the following noblemen and gentlemen, to sign the addresses which have now been accepted and adopted on behalf of the inhabitants of the province and of this city, and to submit them in due course and through the usual channels :--The Chairman of this meeting, His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, His Highness the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad, Ameer-ul-Umra, G. I. E., the Hon. the Chief Justice, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Calcutta, the Bishop of Calcutta, Metropolitan of India, His Grace the Archbishop of Calcutta, the Rev. A. Ferrer, Senior Chaplain of the Kirk of Scotland, the General Commanding the Presidency Division, the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Municipal Corporation of Calcutta, the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Commissioners for making Improvements in the port of Calcutta, the President and Vice-President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the President and Vice-Presidents of the British Indian Association, the Director of Public Instruction, the President and Vice-Presidents of the National Mahomedan Association, the President and Vice-Presidents of the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association, the Hon. the Advocate-General, Mr. A. I. E., Principal of the Sanskrit College, the Deputy Surgeon-General of Bengal, the Commissioner of Police, the Commandant of the Presidency Battalion of Volunteers, the Hon. H. J. S. Cotton, the Hon. G. H. P. Evans, Mr. R. Steel, Mr. S. E. J. Clarke, Rai Bahadur Rajcoomar Sarvabikari, Nawab Bahadur Abdool Luteef; the following Representatives of the press:--Mr. J. O' B. Saunders, Mr. A. Macdonald, Mr. James Wilson, Mr. Paul Knight, Babu Narendro Nath Sen, Babu Motilal Ghose. Consuls-General and Consuls:--Mr. John A. Ralli, Mr. E. E. Petrocochino. Representatives of the Armenian community:--Mr. A. A. Apar, Mr. A. G. Apar. Representatives of the Jewish community:--Mr. J. E. D. Ezra, Mr. E. S. Gubby. Representatives of the Parsi Community:--Mr. P. E. Guzdar, Mr. H. M. Rustomjee. Representatives of the Jain and Marwari community:--Babu Shew Buksh Bagla, Rai Budri Dass Bahadur. Representatives of the Brahmo community:--Maharshi Debendra Nath Tagore, Bhai Protap Chunder Mozumdar. The Sheriff of Calcutta.

He said: It was anticipated that this meeting which we, the citizens of Calcutta, have caused to be convened to enable us to give expression to our sentiments of loyal and heartfelt condolence with Her Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India and the Members of her Royal Family, would be as numerous as attended as the event has verified. It was therefore decided by the Committee which drafted the memorials that you have adopted that I should ask the various sections of our community to sign, as it were, by proxy.

Mr. Womack seconded this resolution.

His Honor the President said: I trust that this resolution will meet with your acceptance.

Prince Jehan Kadir Mirza Bahadur said,--I rise to propose a cordial vote of thanks to His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal for presiding as Chairman on this occasion, and it will require no words from me to recommend it to your favour. I sympathize sincerely with the objects of the meeting,--a sympathy in which the Mahomedans of Bengal join.

Nawab Meer Mahomed Ally seconded the resolution.

His Honor the President said,--I have to thank you for the courtesy which has been done me, and I have only to ask you to return thanks to the Sheriff for the trouble he has taken in arranging for this meeting, which has enabled us to have an opportunity of expressing the sentiments which are so widely spread as those to which utterance has been given to-day.

The Hon. Mr. Mackay said,--I thank you very much.---The meeting then dissolved.

THE LETTERS OF CONDOLENCE.

The following were the letters of condolence that were adopted :--

"To her Most Gracious Majesty, Victoria by the Grace of God, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India.

The humble and loyal address of the inhabitants of Calcutta in meeting assembled.

"May it please your Majesty :--We crave leave to approach you at this time in the hope that under Providence a manifestation of the loyalty and affection of your subjects may in some degree tend to mitigate the grief in which you have, within the past few days, been plunged by the loss of your beloved grandson, His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale.

"His Royal Highness' recent visit to India gave us an opportunity of observing the qualities which endeared him to those with whom he came in contact, and inspired us with the brightest hopes in regard to his future.

"Speaking not only for ourselves, the inhabitants of the metropolis of India, but for the people of the great Province of Bengal, our sorrow at the untimely death of the Prince is greater when we remember that he was cut down just as he was about to form ties which, while they would have secured his own happiness, would have further endeared him to your Majesty's subjects.

"We feel, your Majesty, how words must fail to heal a wound such as that which your loving subjects now deplore, but we hope that the fresh proofs of the affectionate and loyal sympathy for your royal person and your throne, which will be evoked by the sorrow that has now arisen, may strengthen and help you to bear the overwhelming affliction.

"With prayers that He with whom alone is true consolation may comfort and sustain you,--We are, with respectful sympathy, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects."

To His Royal Highness Albert Edward, Prince of Wales.

The humble address of the inhabitants of Calcutta in meeting assembled.

"May it please your Royal Highness :--It is with the deepest sorrow that we have heard of the sudden and crushing blow which has fallen upon your Royal Highness and your beloved Consort, and we desire to give expression to the respectful and earnest sympathy which pervades the people of this city and this Province.

"Sixteen years ago we had the honour of receiving your Royal Highness in Calcutta, and the recollection of your gracious presence is still fresh in the memory of many, and but two short years have passed since we had the privilege of welcoming your beloved son, who is now no more.

"A few weeks ago we rejoiced to learn that His Royal Highness was about to form ties, which, while ensuring personal happiness for himself, would have given unbounded satisfaction to all Her Majesty's subjects, and now we mourn his loss and the destruction of all those bright hopes for the future.

"We trust that the knowledge of the manner in which your grief is shared by millions of hearts throughout the Empire may, in some measure, help to console you in the affliction which has fallen upon your Royal House, and we pray that consolation from above may come to you and to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales in this dark hour of your trial.

"We are, with respectful sympathy, Your Royal Highness, your most humble and obedient servants."

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

BEETHOVEN'S SPIRIT WALTZ.

STRANGE, wild, rich music!—how it thrills and thrills
My inner heart—a piercing melody!
And then such strains of sadness that it fills
My brooding thought with many a phantasy
From the dark, trembling depths of memory;
Of all that was so beautiful in life—
Voices that wake the heart to ecstasy,
Treasures with which my early morn was rife—
But perished all, amid earth's changes, toil, and strife.

There is that soft and tender air—the voice
Of her that was so meek, with eyes of light,
Which touched the heart, yet bade it still rejoice—
A gentle spirit clothed with holy might;
It speaks to me again—e'en with affright.
Thy well-known tones, my sister, now I hear,
And the eye strains as it would burst the sight
Through the dark folds of sense, and see thee near:
In vain—poor, anxious orb—it melts into a tear.

And now a choir of voices float along,
From the far distance, softly stealing o'er me,
As music o'er the waters, or the song
Which visits us in dreams so tenderly,
We think good angels make the harmony—
Are ye with sweet accord all singing now,
Once loved on earth, but now in heaven that be?
From streams of light, from banks where amaranths blow,
Do ye come down to weep with those who weep below?

And now methinks I'm carried far away,
As on the bosom of the summer air—
And strange, soft, spiritual lights around me play,
And visions open of the bright and fair,
That now the wearied, wounded heart repair—
Oh, happy world! where love and peace abide—
Oh, blessed ones! I see, I see you there!
Joy floweth free in an unmingled tide,
Nor love itself desires or hopes for aught beside.

The music changes—heaven's harps are ringing
Such holy measures, that e'er the thought is still Cherubic voices now their anthems singing,
That Music's soul itself these voices fill,
And every feeling moveth at their will:
Ah! there's that strain again—and now in tears
The vision fades—I own 't was human skill,
The sweetest sound the touch of sorrow wears,
And Music still on earth, in Pilgrim's weeds appears.

THE HORSE.

"We all have our hobbies."

Nay, ladies, forgive, though the truth be confessed,
A horse is the treasure we English love best.
You may sigh if you will, though 't were better to laugh,
For we'd rather be hunting than wooing by half!

See, see where he stands in his beauty and pride!
Man scarce seems the noblest when placed by his side.
What strength in his limbs as he spurns the dull ground,
How bold his full eye as he glances around!

Stand, stand till I'm mounted!—now off where you will;
Over fence, ditch, or gate—I can stick to you still—
Deep and wide flows the brook—stay! 't were madness to do it!
One plunge and one snort—we are over—or through it!

Nay, frown not, fair dames, nature cannot be changed;
It is useless to mutter—"mad fool, or deranged!"
You must needs yield the palm, poor disconsolate Mentors;
The horse is our better-half—English are centaurs!

THE DEATH OF INFANTS.

How peacefully they rest,
Cross-folded there
Upon his little breast,
Those tiny hands, that ne'er were still before,
But ever sported with his mother's hair,
Or the plain cross that on her breast she wore!
Her heart no more will beat,
To feel the touch of that soft palm;
That ever seemed a new surprise,
Sending glad thoughts up to her eyes,
To bless him with her holy calm;
Sweet thoughts, that left her eyes as sweet.
How quiet are the hands
That wove those pleasant bands!
But that they do not rise and sink
With his calm breathing, I should think
That he were dropped asleep;
Alas! too deep, too deep
Is this his slumber!
Time scarce can number
The years ere he will wake again.

He did but float a little way
Adown the stream of time,
With dreary eyes, watching the ripples play,
Listening their fairy chime;
His slender sail
Ne'er felt the gale;
He did but float a little way,
And putting to the shore,
While yet 't was early day,
Went calmly on his way,

To dwell with us no more ;
No jarring did he feel,
No grating on his vessel's keel ;
A strip of silver sand
Mingled the waters with the land
Where he was seen no more :
O, stern word, never more !

Full short his journey was ; no dust
Of earth unto his sandals gave ;
The weary weight that old men must,
He bore not to the grave :
He seemed a cherub who had lost his way,
And wandered hither ; so his stay
With us was short, and 't was most meet
That he should be no deliver in earth's clod,
Nor need to pause and cleanse his feet,
To stand before his God.

After that extended period, and for six months subsequently, notes in even hundreds of rupees will be converted only at a premium of two rupees per cent.

THE Treaty of 1880 for a Customs Union between British India and Portuguese India, by which the latter came to be treated for Customs purposes as British India, expired on the 14th January last. The Treaty not being renewed, the Portuguese possessions must, from the 15th January, be considered as foreign territory and the Indian Tariff Act, 1882, has been amended to allow the levy of duties of Customs on goods passing by land out of or into foreign European Settlements bordering on any part of the territories administered by the Governor of Bombay in Council.

SRI Runga Chary, who successfully prosecuted the ex-Mohunt of Tirupati, has filed three suits in the North Arcot District Court for the dismissal of both the old and the new Mohunt of the Tirupati from the office of Trustees of the Tirupati Temple. He has besides, with the permission of the Advocate-General, sued for settling a new scheme of management of the said Temple and its property.

THE Nagpore paper has been earnestly advocating the formation of a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals at Nagpore. Our contemporary shows ample work for such a humane institution. Such an institution indeed is required in every civilized centre, to check the ill usage to which the lower animals are liable from the selfishness and brutality of irresistible man. But a S. P. C. A. can do little unless the law protect the lower animal world. We trust there is legislative provision in the Central Provinces in this behalf. We hope the enlightened members of the community, of all races and creeds, will attend to the subject and do their duty by their dumb brethren.

MISS Cornelia Sorabjee, a young Parsee lady, has contributed a short paper to the Nineteenth Century headed, modestly enough, "Stray Thoughts of an Indian Girl." She confines herself to two subjects, and these are, of course, Infant Marriage and Widow Marriage. However, she is no fire-eating blue-stocking, but writes not only with the modesty which befits a young lady, not to say girl, but also with the sense of responsibility of one who knows Indian society and specially Parsee homes. Thus she says—"The liberty of English girls is constantly being quoted in comparison with the infant marriages of Indian children, but you might as well start a mission to clothe the children of tropical regions in furs, because English children suffer from the severity of a northern winter." Infant marriages, she asserts, turn out happily as a rule, and she pleads for caution and patience. She is evidently against interfering with a system closely mixed up with the people's religion. Seeing that she gives from 13 to 18 as the age at which betrothed girls are married, we conclude that she is unacquainted with the practice in Bengal. Miss Sorabji thinks that the law can do little to promote the marriage of widows. She relies more on the efforts of the National Congress.

OUR readers may be aware that a mosque has been opened at Liverpool a few months ago. On December 4, the first marriage was held in it. An Indian barrister, Sheikh Meeran Buksh, graduate of the Lahore University, Punjab, India, and of Gray's Inn, London, was united to Miss Amelia Davies, of Lansdowne Terrace, Russell Square, London, a convert to Islam. They were first taken to the reading room of the mosque, where the preliminary details as to dower, &c., were arranged. Then the bridal party entered the mosque, where they were made man and wife by the English moollah.

THE congregation of the mosque in question have not a happy time of it. The Christians of Liverpool are showing their love of liberty and fairplay by sending their roughs to bombard the new place of worship and attack the worshippers with brickbats and rotten eggs.

UNDER its present management, the Victoria Institute is doing very well, and bids fair to take the shine out of the older institutions of the kind. The December meeting, held under the lead of the distinguished president, Sir George Stokes, Bart., M.P., V.P.R.S., was a great success. The principal business was the reading by Dr. Tisdall of a paper on "Islam ; its Origin, Strength and Weakness." After showing the extent of territory covered by Islam, the Doctor reviewed the different estimates formed by European writers respecting its true nature. He then inquired into the origin and true character of the religion founded by Mahomed. According to him, Islam is a corrupt form of latter-day Judaism, with which ideas and practices derived from Arabian and Persian heathenism, and in one or two instances from Christian heretics, have been mingled. Relying chiefly upon Ibn Ishag, Ibn Hisham, and Ash Shahristani, he indicated the degree to which Mahomed submitted to each of these influences. He compared the Quran with the Talmud and the Zend Avesta. He next went into the question of the strength and the weakness of Islam. In his view, the system is a strange medley of truth and falsehood. Lastly, he dwelt upon the conflict between religion and morality in the religion of the "Prophet," and briefly referred to the evil influence which Islam has ever exercised and still exercises over the lands where it holds sway. That of course is the Nazarene's view. It ignores the great blessings conferred on the world by the creed of Mahomed. In Asia and Africa, Islam has been a great civiliser. Even Europe owes something to the Moors of Spain and the Saracens whom the Crusaders fought. A long and animated discussion followed, in which many well-known Orientalists took part. Notice was given that, at the January meeting, Dr. Hall, the master of Downing College, Cambridge, would read a paper.

THE Lieutenant-Governor had been to Burdwan. He leaves Calcutta on the 9th February for the Cuttack tour. He will be accompanied throughout the tour by the Senior Member of the Board of Revenue, the officiating Chief Secretary, the Revenue Secretary and the Private Secretary. The party leave Sealdah by rail at 8-30 A.M., take steamer at Diamond Harbour, and reach Nulcool on the 10th. Thence by canal to Balasore. Next by road to Soroh on the 13th and Bhadrack on the 14th. Again by canal to Jajpore on the 15th and Cuttack on the 17th. By road to Koordah on the 20th and Piply on the 22nd and Pooree on the 23rd. Thence by S. S. Guide to Calcutta, reaching it on the 26th at 12 noon.

AS was anticipated, the prosecution of Baboo Anundo Chunder Roy, the well-known Dacca Pleader, and his servant, Madhubdas, fell through. The jury returned a unanimous verdict of not guilty. The Pleader was never doubtful of his success if tried by the High Court. It has, however, been a ruinous trial to him. He had not only to expend freely, but himself fell ill before the trial concluded.

AN Upper Indian contemporary writes:—

"Not much attention is paid by the home press so far to the operations in Kanjut. Dr. Leitner informs the British public that he himself could easily have effected a settlement with the tribesmen. The Daily News explains that the Kanjutis are only fighting now as some wild men in Oudh fought when our pioneers first entered that State. They have learned from the fate of Oudh and the Punjab that pick and shovel only mean annexation. It adds: 'It is plain enough that one of the last neutral zones between Russia and Afghanistan is quite lost, and that between Russia and British India is about to disappear. The nation should be taken fully into the Government's confidence.'"

What! are the Kanojias and Pooroo-beahs, the Hindu and Mussulmans of Lucknow and Fyzabad a set of savages? Or else, who were the "wild men" in Oudh and when and where did they fight? And who are the British pioneers?

That extract is a fair sample of the Indian knowledge of the best organs in the British press.

A CORRESPONDENT writes from Rampore Beaulah, Rajshyhe:—

On last Sunday afternoon almost all the influential Mahomedan residents of this place assembled together under the presidentship of Moulvie Syud Mahomed, Khan Bahadur, Deputy Magistrate, at the residence of Moulvie Tafazzul Hossain, Vice-Chairman of the local municipality, to consider what steps should be taken for expressing their loyal and sincere sympathy, and offering their heartfelt condolence to Her Majesty the Queen-Empress, and their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, on the disastrous domestic calamity that has overtaken the Royal Family of England. After a short but most touching speech from the chair on the most unexpected event and the deeply melancholy circumstances under which the young Duke of Clarence and Avondale has been snatched away by the cruel hand of death, the following resolution was passed:—

That a telegraphic message be sent to His Excellency the Viceroy to the effect that the Mahomedans of this place have come to know with the deepest regret and the profoundest sorrow, of the sad, sudden, and most lamented death of H. R. H. the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, and they, in meeting assembled, most respectfully offer their most loyal sympathy and their most heartfelt condolence to Her Majesty the Queen-Empress, their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family, on this sad and melancholy occasion.

The following day a telegram containing the purport of the above resolution was sent to the Private Secretary to the Viceroy.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

A SPECIAL London Gazette just issued contains letters from the Queen to Mr. Mathews, the Home Secretary, in which Her Majesty says:—

"I must re-affirm my deep sense of the loyalty and affectionate sympathy of my subjects in every part of the Empire, shown on an occasion more sad and tragical than any but one which has befallen me and mine or the nation. The sudden cutting off of my beloved grandson, so full of promise and of amiable and gentle disposition, renders it hard to his sorely-stricken parents, his dear young bride, and his grandmother, who bow to the inscrutable decrees of Providence. The sympathy of millions so touchingly expressed is deeply gratifying, and I wish to express my heartfelt gratitude to all. These evidences of sympathy with us and the appreciation of my grandson, whose devotion to me was equal to that of my sons, are a help and solace to me and mine. My bereavements during the last thirty years have been, indeed, heavy, but although my labours, anxieties, and responsibilities have been great, my earnest prayer is that God may continue to give me help and strength to work for the good and happiness of my dear country while life lasts."

ANOTHER of the people's representatives is in a bad way. Mr. Hastings, M.P., charged with embezzlement of trust funds, has been committed for trial, but let out on bail of £20,000. In India, the courts, specially the lower ones, are not always so considerate. At the best they play into the hands of the lawyers. The practice seems to be for Magistrates to refuse bail simply because the offence is non-bailable, leaving it to the High Court to exercise the discretion given by law to order bail.

INFLUENZA is making a great havoc in London. For the three weeks before the last mail left England, the deaths were progressively, 8, 17 and 19. Next week, the number went up to 37. For the last week, the number is as high as 506, or twice as much as in the previous fortnight. The death-rate in Dublin has increased to 54, and in Brighton to 61 per thousand of the population. A Royal Commission may issue to enquire into the origin and causes of influenza.

There have been several cases in and around Calcutta, and the disease is spreading.

Dr. Richard Pfeiffer, a son-in-law of Professor Robert Koch and Director of the scientific section of the Imperial Institute for Infectious Diseases in Berlin, claims to have discovered the influenza bacillus, having successfully transplanted it in six cases. While he found a peculiar microbe in the sputum, a young doctor of the Moabit Hospital in Berlin traced the same in the blood of influenza patients. Supposing the cause is accepted, what is the remedy?

THE retired Brigade Surgeon G. Yates Hunter, Bombay Army, now of 48, Philbeach-gardens, S. W., thus speaks of a cure or rather a preventive:—

"Last spring, when influenza raged in a virulent form at Sheffield and elsewhere, I advocated the use of 'Halviva' as a cure, or, better still, as a preventive. The remedy was largely tried, and with most satisfactory results, as abundant testimony proves.

I had considerable experience in India of the virtue of the plant, from which 'Halviva' is prepared; in malarial fever and nervous exhaustion, it acts like quinine, but more safely. Hence I believe its value in influenza, which, judging from the nature of the accompanying fever, the back-ache and other symptoms, would seem to be of malarial origin. I brought this medicine before the profession through the medical press in the first instance, and numerous medical men have shown their high estimate of it by prescribing it, and others by dispensing it.

Prevention is better than cure; so I advise all, especially those who are employers of labour and those interested in the well-being of the poor, who furnish so many victims, to give it a trial. It builds up the powers of resistance, and a little goes a long way."

"C. J. H. W.," of Calcutta, explains in the Englishman that

"Halviva is the Andropogon paniculata, Wall. According to the authors of the Pharmacographia, it is more or less known in Indian bazaars by the name of chiretta, a designation under which other species of ophelia than the true chiretta and Exacum are also vended."

"Sherbrook" testifies to the efficacy of the drug thus:—

"I can well substantiate Brigade Surgeon Yates Hunter's remedy 'Halviva' as a cure for malarial fever and ague. In fact, I believe it to be far better than quinine, as the medicine is administered while the fever is on, and appears to have no after effects. During the last rains I made a tincture from the plant, and gave it out gratis to some hundreds of poor cases, which, I am glad to say, proved a cure in almost every case. Should Mr. Thurston desire to obtain a small bottle of the tincture, he can have it by sending to me through your agency. The plant being valuable, I must decline to give it up."

ALL the newspapers in the Empire have gone into mourning for the death of the Duke of Clarence and Avondale. The native papers in India, English and in Vernacular, have vied with one another in their loyalty to the throne. Bombay as usual has most distinguished herself in her press as well as her public bodies and representative men. The Rast Goftar has come out with a portrait of the deceased Prince. The latter-press of all the journals is, of course, pitched in a superlative key of passion. One respectable diglot in its English columns, taking a wider survey of the havoc caused by death, has sunk into a climax of grief in the following terms:—

"The death of Prince Albert is a loss to the Empire, the death of Cardinal Manning to the Church, and that of Pandit Ajodhyanath to India and the Congress movement."

THE accomplished scholar who contributes to the Times of India under the signature "Pen," appears to have gone to England. He hence writes at Christmas time:—

"That one should look half regretfully towards India as Christmas time approaches is, I suppose, a little inconsistent, but the fact is that all the hard things that are said about India are said in India. One never meets any Anglo-Indian at home who does not speak with kindness and even with affection of the country where his best days have been passed, where all his warmest friendships have been formed, where he has spent so many happy years. A man may be very happy at home but he cannot forget the fascination of the East,—'the splendour and havoc of the East,' as Kinglake calls it in Etöthen. Those who have retired for good would fain have another spell of the work and bustle of the old Indian days, and envy those who are returning to duty there. And at this time of the year one recalls former Christmas days spent with friends now far distant, and with all one's heart one wishes them good luck and prosperity in the coming year."

That is the honest truth. The Anglo-Indians have usually little to fall back upon in the old country. Their tie with it is merely sentimental. On the other hand, the East is the scene of their happiness as well as the theatre of their glory. Notwithstanding, from a viciousness common to the kind and most developed in the British, while here they delight to fret at the country and cavil at all its belongings, and altogether lash themselves into something very like real misery. They love to dwell on the great prospects they would fain believe they sacrificed in electing an Indian career, and on the imaginary bliss they promise themselves on their return. Thus lightly, they or the sillier of them, embark on board on their retirement. The reflections on the homeward voyage sober them somewhat. Once on terra firma, an hour of actual English experience completes the disillusion. Before long, the patriotic returned exile longs for the dirty, nasty, sun-tortured East, the home of malaria, the cholera, "those oleaginous natives," the unspeakable Baboo, and the depreciated Rupee.

THE late Duke of Devonshire whose place in the British Peerage has fallen to his son, hitherto Lord Hartington, will in all human probability be followed to the grave by a whilom Dowager of the house whose misfortune gave him the chance of stepping into the Dukedom. For, after a protracted illness, she is now at the point of death at her retreat at Madeira. We refer to the Princess of the Imperial House of Russia, who fell in love with the handsome Ambassador of Britannic Majesty at the court of St. Petersburg. The Duke of Devonshire, who was the Ambassador, and the Princess Romanoff were quietly married in a Roman Catholic Church without the privity of the Emperor. They knew the offence involved in this sort of union under the rose. But they could not hope for the Emperor allowing a lady of his house to marry beneath her. Nor could they expect an ecclesiastic of the established Greek Church to unite them without such permission. On the other hand, they were too far gone mad in love—holy love—to leave their hearts and hearth and all happiness at the mercy of despots. Hence the step they took. When the Czar was apprized of the marriage, he flew into a rage, just as Napoleon did when news came from beyond the main of a Bonaparte's wedding an American girl. The mighty upstart at the head of France, who cherished the vision of introducing his despised Corsicans into the royal caste, by forcing them upon the great reigning Houses of Europe, nullified the latter marriage, and forbade Miss Paterson, the bride, entering France. The sovereign Romanoff declared the Princess Romanoff's union with the Englishman ipso facto void. But marriage or no marriage, they would not part, and when the English lord returned to his native country, the Russian Princess followed him. There they lived as man and wife, whatever the dictum of the Czar or the effect of the Conflict of Laws respecting their conjugal status. To clear the legal difficulty, they were advised to perform their marriage anew in England, in a Protestant church. The gentleman was willing, but the lady would not hear of it. Already duly united in holy wedlock in a Christian church, the Princess naturally revolted from a step which were tantamount to an acknowledgment on her part that she had been sinning with her husband! How, again, could she have the heart to proscribe her own innocent offspring, branding them with bastardy? Poor woman! her situation was desperate. There was no escape from a dire alternative. At last she submitted to the lesser evil, electing to condemn her past so as to save the future, and abandoning the children born to her to secure the rights and happiness of those that might thereafter be born. Thus they were married over again, under happier auspices, before the whole world. In due course, the reunion was blessed with a son and heir to the father's domains. Unfortunately that son lost his life by a fall from his horse. That accident advanced Lord William Cavendish to the heirship. Him Lord Hartington has just succeeded.

THE Englishman's Lady Correspondent, writing from London on New Year's Day, skims the cream of an account of the Royal kennel published in the Stock-keeper [sic.] Journal. The arrangements for Her Majesty's canine establishment are on a profuse and sumptuous scale and, though there are keepers and overseers and inspectors in any number, the Queen-Empress herself superintends it. There are dogs of many and various species, but she fancies Spitzes and Collies most. And yet not only all the breeds but every specimen and each individual share the royal kindness and care enough. From birth and, if possible, before, to death and after, they are equally served. It may be imagined with what intelligent sympathy the female kind of the kennel while in an interesting condition are treated on the establishment of the royal mother. Her Majesty loves to—may we say christen the dogs? Perhaps we may, for Her Majesty gives them something like a decent Christian burial. Well fed and thoroughly cared for as they are, living in dry and well-ventilated quarters, protected from wind and weather, physicked according to need, treated medically and nursed in sickness, finally, after life's fitful fever, they sleep well beneath the turf of their playground, having tablets to their memories raised over them. How many thousands, not to say millions, of Her Majesty's subjects must envy the lot of these lucky creatures! It is not added that the Poet Laureate is commanded to supply elegies. No matter; there are poetsasters in the Household enough to do the needful, in the cases at least of special favorites. We have little doubt that their portraits are taken, as those of the more favored menials of Her Majesty's Indian Viceroy.

Love of children has always been recognised as a mark of a good nature. Love of animals is, we think, a surer indication. Children are near to us and appeal directly to our feelings. Miniature humans naturally interest humanity at full length. After all, we vicariously love our own children in others, though unconsciously perhaps. There is no such consideration in the other case. There is no such tie between man and the brutes or beasts as they are contemptuously called. His kindness for them is, therefore, simply gratuitous—perfectly unselfish. Children should be encouraged to love the dumb harmless creatures about them by way of schooling them in the charities of life. We know no better moral training. Would that the officers of the Department of Public Instruction and school teachers and all who have the formation of youth in their hands kindly accepted this simple recipe and applied it within the sphere of their influence!

To us Indians, loyal by instinct and creed, this morality recommends itself with all the greater force from the example of the throne. The whole Royal Family are kind to animals. It is said in the Englishman's London letter that the Queen is assisted in the superintendence of the kennel by the Princess Beatrice. The whole Household take an interest in the work. Her Majesty's love of animals and specially dogs, is no new thing. Her intelligent interest in the lower world of being was the means of drawing out of obscurity to the fore front a unique but modest literary genius of sterling worth. Many of our readers must be acquainted with "Rab and His Friends," but not many, we believe, know the history of the narrative. It appeared originally as an article in a long defunct but once-distinguished serial, the North British Review. As such it was not much regarded by the public, until it attracted the royal notice. Many a learned Dryasdust doubtless thought that a description of a dogfight might be literature proper for Southern Europeans—for the bull-fight-loving Spaniards, for instance—but not for the humane and respectable British. Stiff Presbyterianism probably resented it as a degradation of its special organ. The sovereign knew better. It was the finest thing that ever appeared in a journal enriched by the thought and scholarship of all the leading Scotchmen, a production of which Scotland may always be proud. Her Majesty was at once struck by the tender vivacity, the humour and pathos, the power of individualising members of the lower animal world. She discerned the hand of a new genius, and she sent to the conductors to enquire about the authorship. All at once Dr. John Brown emerged into fame. The Royal admiration was soon echoed by the great world at large. The publishers reaped a rich harvest. Successive editions of the periodical were exhausted and finally Rab and His Friends appeared in the glory of separate publication. It is a mere dog sketch. A genuine love of animals is the secret of its power, and the same love led to its recognition. Brown was a profound man of science, a subtle philosopher, and an original speculator, with a delicate taste in Art and Belles Lettres, but he never produced anything equal to his first effort. For that, besides being famous, he received a pension of £300 a year from the royal bounty.

THE Saturday Review administers a sharp castigation to "society" journalism in the person of one of its leading exponents. Referring to "Labby's" unsensational exhibition of rude radicalism, it opened one of its recent issues with the following paragraph:—

"The progress of Prince George has been slow, but, it is hoped satisfactory. When he is well enough he will be able to amuse himself with the graceful pictorial tribute to his family which the editor of a 'Society paper' called Truth has produced under the guise of a 'Christmas number.' By the way, this publicist's pictorial reminiscences of the difference between 1841 and 1891, and his laudation of times past, might have been carried further. Mr. Grantley Berkeley, and other people who knew how to treat 'Society' journalists, though they may have made mistakes as to the culprits, were alive in 1841. Yet we are not wholly degenerate; and it is rumoured that there are still among us some of the tribe whose shoulders have felt the cane."

We are afraid few readers in these days, specially here so far abroad, will understand the allusion which conveys the punishment. Mr. Grantley Berkeley was a man of society and a fashionable novelist whose novels have long since been forgotten, but who is still remembered by his social adventures and his autobiographical reminiscences and his anecdotes of the upper ten thousand. His very works of fiction breathed the self-consciousness of a scion of aristocracy and his own house. This is particularly true of "Berkeley Castle," in which his ancestors are offensively exalted beyond the bounds of common partiality. The same story is disfigured by other errors of taste. In fact, it is not a very delicate production, though that is a rather common reproach against fashionable and sensational literature. But, whatever the measure of its faults, the book was treated by the press with excessive virulence. Those were the days of literary vivisectionists who carried on their operations without recourse to the use of anaesthetics or anodynes. Fraser's Magazine in particular was savage upon "Berkeley Castle." Not only was the book condemned as vain and immoral, full of "bestialities," and an insult to the lady to whom it was dedicated, but the author was pursued with extraordinary bitterness and loaded with contempt. Coarseness and want of truth as well as of honour were freely imputed, and the very secrets of his birth and parentage unearthed for the purpose of insulting him. Mr. Berkeley was stung to fury by the onslaught. Those were the days of violence in deed as well as in word, and Mr. Berkeley was known to be a fire-eater. Had he thought his assailant a worthy foe, he would have called him out. Instead, he went directly to the office of the Magazine.

But not quite as a hero. In fact, he justified by his conduct the imputation of poltroonery. He took another Berkeley with him and, what is significant, a British goonda—a mercenary London brave—and, whip in hand, marched to the sanctum sanctorum of literature and there

Holloway's Pills are securities of health to all nations, of whatever clime. They have given hope, relief, and comfort to millions. In irritation and debility, generated by excesses of any kind, or in general prostration of the system, their effect is rapidly soothing, renovating, and restorative. They rapidly drive from the system the morbid cause of ailment, and renew in the frame its pristine animation, health, and vigour. They greatly increase the appetite, give tone to the stomach, assist the digestion, and impart elasticity to the spirits; their essence enters the circulation and carried through its course exerts its cleansing power over every organ. In the lungs they effect most striking changes, converting the impure venous into pure arterial blood, by which the whole frame is recruited.

attacked Mr. Fraser. The unprepared and astonished publisher was ferociously belaboured within an inch of his life. It was a mad business and a blunder. Mr. Grantley Berkeley, as he thought, executed vengeance on his critic, but he had got hold of the wrong man. Poor Fraser was a vicarious sacrifice. He was incapable of the criticism which, whatever may be thought of its temper or taste, is a work of genius. Dastardly as the proceeding was, its heinousness was aggravated by the remorseless violence being heaped on the innocent. Fraser, according to the British way, sought for pecuniary compensation in court and obtained £100 with costs. Mr. Grantley Berkeley, not satisfied with breaking his heavy whip on Mr. Fraser, sued him for libel, and, strangely enough, he got a verdict, however nominal, of 40 shillings, each side bearing its own costs.

Mr. Grantley Berkeley now burned to punish his real enemy—as he regarded his critic. Dr. Maginn avowed himself to be the author of the critique on "Berkeley Castle." He was challenged to a combat. That Bohemian was as ready with the pistol as with the pen. Accordingly, a duel was arranged between them and fought—not to the bitter end, God be thanked! Three shots were exchanged without drawing blood, and the irascible novelist was satisfied.

AN ADMINISTRATIVE BLUNDER:

OR,

THE STORY OF A SACRIFICE.

SINCE some time we have lying before us the papers of a very extraordinary case of dismissal of a public servant. An able ministerial officer, having served in almost every subordinate grade, rose at last to the head of the establishment, becoming what is called Sheristadar or Registrar of the Subordinate Judge's Court of a near district. While serving as Sheristadar, he incurred the ill will of a particular Sub-Judge in connection with certain circumstances that do not, to say the least, redound to the credit of the superior. We refrain from mentioning names. But this much should be added that, of all public servants, judicial officers in particular should be very circumspect about their private character, especially in relation to the other sex. The Sub-Judge of whom we are speaking enjoys an unenviable reputation in this respect. An Etien or a Cordery may offend for love however illicit and opposed to one of the especial commandments on the Mount. A Chaki or a Talapatra may drown his sense for once in a friendly entertainment and even come to blows with each other or with menials keeping guard over affrighted womankind. A Government may overlook such sprees occurring as they do once in a decade. It is quite a different thing to overlook ungallant gallantry that is, besides, almost systematic and swinish inebriation desecrating the temple that is exclusively dedicated to the goddess of the sword and the scales, although such desecration may be perpetrated under cover of the night. To be brief, the Sub-Judge, as the result of the counsels of his Peshkar, the boon companion of his nocturnal revels, came to hate his chief ministerial officer whose only fault was that he had succeeded in rescuing his superior from the clutches of certain stalwart Caboolis and Mussulmans who had, at depth of night, tracked the nika wife of one amongst themselves to the Court-house, and who, on that account, had invested it closely and were waiting for the great minister of justice to come out of the sanctuary. The men were sent away with difficulty, and with difficulty the Sub-Judge was smuggled into his own lodgings. The Peshkar received a sound drubbing. Believing, at the instance of that wily satellite, that the attack and the rescue had both been pre-arranged by the Sheristadar, the judicial officer from that day began to seek for a pretext for breaking his benefactor. One was soon found. The intended victim had been examined as a witness in his court. The litigant against whom the deposition went was easily persuaded to prosecute the witness for perjury. The necessary sanction required by law was accorded by the Sub-Judge. The circumstances connected with the grant of that sanction, are simply extraordinary. The petition praying for it was actually kept pending for thirteen months. The reasons assigned for the successive adjournments are perfectly idiotic. For all that, there was method in the madness. The victim was well known to Sir Rivers Thompson, and it was feared that if dismissed during Sir Rivers Thompson's rule, he might be restored to his appointment. The scandal in connection with the grant of this sanction was perfectly nauseating. The victim appealed to the High Court. The Sub-Judge himself fee'd Counsel for opposing the appeal. The High Court rejected it upon technical grounds. But now the party who had obtained the sanction, and who knew its value, was found unwilling to institute the complaint. The victim, however, in his own clearance and interest, forced him to commence the prosecution. A regular trial followed, with the result that the accused was cleared and the accuser lost his character.

Before the trial had commenced, the Sub-Judge had endeavoured to tamper with the officer who was to have tried it. He met with a proper rebuff in that quarter. While the sanction was still hanging upon the head of his victim, the Sub-Judge, fully conscious of the fact that the principal ground, viz., the establishment of perjury, against his victim, would slip away from under his feet, addressed some confidential communications to two District Judges successively. One of the latter, (to anticipate the details,) so ill understood his duties that he not only refused to grant copies of those letters to the principal party concerned when the latter subsequently applied for them, but took the extraordinary precaution of collecting them together and actually sealing them up for deposit amid the public records of his Court. Prince Talleyrand and Lord Dalhousie directed their respective papers, private documents over which they had the fullest control, to be sealed up for only half a century. Here, however, was a Civilian Judge who directed a public document to be sealed for an indefinite period, never providing for any contingency in view of which it might, at any future time, be opened even once. The only circumstance omitted was a curse denounced on the hands that would break the cover put by Solomon. His successor, upon a renewed application for copies, ordered the seal to be broken, remarking that he had never before come across such an endeavour at concealment of the contents of a judicial record. It is said that the present Chief Justice had heard some particulars about the case and promptly applied the recognised Anglo-Indian panacea for all kinds of administrative evil by transferring the offending Sub-Judge to another station. But before the man could think of joining his new appointment, there was the victim whose fate should be determined. His last act was to address another confidential letter to the locum tenens of the permanent head of the District judiciary. That officer, however, had kept his head. Very properly he refused to take any action, as the criminal prosecution for perjury was then pending.

In due course, the permanent incumbent returned, he who was for sealing up the departmental accusations against the innocent victim. With a frame of mind that requires no messenger from heaven to explain, he took up an intermediate petition that the suspended Sheristadar made to him. That petition was by way of appeal from an order of a new Subordinate Judge recommending that the suspended officer might be appointed to an inferior post pending the result of the criminal trial, specially as the departmental charges against him were not of a serious character. The appeal against this order, after having been kept for about half a year, was disposed of by the District Judge in simply an unprecedented manner. The appellant was refused the privilege of pleader's assistance in explaining his case. The Judge, having heard him on the petition, opened a mine upon him by judging his case upon grounds not even remotely mentioned in any document before him and upon which, therefore, the appellant had not at all been heard. The Sheristadar was dismissed. It was practically and essentially like a conviction for smuggling in a trial for nuisance or battery. To crown the irregularity and the cruelty, the order of dismissal was given a retrospective operation by a whole year and a half.

We come now to another phase of this remarkable case. The poor officer, thus removed from his appointment after a service of 29 years, appealed to the Government of Bengal. He pointed out that he had been dismissed in the very teeth of the standing order of the Honorable Court of Directors and the Government of India laying it down that no public servant should be dismissed without the charges against him being reduced into writing and without being heard in his defence. Unfortunately for him, he was simple enough to believe that a Civilian Secretariat would undo what a brother Civilian of the Judicial Department had done. He did not know that any number of standing orders that the Viceroy, or, for that matter, the very Secretary of State, might fulminate against illegal practices, are sure to be more honored in the breach than in the observance. The case had created an extraordinary sensation in the District. Hundreds of respectable persons, all of whom knew and know the real facts, testified to the innocence of the victim, and prayed for a proper enquiry. These expressions of opinion were quietly shelved in the capacious pigeon holes of the Under Secretary's desk, and the brief order was passed—"Declines to interfere." It was a weak administration that could thus seek to hush up a grave administrative scandal and resolve to keep such a Sub-Judge on the judicial seat. Struck dumb by the extraordinary injustice of the order, the victim addressed a memorial to the Viceroy. It is an able document. It disposes of every pretension against the memorialist's conduct with a calmness and force of argument that are rarely to be noticed in documents of a similar character addressed to Indian officials. In the appendices the gravest statements are made against the dismissing superior. The prayer with which it concludes is that if his Excellency thinks that the case is one of details, it may be sent to either the High Court or the present District Judge for report after a full hearing. The Government of Bengal, however, is resolute. The Chief Secretary, with perhaps a latent kindness for the memorialist, suggested that the latter should be taken at his word by being prosecuted in a criminal court. The Lieutenant-Governor, however, knows what is what. Never doubting that the charges are true, the Provincial representative of the Viceroy, is for saving the prestige of the administration by refusing to send up the memorial, lest, like Lord Dufferin in a similar case brought to his notice, the liberal nobleman now at the head of the Indian Government hears of the matter and remedies the wrong perpetrated in the name of a weak administration. The ostensible reason assigned for the refusal is that there is little chance of the orders of the Local Government being upset. The technical ground is, of course, added by some observant underling that the memorialist, while in service, drew a pay that was less than Rs. 100. The rights of such a servant can, under the so-called rules for the transmission of petitions, be safely trampled upon. This reply has called forth a second letter from the victim. Never, perhaps, has the Secretariat received another communication of the kind in a case of dismissal of a public servant. Official obstinacy ought to yield to it. We may give the document to our readers in a future issue. Our dissatisfaction with the Congress is that it seeks to invade new ground while what has been already won is difficult to keep. Is it too much to hope that Lord Lansdowne will, like his great predecessor in a similar case, call up the record of this unprecedented attempt at hushing up a grave administrative scandal?

ALMOST the only visible achievement of the Calcutta society called the Zemindari Panchayet, has been the starting of a monthly serial in Bengali and even that, we regret to see, is far from punctual in its periodical appearance. There are signs of active exertion again, however, as we have just received the fourth and the fifth numbers for Aswin and Kartik, 1298, Bengal Era, stitched together in one cover. We hope the society will not relax its efforts but try to clear the remaining arrears by bringing out soon the next three issues. A monthly magazine behind time by a quarter of a year, is an obvious anachronism, an anachronism particularly emphasised in the portion devoted to news. Thus, we are treated in this issue to public intelligence full half a year old. For instance, at p. 100, we are told that there was a depression in trade in England in the month of August last, that mercantile men were seeking the cause thereof, that some were of opinion that in consequence of diminished harvests throughout Europe the price of agricultural produce went up to the discontent and turbulence of the working classes, &c., while others held that the rise was no temporary effect of short production but a permanent symptom of a commercial revolution. This and such other obsolete views have an absurd appearance without doing anybody the slightest good. We would advise the conductors to eschew this sort of make-believe and trifling with the public. Nothing like straightforwardness. Let them have the courage to accept their unfortunate position. They need not attempt a chronicle till they are once more abreast of the times. But whatever they do, accuracy should be their first care. Let them remember that theirs is a magazine, appearing not even month after month, but at true Zemindari—lordly leisure. The Native political press in Bengal has of late years been deteriorating in character, and the vernacular press has for the moment lost all credit. There are, however, or at least ought to be, Patrikas and Patrikas, and under any circumstances the Patrika under notice, the monthly organ of the Zemindari Panchayet, should be careful both in statement and in language. Such unmeaning expressions as "India's very excellent (hitaishi) Secretary Mr. Cotton," ought to have no place in a well-edited serial.

The present double number contains in its 48 pages fourteen papers. The most ambitious of them is the opening article from the pen of Baboo Dwijendra Nath Tagore, the philosopher of the Adi Brahmo Samaj. It is entitled the "Treatment of the Diseases of society according to Hindu (Sanskrit) Therapeutics." The description of the lapse of the body social from health to sickness in the terms of indigenous physiology, is very clever, but necessarily laboured, and has an oppressive effect like that of a long-drawn-out allegory. The teaching is, of course, vague, specially for the mere Bengali reader. Indeed, we doubt whether the generality of English educated Bengalis, who are not tolerably familiar with the Hindu system of medicine, will be able to follow the writer. We have great respect for Babu Dwijendra Nath Tagore both as a man and as an author. We have always delighted in his lectures and essays. No man among us can make a point better. Acute in analysis, he is rich in humour. When he condescends to alight on solid earth, he is a formidable fighter as well as an admirable teacher. But much of his present exercise seems a waste of power. He is not happy in his European illustration nor accurate in his Indian social history. The idea that Rousseau and Voltaire were the causes of the French Revolution, is a very old error. It was exploded as early as the very commencement of the present century, by no less an authority than Mons. J. J. Mounier, the popular President of the first French National Assembly, in his book on the Supposed Influence of the Philosophers, the Free-Masons, and the Illuminati on the French Revolution. Later in our century, De Tocqueville's careful inquiry dealt the finishing stroke to the theory. How, again, comes the grandson of Dwarka Nath Tagore to assert that, half a century ago, beyond one or two extraordinary men, no body among us believed that English education could be good for anything but money making? What! was the state of things so low in 1840? Why, at that time the Derozio of whom the writer himself speaks as the powerful mover of the Hindu mind, had been dead more than ten years. By that time there was quite a milky way on our firmament, not counting the writer's own grandfather. There were not only Rajas Radhakanta and Kali Krishna Bahadoors and Ramcomul Sen of the old Orthodox school, and Prosunno Coomar Tagore, Radha Madhub Banerjee, Ramanath Tagore, and Russomoy Dutt of the old Liberal school, but also Tara Chand Chuckerbutty, Chunder Sekhur Deb, Russick Krishna Mullick, Kashiprasad Ghosh, K. M. Banerjee, Dukhinanrunjun Mookerjee, Ram Gopal Ghose, Ram Tanu Lahiri, Gunga Narain Sen, R. J. Narain Dutt, Rijinder Dutt, Peary Chand Mittra, Tarini Charan Banerjee, and dozens of others whom we could name. Even at an earlier period, in 1816, when the first seminary for the higher education of the Hindus in English was founded, there were, besides the prodigy Ram Mohun Roy, an appreciable minority who were above the Rupee view of education. Otherwise, there would have been no Hindu College. That institution was established by the leading Hindus of Calcutta and the Maharaja of Burdwan and with their money. And from the most honorable motives, without any eye to the main chance. They do not know who think otherwise.

There are some useful articles, however, in the number—like the Culture of the Potato, the Indian Cultivator, &c.

MOFUSSIL MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Will you or any of your numerous readers kindly let me know through your medium, whether a member of a Hindu joint family paying municipal tax for a holding (which may or may not be Benami) assessed in his name, is eligible either as a voter or a candidate for the Commissionership of any mofussil municipality.

Azinganj, January 29.

* * There seems in law no bar to such member's being a voter or standing for election, provided he is otherwise qualified—by sex, age and residence. Of course, he must have paid the rates or taxes to the required amount for the required period.—ED. R. & R.

QUEER TASTES AND APPETITE:

OR

MODERN RAKSHIASES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The following extract from the Clinical Department of an American medical journal may be of interest to your readers. It is headed A Soap eater, and is from the pen of R. Ellis, Esq., M.D., practising in Danbury, Connecticut (U. S.).

"I should like to place on record the history of the following case of a mania for soap-eating, which I believe deserves the coinage of the word sopessomania, or a mania for eating soap.

Mrs. J.—, aged twenty-nine, consults me in reference to an irritable stomach of long standing. She gives the following details. When about three years of age, she first enjoyed a mouthful of bar-soap; so agreeable was the taste that she would eat it 'whenever she could get it.' When aged five years, her mother found her, spoon in hand, eating soft-soap with keen relish. As she grew in years, so did her yearning for soap; her playmates ate candy, but she preferred soap; her father brought home to the other children sweetmeats, but to equally satisfy her a piece from common bar-soap must be given. Until she was eleven her sopossomania continued. When awake she loved to handle it, and smell of it, and eat of it. When asleep she dreamed of soap. Often, to pacify her, a piece was given to her to hold in her hand to soothe her to sleep, when she continued in her imagination still to eat soap. At eleven her stomach burned her so that she stopped her habit, but still continued to love to handle and to think of eating the great delicacy.

"When twenty-three, or twelve years after her last feast, an advertising agent left at her door a five-cent bar of both-room soap, which pleased her so much that she ate it all in twenty-four hours. Since then she has eaten none, though there is always the desire to do so. Today, did not her stomach forbid, the yearning to 'eat some more' would be irresistible. Though she can no longer eat it, she still loves to handle it, she loves to use plenty of it in her house work and in her bath room. The smell of it is still sweet to her nostrils, and the thick ends she delights in remind her of the days gone by, never to return. Strange to say, she cares only for the coarse bar-soap; fancy soaps she never uses. Personally she is of nervous temperament, yet evidently a woman of much self-control. She asserts that her mania is as strong today as it was years ago, though she has tasted soap but once in eighteen years. Despite her statements, however, I believe she is still eating the little amount of soap which her irritable stomach will allow her."

Permit me to add to the above certain cases of a mania for eating raw fish. If a new word is to be coined, why may we not call it piscissomania? About a year ago a Brahman youth, aged about 23 years, laid a wager with a neighbour that he would eat a raw Hilsa fish or lose Rs. 3. He did the feat before many witnesses. The fish selected was a tolerably large one, weighing about a seer (2 lbs.). The incident created a sensation in my neighbourhood. I called the young man a few days after to my house and began to question him closely. Being his father's friend, he always shows me great respect. At first he seemed to be unwilling to answer all my questions. Gradually, however, his shyness disappeared and he owned to me that the smell of fish is not at all disagreeable to his nostrils; that since childhood he has eaten many a fish in a raw condition; that if a little salt were given him, he could live entirely on raw fish. He did not feel any irresistible impulse to eat raw fish. Only he could eat it and did not dislike it. This, Sir, may not be a case of piscissomania, but then the case I detail below is certainly a mania of the kind. A friend of mine gave the particulars while we were reading the American medical journal. My friend hails from a market-town in the 24-Pergunnahs. He is now about 48 years of age. While he was only 14, he had a companion and playmate of the same age and the same place, who felt an irresistible desire to eat raw fish, and, strange to say, always discovered a preference for bony fish like koi and chetal. (I do not know the scientific names of these, and hence I transliterate the vernacular words.) My friend added that his playmate was very often chided by his parents and brothers and others of the neighbourhood, but he always said that he could not help eating raw fish, so irresistible was the impulse he felt at their sight. The young man did not live long, for his life was cut short when he was nineteen. Yours, &c.

THE UNIVERSITY CONVOCATION.

THE CHANCELLOR'S SPEECH.

Lord Lansdowne, who on rising was received with applause, spoke as follows:—

Mr. Vice-Chancellor, Your Honor, Ladies and Gentlemen,—The annual Convocation of the University affords me an agreeable opportunity of meeting you, which I should be sorry to miss, and I must express my pleasure at finding myself once more in this chair. It will not be necessary for me to detain you for more than a very few moments, but there are one or two matters which I cannot leave unnoticed.

You will, I think, expect me, in the first place, to say one word of sympathy and regret in reference to the death of the young Prince who was taken from us last week. The sympathies of this University are naturally with the young, and in this case will certainly not be indifferent to the fate of one who in the very prime of his youth, and with a bright and splendid career before him, has been cut off so suddenly and under such melancholy circumstances. I am sure that you will share the sorrow of his parents, and that you will not forget that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales took an interest in this University, which in 1876 conferred upon him the honorary degree of a Doctor of Laws. I was glad to see, Mr. Vice-Chancellor, that the Senate at a recent meeting so appropriately took notice of this sad occurrence.

I have to congratulate the members of the University upon the fact that the Hon'ble Dr. Gooroo Das Banerjee has been good enough to accept re-appointment as Vice-Chancellor. (Applause.) He has, during the past two years, discharged the duties of his office with tact and judgment, and in a manner which has secured for him the confidence of the University. (Applause.) We are, I think, extremely fortunate in having prevailed upon him to accept re-appointment.

Mr. Vice-Chancellor, I have to thank the Graduates of the University, whom I have for the third time asked to aid me in the selection of the Fellows who will be appointed to fill up vacancies on the list, for the assistance they have given me. They have exercised their choice in a manner which has met with general approval. The two gentlemen whose names they have submitted to me, Babu Pran Nath Pundit and Babu Upendra Nath Mitra, are both of them men of eminence in their profession (applause), and have a record of literary and academical achievement which clearly points to their fitness for the honour which has been done them. (Applause.) Both of them, curiously enough, have been elected Tagore Law Professors at different times. Babu Pran Nath Pundit is a well-known Sanscrit scholar. Babu Upendra Nath Mitra was gold medalist of his year, and was for several years Law Lecturer in the Government College of Dacca, and has written a standard work upon a legal subject.

I may say in passing that I was gratified to find that you were able, in accordance with the suggestion which I ventured to make to you last year, to discover means by which Graduates in the Mofussil have been permitted to take part in the election of these gentlemen. I understand that out of 900 persons qualified to vote, 641 exercised the privilege conferred upon them, a sign that this particular franchise has a higher value set upon it by those who possess it than certain other franchises which I could mention.

The result of the experiment has been so successful that I am certainly not disposed to abandon it. But it may be said, "if the experiment has succeeded so well, why not go further?" Why not make the arrangement "a permanent one, and give it a statutory sanction?" We all know of course that recommendations have been submitted to the Government of India by the Senate of the University for a revision of the Act of Incorporation, and I think I am right in saying that the principal change recommended was a proposal that one-half of the total number of Fellows annually appointed should be elected by the Graduates. Gentlemen, I have proved by my actions since I have been connected with the University that there is no difference between myself and those who hold this language as to the propriety of giving the Graduates a voice in the selection of the Fellows. University legislation is, however, a very serious matter, and not to be undertaken without a good deal of thought and deliberation. In this particular instance you are confronted with a special difficulty, that of providing adequately for the representation of the minority, whose claims none of us would desire to ignore. There is also this to be remembered, that changes of the law affecting one University to a certain extent involve the adoption of similar changes in regard to the others. In regard, however, to this question of the election of Fellows, experience has fortunately shown us that it is possible to give a voice to the Graduates in their selection without modifying the Act, and its revision may, for this reason, be regarded as less immediately urgent than it might otherwise have been. The same question has, as you are aware, been under consideration in reference to the Bombay University, which, like yours, has a body of Graduates representing a variety of different elements. The difficulty of devising a suitable amount of representation would be very great, and the University of Bombay is, I understand, prepared, at our suggestion, to follow the example set here and to proceed experimentally upon the lines which we have adopted. You may be quite sure that, even if we do not at this moment see our way to legislate in reference to this point just now the privilege which I have been able to confer upon the Graduates is not likely to be restricted. The sound judgment which they have shown in exercising this privilege renders me indeed disposed to extend its scope, and I will gladly consider whether this cannot be done before the time comes when I shall again meet you in this building. (Applause.)

These are the only matters of University business, strictly speaking, which I wish to refer to; but, as you allow me to take advantage of these occasions in order to mention to you any questions affecting the University in which I am specially interested, I should like this afternoon to refer for a moment to such a question.

I have noticed with much pleasure, and I desire to commend to all the friends and supporters of the University, the movement which has lately been set on foot by the society known as that for the higher training of young men in Calcutta. I feel no doubt that there is room for such a movement, and that much good may be done by it. What are the facts? This University is, as we all know, an examining University. Our students have to satisfy us that they have attended lectures at one of the affiliated institutions, and they are required to pass an examination which shall prove that their studies have provided them with a certain amount of knowledge, and we thereupon bestow upon them an academical title. This is, I am afraid, the beginning and the end of our connection with them. We do not attempt to take charge of them in any sense during the time which they spend in preparing for their degree; we are not responsible for their health, for their surroundings, and we do not seek to exercise any supervision over their private life. In some of the affiliated institutions no doubt some attempt may be made in this direction, but this affects only a very small minority of the students. The great bulk of them are, save for the fact that they attend the classes of school or college during a few hours of the day, absolutely uncared for.

The result is that we have some six or seven thousand young men between the ages of 17 and 29 turned loose in this wilderness of a city, exposed to its temptations and dangers without any precautions to ensure that their lives shall be healthy, or happy, or respectable. The picture is one which it is impossible to contemplate without the deepest misgivings. The position of the lads who come here from the Mofussil must, at all events, when they first arrive here, be one of the greatest isolation. They are, perhaps, separated by hundreds of miles from their friends and relations, and Heaven knows what sort of friends and what of connections they will form here, if they are left to their own devices. No contrast could be sharper than that between the condition of the young men who take their degree in the Calcutta University, and that of the students of one of our old English Universities. In the latter case you have the college with all its comforts and resources, its social life, its strict discipline and supervision; you have the intercourse of student with student, the esprit de corps which makes a young man proud of his college, the intimacy of teacher and pupil, and the influence of the former over the latter; the pleasant associations of the cricket fields and the river—all these build up a life, which has its social and domestic side, amidst the healthiest of moral and material surroundings. All these conditions are absent here. A young man coming to Calcutta from a distant town is a mere drop in this great sea, uncared for, exposed to every temptation and every discomfort, unknown perhaps to his fellow students—perhaps even to his teachers. Can we be surprised if many of them do not pass through the ordeal without the worst results alike to body and mind?

This, gentlemen, is, I understand, the state of things which the association, of which I have spoken, desires to improve. Let us be under no illusions as to the difficulty of the task. I hope it will not be supposed for a moment that, when I referred just now to the old English Universities, I believed that it was possible to reproduce them, or anything like them, in this country. I mentioned them rather with the object of suggesting that a student at Oxford or Cambridge would not have a much better chance of escaping the dangers which beset our young men here if he was exposed to them to the same extent.

I believe, however, that, without aiming at too high an ideal, it is within our power to do something to mitigate the evil, and I must express the pleasure with which I read the address recently delivered by Mr. Risley upon the subject of this movement. I understand that, in the opinion of the society, there are three directions in which something may be done. The work is, I am informed, to be divided into three sections,—the Literary section, the Athletic section, and the General section. The Literary section will be concerned with the books which the students may be expected to read outside of their regular school or college work. The Athletic section proposes to encourage those healthy games and outdoor exercises which play so large a part in the education of English youth, while the General section has for its object the exercise of useful influence over the conduct and character of the young men. It would be impossible within the limits of the observations which I am now offering to you to consider the possibilities which lie before us in these different directions. I can sum up all that I will venture to say this evening in a very few words.

In regard to reading, I see no difficulty in adopting the suggestion that a list of books should be prepared and recommended to our young friends for their reading—a list which would put them in the way of reading books quite as interesting as, and very much better for them than, the mischievous trash of which I believe many of them are copious consumers. Such a list, to be added to from time to time, could probably be prepared without very much trouble. If, however, this movement is to come to anything, I should like to look forward to the time when it will be possible to provide our students, not only with a list of books, but with the books themselves, and with convenient rooms in which to read them. A Library—perhaps a lending Library—with reading and recreation rooms attached, would, it seems to me, be a very admirable adjunct to the University. I say this without casting any reflection upon the existing University Library, which is intended mainly for the use of resident Fellows. I know that, under the Regulations, persons who are not Fellows may obtain special permission to use that Library, and even to borrow books from it, for purposes of literary research, but I doubt whether it could ever be made available as a popular Library for the bulk of the students.

As to the pursuit of athletic exercises, I do not believe that any amount of gymnastics will make up for the absence of such games as cricket, and football. I cannot resist quoting Mr. Risley's dictum when he said that "the memory of the pious founder who endowed the schools of Calcutta with a suitable playground will be held in everlasting remembrance when many more serious matters have been forgotten." I should like to look forward to the time when suitable grounds of this kind will be provided for the use of our University students.

Of the work of the General section, it has been said with truth that the endeavour to form the character, and to guide the moral conduct of our young men is one of immense difficulty. I believe you can inculcate morality by precept and example, but I have not much faith in precept alone. Our schools, again, are, as a rule, day schools, and home influences upon which so much depends are, I suspect, much less strong here than they are in Europe. I have, however, an almost unlimited belief in the results which can be produced upon the young by the personal influence of individuals, and I believe that it is within the bounds of possibility that men might be found in this country capable of exercising such an influence over our students, and of exercising it with very far-reaching and very salutary results. If we could find here even one or two men animated by the same unselfish desire to do good and to spread the knowledge of the truth as the late Mr. Arnold Toynbee, whose name may be familiar to some of you, the difficulty would, I believe, disappear. We should, however, require not only the men, but some kind of an organization for them to work under, and my thoughts recur to a movement in which I took some part before I left England—I mean that for the extension of University teaching instituted not many years ago by Mr. Goschen and a few other persons connected with the great Universities. The object of that movement was the establishment of different centres at which course of lectures might be given by men carefully selected from among the most promising members of the University in subjects especially interesting to the residents of the localities selected. The movement has been very successful, and there is hardly any subject upon which lectures have not been given, and they have been very largely attended, and have, I believe, served to awaken a new interest in many objects of study hitherto completely neglected, except in the great centres of education. Is it beyond the bounds of possibility that teaching of this kind might be undertaken in Calcutta, not necessarily in subjects bearing directly upon the University examinations, but upon such subjects as history, literature, and those social, ethical, and economical questions in which we, all of us, take an interest?

But, gentlemen, even if we are to assume that we have got the men and established the organization, it would be absolutely necessary, if the experiment is to be tried with any degree of success, that there should be some suitable place at which students and teachers should come together, and for this reason I should like to see the Association, of which I am speaking, provided with a head-quarters of its own in a central position. Its principal features would be a Library, with one or two lecture and reading rooms attached, and if this building stood by the side of a suitable recreation ground, our institution would become complete. All this may be unpractical and unattainable, and there may possibly be difficulties in the way which I have not foreseen. The idea seems, however, to be one worth discussion, and I believe that, if it were to be thoroughly matured, you would find many persons ready to give it their encouragement and their practical support. I, for one, shall be very glad indeed to do so. (Applause.)

And now, Mr. Vice-Chancellor, it only remains for me to congratulate the young men upon whom degrees have been conferred this afternoon, and express my cordial hope that for them, and for the University, of which they are members, the new academical year may bring nothing but good. (Applause.)

THE DACCA BRIBERY CASE IN THE HIGH COURT SESSIONS.

Empress v. Anundo Chunder Roy and Madhub Chunder Dass.

CHARGE TO THE JURY.

Mr. Justice Wilson, in summing up to the Jury, said that this case had occupied a long time, and he was sorry that the case should have been so prolonged, but, on the other hand, he did not think it had taken a very long time if the case was to be properly and fairly tried, and the value of the evidence fully tested. The offences charged were two in form, though really only one in substance. The offence charged was that of bribery and abetting the bribery of a public servant, namely, a Juror; in other words, the offence charged was the offering of a bribe to Gurucharan, on the evening of the 10th June, in order to induce him to give a verdict of acquittal in the case, which was tried in Dacca, and in which he was the foreman of the Jury. If a bribe was offered by one person to another who did not accept it, the person who offered the bribe committed an offence, but the person to whom it was offered did not. If a bribe was offered, and the person to whom it was offered accepted it, then they both committed an offence, and the person who offered the bribe became in the eye of the law the graver offender. The main point they had to give their verdict upon was, Was it established to their complete satisfaction that Rs. 4,000 was brought to the house of Gurucharan by the second accused on the evening of the 10th June? Were they satisfied that it was sent by the first accused, and then were they satisfied that it was sent for bribing Gurucharan? If Anundo Roy really sent it, and sent it as a bribe, then there was another thing they had to consider—What part had Madhub played? Even if Anundo sent the money for an illegal purpose, Madhub might, as an innocent person, have carried it without any guilty knowledge. These were the points the Jury would have to consider in all their bearings.

Before going into the details of the case his Lordship would remind the Jury of the outlines of the case. They had it in evidence that the case then under trial, spoken of as the Belliati case, was the result of a charge brought against certain servants of people known as the Babus of the East Belliati house, brought by persons of the Middle Belliati house, and the Babus of the West house, and in some measure supported the prosecution. Gurucharan, the first witness in this Court, was the foreman of the Jury empanelled to try the Belliati murder case, and the subject of the present charge was that, on the evening before the verdict given in the Belliati case, Rs. 4,000 was brought from Anundo by Madhub to the house of Gurucharan. It was a verdict with regard to which the four accused were acquitted by a majority of four to one. Gurucharan said that he gave his own verdict. According to his account it was a unanimous acquittal as far as it concerned two accused, while it was not as regarded the other two. On the evening of the 10th, Gurucharan said the money, Rs. 4,000, was brought by Madhub, and was intended as a bribe to induce him to give a verdict of acquittal. The evidence of the other witnesses was important as far as it had any bearing upon this point. It was said that on the night of the 10th June 4,000 rupees were brought by Madhub to Gurucharan's house. On that occasion the money having been left in the house, Gurucharan signed a promissory note or hundi, and that that was given to Madhub who had brought the money. It was further said that Madhub together with the money brought a letter from Anundo Chunder Roy to Gurucharan. The three things said to have been brought were the money, the receipt, and the letter. The letter was delivered to Gurucharan, the money made over, and Madhub having obtained the acknowledgment or hundi left, leaving the letter with Gurucharan. The matters relied upon by the prosecution seem to be these. It was also said that there had been previous attempts or proposals to bribe this witness Gurucharan, but this rested upon the statement of Gurucharan alone, with the exception of one man, the Government Pleader Troyloko, to whom he had spoken in reference to this matter. It is said that Gurucharan came back from the Court after the verdict, and that Madhub, who came to or was already at, Gurucharan's house, demanded the money back, and then the story was that Sreenath and Madhub went away, in a ticca garri, to the house of Anundo, and having gone there, paid back the money, and in exchange received back the promissory note. But that letter which was sent with the money was not given up to Anundo; they did not make over the letter, and it remained in the possession of Sreenath or Gurucharan. It might have been a very dangerous and incriminating letter, and if that letter was really sent, it went a good way to confirm the story of the occurrences of the night of the 10th June. Two persons said they saw a letter, and they, Sreenath and Juggut, spoke of it as an English letter, and this seemed to be confirmation of the letter remaining in the possession of Gurucharan.

Then there was another matter which, if it was true, also confirmed this, and it was the event which is said to have occurred on the 24th of June. On this occasion this letter was taken to Anundo, and offered to be given up to him in exchange for a sum of Rs. 5,000, but it was by the hands of Madhub that the money was paid and the letter taken back. The Jury might take it for granted that if a man paid Rs. 5,000 to get back a letter of his own, it was a letter which was dangerous or damaging. Of course the Jury would have to consider the truth of the story. In connection with this matter it was said that Gurucharan's debts were paid out of this money. He was an impecunious man, and some, or perhaps a good many, of his debts were paid. This was confirmatory evidence, and there was also the evidence of Troyloko and the evidence of Rojonikant, who spoke to a statement made to him and Troyloko at an interview in which Gurucharan made a statement adverse to one of the accused persons. In dealing with all these statements his Lordship asked the Jury to bear in their minds some general observations which he would make a little further on, which they would do well to remember when the evidence was being gone through. It had been very truly said by the prosecution that where there was a charge of this kind to be substantiated, it was impossible to help calling witnesses whose evidence must be received with a certain amount of caution. Now in a case of this kind it became the duty of the Jury to scrutinize very closely the evidence laid before them, and to accept nothing without the greatest caution. Without being quite satisfied, they must not convict. The two first witnesses, Gurucharan and Juggut, were, within the meaning of the law, accomplices. By their own evidence they were accomplices, and the Jury must not convict upon the unsupported testimony of accomplices. They must not convict the accused unless the evidence of these two witnesses was, in substantial particulars, supported by others. As far as these two witnesses were concerned, they could not convict unless they were corroborated in a satisfactory way by other witnesses. They would also have to take into consideration Gurucharan's behaviour and demeanour and the grossly contradictory nature of his evidence. He was not the sort of witness whom they could rely on, neither would they accept any statement of his as true except so far as it was confirmed. The second most important witness was Sreenath Gossain, who also had told them that he told a false story on former occasions. There was another thing they ought to bear in mind, and it was this. His Lordship did not suppose anybody would suggest, though it had been said for the defence, that the investigation of this case by the officers in the mofussil was not as full as it should have been, nor did his Lordship think that it had been suggested that any of the officers concerned in the trial of the case had the remotest idea of getting up a false case against the accused, and this, he was certain, applied also to the police. But there were other people besides the Magistrates and police, upon whom the Magistrate and police had to rely for the facts. It was exceedingly important to observe from whom or from what group of people the charges first came to lie, and who were found to be connected with the case in its earliest stage, and who were found to be connected with it in the end. Then another great and serious reason for exercising the utmost caution was that there were some people who were connected with this case, and the bringing forward of this charge who had an interest in doing so for no other purpose but to reopen the charge in the Belliati case. This was a matter which made it necessary for the Jury to exercise the extreme care. Before dealing with the evidence his Lordship had to remind them of another fact. In considering the amount of anxious scrutiny which they must give to the evidence they must see who were concerned in bringing up the charge and how it was brought forward, and his Lordship was bound to say that the circumstances under which the story had been brought forward was such as to require all the greater caution. The substance of the first statement made to the Judge by Gurucharan on the 24th was that on the evening before the verdict a man came and brought four or five thousand rupees, and that it was forcibly taken away the next day. The next statement that was made was not by anybody having any personal knowledge of the matter, but Issur, who had been shown to be one of the hostile opponents of the first accused. The statement made by Gurucharan in the presence of the Government Pleader and the other pleader was considerably different from the present one, and in that one Madhub took no part. It was a totally different story. Then about the same time Gurucharan made statements to Issur and Anundo Chunder Chuckerbutty, which were somewhat similar to those made to Troyloko and Rojonikant. From that time Gurucharan was in regular communication with all these persons, who were exceedingly hostile to the accused. The next statement Gurucharan made was on the 9th July. Up to that time that story about the price of the letter as Rs. 5,000 was contradicted by Gurucharan and by all except Sreenath.

Two theories had been put forward to explain the case, first, that the story as now told was the true story and, second, that Gurucharan was a witness hostile to the prosecution, and that all that has been told by him has been extracted from him bit by bit. One great difficulty in accepting that theory was that on notice of intention to cross-examine Gurucharan, he and Anundo Chuckerbutty on the evening after that notice were in consultation for two hours. This was an incident that made it very difficult to accept the theory of the prosecution. The theory, on the other hand, was that attempts had been made to bribe Gurucharan, who was foreman of the Jury, by the other side. There were two groups of persons ready and willing to make use of him, one of which were enemies of A. C. Roy's, persons who had conducted former fruitless prosecutions against him. His Lordship after drawing the attention of the Jury then proceeded to deal with the evidence at great length. In commenting on the evidence of the District Judge of Mozufferpur, his Lordship said that the good character given by this gentleman of the accused would have to be taken into consideration in determining his guilt or innocence, and concluded by exhorting the Jury to weigh the matter well in their mind before arriving at a finding, and if they were perfectly satisfied that the accused had been proved guilty they would find accordingly. If, on the other hand, they had any reasonable doubt, they were bound to give the prisoners the benefit of the same and acquit them.

The Jury then retired, and, on returning after three minutes, gave a unanimous verdict of not guilty on both counts of the indictment with respect to both prisoners. The accused were then ordered to be discharged.

An attempt was made at cheering, but it was promptly suppressed by the police.

Mr. Woodroffe then applied to his Lordship with regard to the question of costs, and urged that his client had been put to terrible expense. His Lordship did not think he could make a reference on the subject. He did not think he could take the initiative in the matter, but if a petition was forwarded to Government, and it came to him, his Lordship would put his recommendations thereon.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

APOSTROPHE TO PATIENCE.

These stanzas, from an address to Patience, in the St. James' Magazine, (vol. i., p. 108,) signed C. J., have been preserved by the Poet Southey as deserving "to be relieved from oblivion."—Ed. R. & R.

O come, surrounded with thy sober train
Of meekness, piety, and holy hope ;
Blest source of peace, blest cure for every pain,
Without whose aid the proudest spirits droop.

Kindly descend to those whose humbled mind
Knows no relief, but what from Patience springs ;
Whose griefs no cure, whose pangs no respite find ;
On those descend with healing on thy wings.

O hover round the melancholy bed,
Where lingering sickness claims thy fostering care,
Thy influence rears the drooping sufferer's head,
And gives a ray of merit to his prayer.

TO MY LITTLE DAUGHTER'S SHOES.

Two little, rough-worn, stubbed shoes,
A plump, well-trodden pair ;
With striped stockings thrust within Lie just beside my chair.

Of very homely fabric they,
A hole is in each toe,
They might have cost, when they were new,
Some fifty cents or so.

And yet, this little worn-out pair
Is richer far to me
Than all the jewelled sandals are
Of Eastern luxury.

This mottled leather, cracked with use,
Is satin in my sight ;
These little tarnished buttons shine
With all a diamond's light.

Search through the wardrobe of the world !
You shall not find me there,
So rarely made, so richly wrought,
So glorious a pair.

And why? Because they tell of her,
Now sound asleep above,
Whose form is moving beauty, and
Whose heart is beating love.

They tell me of her merry laugh ;
Her rich, whole-hearted glee ;

Her gentleness, her innocence,
And infant purity.

They tell me that her wavering steps
Will long demand my aid ;
For the old road of human life,
Is very roughly laid.

High hills and swift descents abound ;
And, on so rude a way,
Feet that can wear these coverings
Would surely go astray.

Sweet little girl ! be mine the task
Thy feeble steps to tend !
To be thy guide, thy counsellor,
Thy playmate and thy friend !

And when my steps shall faltering grow,
And thine be firm and strong,
Thy strength shall lead my tottering age
In cheerful peace along !

SONGS BY CHARLES SWAIN.

THE COTTAGE DOOR.

The starry silence falls
Along my sylvan way,
A spirit walks the earth,
We never meet by day ;
And listening to the voice
Of years that are no more ;
My feet—Oh ! know'st thou why ?—
Have wandered to thy door.

The quiet taper burns
And makes thy casement bright,
And soft thy shadow falls
Between me and the light ;
I gaze as on a shrine
My heart would bend before ;
My couch had seen no rest,
Had I not seen thy door.

The night, as if to breathe,
Her starry curtain parts ;
The very air seems faint
With breath of lovers' hearts ;
Some spirit robes the earth
In light that heaven wore ;
Or is that light thine own ?—
And is that heaven thy door ?

'T WAS COMING FROM THE VILLAGE CHURCH.

'T was coming from the village church
I saw my false love nigh,
I said—Oh ! shame me not, my heart,
But let me pass him by.
And so the color left my cheek,
The tear forsook mine eye ;
And with a timid step, and weak,
I passed my false love by.

He looked—and thought, perchance, to see
The blush and tear of old ;
But I was cold as he could be—
That is, I seemed as cold !
For fast and fast my heart did fill
Mine eyes could hold no more—
He might have seen I loved him still,
Had I not gained the door.

I hurried to my own dear room,
I knelt me down to pray,
But still no firmness could assume,
My tears they would have way.
Oh ! false, false lips—oh ! faithless part—
Oh ! base, unmanly aim—
To seek for years to win a heart,
Then make its love—its shame !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THERE is a lion out here—young Grant who won his majority in Manipur, the grave of so many men and reputations.

THE twenty-eighth annual Conversazione of the Mahomedan Literary Society, fixed for the 27th January and postponed on account of the death of the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, comes off on Friday, the 4th March.

FIRST to the fore on this melancholy occasion in expressing the feelings of the community at the death of the heir-presumptive to the throne of England, the Mahomedan Literary Society has received the following letter from the Secretary to the Government of India in the Home Department to the address of its Secretary :—

"Calcutta, the 30th January 1892.
SIR,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter conveying a message of condolence on behalf of the Committee of the Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta with Her Imperial Majesty the Queen Empress of India and their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, on the melancholy occasion of the death of His late Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, and to say that the Government of India have been desirous to convey to you an expression of Her Imperial Majesty's thanks for the kind sympathy displayed by the Society."

TWO Hindus have filed a suit in the District Court of Lahore for recovery of the body of their deceased brother Sodagar Mal. He died recently at the village of Bhogiwal, leaving a fortune now in the possession of a Mahomedan mistress who claims to have married the Hindu after his conversion to Islam. Before they give up the claim, the plaintiffs want to satisfy themselves that their deceased relative discarded the chonti—the consecrated tuft of hair on the head.

UNDER the authority vested in him by the Indian Factories Act (XV of 1881) as amended by Act XI of 1891, the Governor-General in Council has prescribed a fee of four annas as the fee payable to a certifying Surgeon by a person employed, or desirous of being employed, in a Factory for examining him and granting him a certificate.

CANDIDATES for appointment in the Upper or Lower Division of the Secretariat Clerical Service of the Government of India and attached offices, are required to send written applications for permission to appear at the examination to the Secretary to the Board of Examiners between the date of issue of the notification announcing the number of vacancies to be competed for and the 15th December.

SIR Monier Williams who has for some months been travelling on the Continent in search of health, lately received the princely gift of £2,000 from the Thakur Saheb of Gondal towards the Indian Institute at Oxford. About £3,500 only is now wanting to make up the £8,000 required for the extension of the Institute.

It is as well that we should record that "the following petition to the Government of India was adopted at a public meeting, held in Shri Murlidhar's Temple, Poona, on 22nd November :—'That your Excellency's Memorialists beg most respectfully to intimate that the majority of the inhabitants of the City of Poona do not recognize the so-called National Congress as their representative body until it undergoes a desirable change, and that, therefore, any representations made by the Congress, should not be considered as having the consent of the people in general. That in the pavilion of the Congress, a meeting of the persons, calling themselves social reformers, is held, the proceedings of which have always been disapproved of by the orthodox people. Your Excellency's Memorialists, therefore, beg that any representations, made by the said reformers, should not be considered as emanating from the people in general,—(Sd.) Narain Rao Bhikaji Joglekar, Vishnu Venkatesh Behere, Venkatesh Vishwanath Jogelkar, Narain Gopal Patwardhan, Gonesh Shastri Malwankar, Krishna Shastri Vyajapurkar and 248 others."

GOOD "F. H. S." has been writing with his usual earnestness to the Pioneer on the sad vandalism still permitted under a civilized Government. This is his last protest :—

"SIR,—You were good enough to publish a letter in which I drew attention to the indignities offered at Christmas-tide to the beautiful works of art in the Delhi Fort. My story has not been contradicted : and on the other hand, the public has not received the assurance it has a right to expect, that due punishment has been meted out to the perpetrators of the outrages complained of, and that measures have been taken to prevent their recurrence. In order to place matters in the clearest light I will give the statement of an eye-witness as recorded by me. He is willing to place it in the form of an affidavit, and to communicate his name to any person in authority. 'On the afternoon of Christmas Day,' he says, 'I visited the Dewan-i-Khas in the Delhi Fort in company with two fellow travellers Messrs. Bachmahr of Vienna and Sruyder, who, I think, hails from New York. Our attention was at once attracted to a hole at least ten inches in diameter, which had recently been made in the lovely monolithic screen of perforated foliage at the back of the Hall. The marble-dust scattered about showed the fracture to have been recent ; and, on looking over the wall, we saw the broken pieces of marble lying in the ditch below the building. My companions expressed the greatest indignation at the outrage and offered their services to aid me in exposing it. There was a private of the Leinster regiment, which is apparently in garrison there, lounging about without his helmet. Thinking that he was the guardian, I asked him if he knew how the damage occurred, and suggested that the fragments of marble should be gathered up for repairs. His looks and manner were most insolent, a fact which was accounted for when I found that he reeked of liquor and was evidently half tipsy. He said that he would have nothing to say to me—it was no business of his. On entering the adjacent building we found another hole smashed through the perforated marble screen separating the two halls known as the Emperor's and the Empress's audience-chambers. Here, too, the broken fragments of marble showed that the damage was fresh. The native guardian, hearing us express indignation at the vandalism, told us that it was the work of drunken European soldiers, with whom he was afraid to interfere. We then adjourned to the Moti Masjid, hard by, and the first thing that met our eyes was a piece measuring about a foot, by four inches, broken off the cornice of a marble tomb or table on the left of the gateway. The fragments and dust were scattered around. The native keeper told us that this, too, was the work of a drunken soldier, who had been placed under arrest."

"Two deductions may be drawn from this plain, unvarnished tale. One is the necessity for a curator of ancient remains—an officer who is found in every other civilized country with a history. The other is the criminal folly of permitting the British soldier to roam fancy-free at all hours over the Diwani Khas. But it is, perhaps, vain to look for a tender regard for the relics of a mighty past in a generation which tolerates dancing to the blare of a brass band within the precincts of the Taj."

The whole world of Culture is indebted to the writer of that letter, and all the generations of India's sons now and hereafter will bless Mr. Skrine—if we mistake not the identity adumbrated by the initials.

WE read lately in the Indian Mirror :—

"The Bungabashi thus writes :—'The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal informs us that while Sir Charles Elliott was inspecting the Durbhunga Jail, he saw an old man undergoing imprisonment for not having been able to pay Rs. 40 to a creditor, named Mohesh Chunder Singh. His Honour took pity on the man who was released from the Jail on the judgment-creditor condescending to forego his claim to the amount of money due to him."

That was the first intimation of the good Samaritanism of the Head of the Local Government. Is it possible that since the late prosecution, the Bangabashi has become the official or semi-official organ of that Government ? Otherwise, it is impossible to account for the Chief Secretary's preference of a single vernacular newspaper over the rest of the press. Or, is this the Secrétariat method of combining the duty of informing the public mind with the principle of Christianity of not letting the right hand know the beneficence of the left?

THE appointment of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, K. C. S. I., Resident of the 1st class, and Resident at Hyderabad, as Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab and its Dependencies, is Gazetted, subject to the approbation of Her Majesty the Queen, Empress of India, which will be communicated in due course.

COLONEL Sir Robert Sandeman, K. C. S. I., Governor-General's Agent and Chief Commissioner in Baluchistan, is dead. The Government of India mourns the loss in the Gazette as of "a brave and devoted servant of the Queen" and as "a public misfortune."

THE Maxim gun is said to fire 750 shots in a minute. That record is beat by the Winchester. The new gun was recently tested at New Haven by the Winchester Repeating Arms Company. It ejected 900 shots per minute. It has a water jacket surrounding the barrel and holding one gallon of water. But for this precaution, the barrel would become too hot for handling in half a minute. The breech mechanism is described to be operated by a crank connected with a system of multiplying gearing which imparts the rapidity of motion. The ammunition is supplied from a continuous web belt holding the cartridges in packets. The inventors are the gun-makers Messrs. Browning Brothers, of Odgen, Utah. That reveals the extraordinary progress not only made but also making in America unto the farthest West—to the backwoods of old. So they were not simply marrying and multiplying up in Utah.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE general mourning for the death of the Duke of Clarence and Avondale concluded yesterday.

FROM the reports brought by the last mail, it appears that the Prince caught the cold which ended fatally while out shooting. A party was made up at Sandringham House on Wednesday morning, the 6th January.

"Having shot several coverts, the Royal party, which included the Prince of Wales and both his sons, finished up prior to luncheon in the copse which lies on the further side of Wolferton station. Luncheon was served in the Prince's private room at the station. During the meal the Duke of Clarence complained of feeling chilly, and it was evident that he had taken a slight cold, but he treated the matter lightly, and insisted upon finishing the day's sport. At the end of the day he again complained of cold. Instead of driving back to the house with the rest of the party, the Duke started to walk home in order to get warm, the distance being about two and-a-half miles. He dined with the family, but was not at all well, and retired early. Next morning he accompanied the shooting party again and shot over the woodcock wood, luncheon being served at the Park House, the residence of Sir Deighton Probyn, which is just outside the Park walls. The Duke was unable to proceed further, however, and walked quickly back to Sandringham House with the Princess May.

That evening his Highness appeared at dinner, but only remained a short time in the room, retiring to bed at half-past eight. On Friday he was in good spirits, but although strongly desirous of being present at the dinner party in honour of his birthday he yielded to advice and remained in his room. On Saturday it was found that he was so seriously ill that Dr. Laking was sent for from London. Dr. Laking's report was so disquieting that Dr. Broadbent was summoned on Sunday. Both remained with him to the end. On Wednesday night it was hoped, almost in spite of hope, that the Prince had taken a turn for the better. He had fallen asleep, and the symptoms were such as justified a hopeful message to the Queen. Two hours after midnight he woke evidently much worse. It soon became obvious that the end was very near. The Rector of Sandringham was called to the room to read the prayers for the dying. He died at a quarter past nine in presence of his father and mother. The patient was unconscious for some hours before death. Previously he had been delirious."

ZANZIBAR has, to general rejoicing, been proclaimed, by the British Agent and Consul-General, a free port.

THE new Khedive Abbas opened the Egyptian Assembly on January 30, and secured it of his adhesion to his father's policy.

THE German merchants resident in Rangoon, have presented Prince Bismarck with a service of plate and ivory of Burmese workmanship, valued at 500/.

FOR performing pieces of a scandalous character, M. de Chirac, director of the Théâtre-Réaliste, Paris, together with the principal actress, has been sentenced, by the Correctional Tribunal, to 15 months' imprisonment. Two other persons who took part in the performance suffer for two months and one month respectively.

That reminds us of the nuisance nearer home. We have in Calcutta places of amusement which trade in vice. The Prefecture and the Correctional Tribunal ought to interfere.

THE famine in Russia continues grinding the people to a slow and torturing death. The papers of the Continent and in the British Isles are filled with the most melancholy details. A letter in a leading London magazine from a gentleman belonging to one of the relieving organizations, tells a truly harrowing tale of one of the Districts. Thousands of men have neither food nor money to buy it with, and have had none for days. It is a shame not only to Russia but to the civilised world, to let those poor men perish by inches. What is the good of our boasted inventions for speedy communication, if they are not made use of at such a juncture to pour succour in a trice into the stricken land?

WHILE such relief as is being given, is utterly inadequate to the demand, its efficacy is being diminished by the vile manipulations of sordid officials intent upon growing rich by the opportunity. The phenomenon of selfishness witnessed in the Bengal Famine of the 18th Century, is being repeated at this moment in Russia.

COUNT Leo Tolstoi thus records his experience of the famine-stricken provinces of Russia:—

"My first visit was to the Krapivinsky district, the black loam portion of which had had a bad harvest. The first indication of what I noticed was that the bread eaten by nearly everyone there contained 35, and in many places 50, per cent. of pigweed. It is not the brown bread which is usually called 'black,' but is, in sober truth, of inky blackness, heavy, clammy, and bitter. And this is the stuff which young and old, weak and sickly, consume; delicate little children eat it; women, before and after childbirth, are nourished on it; mothers who suckle their new-born children draw from it whatever strength and nutriment it can give; and the sick and dying feed the flickering lamp of life with it. Another sign of exceptional distress consisted in the universal complaints I heard of the dearth of food. As early as September, I was told, it had given out, and since then considerable suffering had been endured, and extraordinary makeshifts restored to in consequence. People were forced to cut up planks of their threshing floors, to saw up blocks of wood, logs, and wooden utensils—in a word, to utilise everything they could lay their hands on that would burn."

THE Novoe Vremya of St. Petersburg has taken up in right earnest the question of the adulteration of flour for the famine-stricken by various merchants. It has been threatened with a prosecution for libel, for its pains. The chief editor, M. Souvorine, has declared himself the writer of the articles complained of, and challenges any action against his paper. He says that if the law and the administrative authorities remain powerless to protect the public, it becomes the right as well as the duty of the Press as the representative of public opinion, to denounce, regardless of danger, such criminal acts, which otherwise would be concealed. He is prepared for the worst. "Even though," says he, "representatives of the Press be sent to prison for their temerity, the evidence in judicial proceedings will at least throw a light upon the hidden swindling recklessly perpetrated to the detriment of the welfare and health of the people."

A PICTURE-COLLECTOR in Pesth has stumbled upon a little fortune. He bought for a few florins in a second-hand shop a small canvas. He has sold it in Paris, as a genuine Meissonier, for 30,000 frs. Too much for a whistle, perhaps, who knows!

THE bill before the Reichstag for compulsory religious instructions in all public schools, was opposed by the National Liberals. General Caprivi was wroth. He charged the Liberals with desertion and reminded them of the necessity of protection against the spread of Atheism in the present troublous times. To emphasise his dissatisfaction, he left the House abruptly, followed by other members.

DEATH is busy among the great and the good, and the Old Indians, good, bad, and indifferent. This week, the death roll includes the Revd. Mr. Spurgeon, the preacher, Sir Charles Wingfield, formerly Chief Commissioner of Oudh, Sir Thomas Pycroft, Sir Morell Mackenzie, the physician, Sir John Lambert, Sir George Edward Paget, Mr. C. T. Metcalfe, of the Indian Civil Service, who earned a fame of a kind whether as Commissioner of Behar, or of the Orissa Division, or as Chairman of the Calcutta Municipality.

Mr. Spurgeon was the greatest theological humourist of the day. It were idle to compare him with Robert Hall, but his popularity may be estimated from the church—the Tabernacle, holding the largest congregation in London—which it helped him to build.

Sir Charles Wingfield was a Judge on the Oudh frontier when the Mutiny broke out. He took refuge with the late Maharaja Drigbijey Singh, of Bulrampur, who saved him. Appointed the first Chief Commissioner of Oudh on the conquest of that Province, he was enabled to repay the services of the border baron. He made Drigbijey Singh the premier landlord, the first in property as in the confidence of the British Government. To make him the leading one—the moving spirit and brain of the Talooqdars—was beyond any Chief Commissioner, or Viceroy, for that matter. That position belonged to, and was held by, Man Singh, of Shahgunje, by hereditary right as well as by force of intellect. Mr. Wingfield was wise enough to submit to the inevitable and accepted Man Singh cheerfully. He appreciated the Bengalis too and enabled Dukhinaranjan Mookerjee, through the two chief barons, to start the Talooqdars' Society, which another Mookerjee organized on a permanent footing. Mr. Wingfield got Lord Canning to make a free gift of the famous royal residence, the Kaiserbagh, to the Talooqdars for their town residence. If Lord Clyde conquered the barons of Oudh, Wingfield subdued them and made of them loyal subjects of Her Majesty. The Talooqdars repaid him with a memorial structure, the Wingfield Munzil, as they commemorated the first Viceroy in the Canning College. After his retirement, Sir Charles Wingfield entered Parliament, in which he was a staunch and useful friend of the Indian people.

H. M. S. VICTORIA à la Renown is lying in a precarious condition on the shore of the Levant, near Platæa. Her end would be a sad loss to the nation, among whose principal bulwarks she was esteemed. Her original name was changed at her debut at Her Majesty's Jubilee.

Victoria is one of the queens of the Royal Navy. Single-turreted, 340 feet long between perpendiculars, with a displacement of some 10,500 tons, armed with a couple of 110 ton guns, one 25 ton, 12 six-inch, besides many smaller guns, propelled by engines of twelve thousand horse power at over 17 knots an hour, she is one of the most powerful British line of battle ships. While cruising as the flagship of the Mediterranean Squadron, she has run ashore on the Levant coast and is reported to be leaking. Such is the telegraphic news of the last day of January.

By the latest news, after repeated attempts, the vessel has been refloated.

THE Moscow Gazette has discovered a mare's nest. It is reported that, at the instance of the British Legation, a Persian religious official at Tabriz has been seized upon while taking a walk in the suburbs and conveyed to Bushire, whence he was taken on board an English ship and transported to Bussorah in Asiatic Turkey, whence he was conveyed to India. Great indignation is expressed against England and this "high-handed proceeding."

THE planets are not just now propitious to the Shah. Riots are disturbing the very capital. There is, moreover, an insurrection in the Provinces. A sort of Madhi has arisen. He is a Syad, of course, a descendant of the Prophet. From his boyhood to seems to have been brooding over the manifold corruptions of Islam about him, and on attaining majority he announced himself a Reformer. He is credited with divine powers and supposed to perform miracles. His piety is unquestioned. Men flocked to him to become his disciples. Still he observed some secrecy. Latterly, he removed himself from Sahna to Maganderan, where his followers increasing to thousands, he threw off all reserve and openly proclaimed his mission. The Shah was kept informed of the movement and looked on in contemptuous silence.

At last, it waxed intolerable. The Syad essayed to establish a régime of his own, which collided with the established order. Husbool-Hookooms and edicts were fulminated which were answered by bulls. Then troops were ordered against the pious disturber. Meanwhile, the Saint had seized Kellar Dasit and held it in strength. The last news from Tifis speaks of a rather severe engagement between the Shahi troops and the rebels in which the latter were worsted, losing two hundred of their number killed. Let us hope that this lesson will be sufficient.

The Russian press think this a good opportunity for Russia to secure a predominant influence at Teheran.

THE rather lengthy trial of Christopher Nickels, in the Allahabad High Court, on seven charges of abetting Debi Prasad, a Sub-Inspector, to frame an incorrect report of the information given to him about a riot at Sohni Factory on the 3rd October, 1890, and of abetting rioting and mischief at Sohni on that day, otherwise known as the Jaunpur case, ended in the disagreement of the jury. Six of them were for acquittal and three for conviction. The presiding Judge—Mr. Justice Straight—not agreeing with the majority of the jury, the nine gentlemen were discharged; and a fresh trial has been ordered. The evidence, we take it, will be the same in the second trial, but a new Judge, either the Chief Justice or Mr. Justice Knox, and a different set of jurors will consider its sufficiency or insufficiency for conviction.

THE sanctioned estimate of expenditure under "General Administration" for 1892-93 in the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is:—

Imperial.	Rs.
Civil Offices of Account and Audit	2,45,000
Allowances to Presidency Banks	14,000
Provincial.
Salary of the Lieutenant-Governor	96,000
Staff and household of the Lieutenant-Governor	24,330
Tour expenses	34,000
Legislative Council	23,000
Civil Secretariats	4,98,790
Board of Revenue	2,76,000
Commissioners	5,21,500
Civil Offices of Account and Audit	1,05,000

With the new official year, the clerical establishment of the Private Secretary's office will be incorporated with that of the Judicial, Political and Appointment Departments of the Civil Secretariat. The Head Clerk, however, will continue to belong to the Staff and household of the Lieutenant-Governor, and draw his pay accordingly.

OUR statesmen are determined to save the Empire. They have entered on a career of reform in right earnest. To begin with, the Vizier-e-Hind—Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for India—has saved the wings of his goose. He will no more supply quills to this country and they shall not be supplied by any body on account of Government. True to the times, the Services will from this month be restricted to the use of steel.

This is a reform appropriate to the Iron Age. The poor Hindu clerks who are accustomed to ply the old instrument for writing and no other, will, we fear, be inclined to echo that sentiment in no complimentary sense.

THE mooreds will not let the Peer escape. The Pioneer notices—

"The apotheosis of Mr. Hume! The Chandan-Shu, a Marathi weekly newspaper with the enormous circulation of one hundred copies, has discovered what would be a fit and lasting memorial of the Congress leader. It proposes in all seriousness that 'a small image of that gentleman should be placed in every village and worshipped like God,' and that 'contributions collected in his name should be applied to defraying the expenses that may be incurred in preaching the objects of the Congress throughout the country.' It admits that at the first blush this scheme may appear 'rather strange,' but it is confident that it will prove in the end an effective means of promoting the interests of the association. 'Considering the condition of Native society and the practice of idolatry prevalent in it, it is possible,' observes the paper, 'that a large number of the followers of Mr. Hume, like those of Tukaram and other Indian saints, will move throughout the length and breadth of the country and work for the welfare of the nation.' The idea will no doubt commend itself to the apostle of reform in India. 'God is worshipped as a God in Rajasthan; Nicholson is a saint in the eyes of the simple-minded Punjabi villager; and it would be another illustration of the fine impartiality of the Hindu pantheon were Mr. Hume added to the number of its Gods.'"

It is that "impartiality" which will, probably make the object of the gushing attention pause. Mr. Hume knows that the pantheon of the people is rather indiscriminately filled with both the powers of darkness and the powers of light.

BUT if it is a trifle extravagant in our Mahratta friends to instal a Hume in the flesh in Heaven, surely it is too bad in an Anglo-Indian contemporary—other than the Pioneer—to send him to the wrong place at all. This is the very earthen "pottery" with which that un-"handsome man 'the Pote'" of the Planters' Gazette damns the Father of the Congress:—

"There was an old bounder named Hume
Who the shape of a god did assume;
But he proved such a sell,
That they said 'Go to—' well,
A place where such daisies don't bloom!"

Call that a "handsome man!" Handsome is that handsome does—and not that swears.

A GREAT sensation was naturally caused lately in England by a startling decision of Vice-Chancellor Peile. From his place in the Cambridge Court House, he actually sentenced a poor girl named Daisy Hopkins, of seventeen years of age, to fourteen days' imprisonment in the Spinning House, because forsooth one Charles Russell, of his University, spoke to her in the street. The case was taken up on public grounds. An application was made to the Queen's Bench, and a writ of Habeas Corpus was obtained, returnable on December 11, when the girl was discharged from custody. Pandits are Pandits all the world over.

A SENSATION of a different kind was excited since by another case, in which both sides were of the feminine gender. We refer to the action for slander—before Mr. Justice Denman and a special jury—by which a quasi fashionable lady tried to disburden herself and even, if necessary, shift on to other shoulders, the theft of some rare pearls belonging to a friend who, in a moment of feminine weakness, had let her into the secret of their safety in a specially constructed escritoire.

EARLY in February last, Miss Elliot went to Torquay and stayed till the 18th with her friends Major and Mrs. Hargreaves. The latter owned some fine gems almost above her, worth over Rs. 10,000 (about £800). As she was not in a position to wear them, her husband thought they should be converted into money. The vanity of woman would not listen to that sordid suggestion. They were an anxious charge, however. Mrs. Hargreaves deposited her jewels in a drawer, to the secret of which, besides the husband and the wife, only another person called Mr. Engelhart was privy. Mrs. Hargreaves showed her visitor her rare possession and the secret of their keep. After Miss Elliot's return from Torquay, the pearls and diamonds were missed. Major Hargreaves was immediately recalled from the Continent and inquiry was instituted. Suspicion fell upon Miss Elliot, who was known to be in straitened circumstances, so much so that she could not leave Torquay without borrowing from her host to "tip" the servants. Meanwhile, Miss Elliot had become the wife of Captain Osborne, a true gentleman who deserved a better fate. An opportunity was offered to the lady to return the articles on a promise to hush up the matter, if she would give a confession in writing. The proposition was rejected with disdain by her as well as her husband and her brother, who both believed in her. The matter, however, was far too serious to be poohpoohed. Mrs. Osborne expected every day to be hauled up for larceny. To prevent that, she had recourse to a desperate game. She anticipated her prosecution by bringing an action against her accusers for slander.

It was all in vain. The jewels were traced to Messrs. Spink, of Gracechurch Street, jewellers, who had purchased them, on the 19th February, for £550, from a lady who gave the name of Mrs. Price, of Radcliffe Hall, near Bradford. No such person has been known near Bradford. At first, Messrs. Spink had given the so called Mrs. Price a crossed cheque for the price on Messrs. Glyn, Mills and Co., the bankers. On the 23rd February, she returned the cheque, as the bankers had refused to cash it and wanted an open order. Messrs. Spink were accommodating enough to accede to the unknown lady's proposal. An open cheque was given, which was duly cashed by Glyn, Mills & Co. The case hung on the question of the identity of the young lady calling herself "Mrs. Price" with Mrs. Osborne. The plaintiff tried to ward off suspicion by accounting for every moment of her time on the 19th February when she was alleged to have called at Gracechurch Street and sold the jewels. It was an arduous attempt, and she was successful by nearly three-fourths. But, as the Saturday Review says, an incomplete alibi is the most damaging of all defences. Even overlooking the contradictions of her servants, by whom she showed how innocently she was engaged all that day, she left seventy five minutes of her time unexplained, and an hour and a quarter is sufficient in London to buy and sell a diamond mine or a pearl fishery, or, for that matter, a crown with all its belongings. The toils daily tightened round Mrs. Osborne. It turned out at last that a lady brought £550 in gold on the 23rd February to Messrs. Benjamin, of Conduit Street, for conversion into notes. They gave an order on a bank where she received the notes, and one of these was traced to the Bank of England endorsed "Ethel Elliot." The end of it all was that Messrs. Spink lost their money and Mrs. Hargreaves recovered her jewels. They are rightly served for clutching at their "bargain," and she must thank herself for all her intermediate anxieties and trouble, for having locked up for ever trinkets whose only raison d'être was to be worn! Mrs. Osborne did not wait for the verdict of the jury, but took "French leave" to the Continent on the collapse of her case. A warrant followed and, on Thursday last, she was arrested at Dover. Apparently making a virtue of necessity, she said that she surrendered out of regard for her husband, whose career might otherwise be wrecked. Would that she had shown a little more regard for the unhappy man by abstaining from marrying him. She was brought to court and charged with fraudulently obtaining a cheque for £550 from Messrs. Spink, and then remanded.

THE literary treatment of the subject by the press kept up the sensation and almost went down to the depth of the scandal. This is a sample of the description of the scene in court in a society paper:—

"The opening speech was marked by a masterly reticence and incisiveness of style. Sir Charles Russell spoke for over two hours, maintaining throughout his grand knack of impersonal expression. His soft blue eyes that pierce while they caress, now rested on the defendant's golden head in benevolent rebuke, and now impressed upon the jury some point in the plaintiff's favour. Once or twice he was interrupted by Sir Edward Clarke, whose play of features is so eloquent that, were the law of libel to take notice of mere looks, he would sometimes be engaged upon his own defence; or the Judge would make a well-meaning and equitable remark; but usually there was intense interested silence as the conviction grew upon those who listened that it was impossible that the lady of whom he spoke could be guilty of so vulgar and commonplace a crime as that imputed to her. Mrs. Osborne is tall and graceful, with dark eyes and beautiful dark hair gathered in a loose knot on her neck. Her expression is pleasing and extremely candid. Her voice is a very sweet one. It was so low during her examination as to be almost inaudible at times; but the evident reluctance with which she gave her evidence was held to be the natural shrinking of a sensitive, refined woman from so public an inquiry."

The "masterly reticence" of an opening by counsel suggests the eloquence of silence! Was Sir Charles Russell playing a two hours' pantomime? We have never before seen the soft blue eyes of a hard-headed knowing man of law dwelt upon with dithyrambic gush. After that, the glowing portrait of the pretty plaintiff was a matter of course. Had the interesting creature not already been fastened as a millstone round poor Captain Osborne's neck, she was sure, after that certificate from the press, to be magnificently wedded.

MEHERPORE and Chooadanga are two rural towns, in the district of Nuddea. Although within a distance of less than 20 miles from each other, these two places have, since the time of the indigo riots, been the headquarters of two conterminous sub-districts, each with its own staff of judicial and executive officers. Now that the European planters have very nearly given up Nuddea as a field of their enterprise, Sir Charles Elliott has wisely decided to amalgamate the two subdivisions into one. But as this decision rendered the abandonment of one of the two aforesaid towns inevitable, a bitter controversy arose as to their relative claims to preference. While the champions of aristocratic Meherpore sought to make out a good case for her by insisting upon the fact of her being an old town and having a central position, the Choadangites took exception to her insalubrious climate and her being less easily accessible than their own parvenu little station on the E. B. S. Railway. After giving due hearing to both sides, Sir Charles Elliott has decided in favor of the older town. We should think that the better course would have been to discard both, and to make some place like Tibhatta on the Jelengi the headquarters of the new sub-district. We would not, however, regret the choice that has been made, if its ultimate result be to draw the attention of Government to the necessity of adopting some measure for admitting a sufficiently large volume of water into the stagnant bed of the Bhyrub, so as to make it a blessing to the populous tract it passes through in its meandering course, instead of being, as it is, the nursery of the pestilential diseases which now decimate the poor inhabitants.

It is said that the Emperor of China is learning English. Irrespective of the British subjects of different races in the various colonies and dependencies of England, most foreigners are content to learn the French of all European languages. The Persians and Turks of the modern school affect French speech as well as manners. Diplomatic Pashas and Mirzas are commonly fair French scholars but ignorant of English. In the countries bordering on the Mediterranean and throughout Northern Africa, the French is extensively prevalent, while the English is a mere name. The conquests of Napoleon, the political ascendancy of France, and, above all, the persevering, pushing character of French foreign policy, supported by the skill of French diplomacy, have had more to do with bringing about this result than the inherent merits of the French language, great as these undoubtedly are. The statesmen of England and their agents abroad have sadly neglected to create the corresponding extent of influence among foreigners and specially those beyond the pale of Christendom. Amid the prevailing selfishness and sordidness of international intercourse in former times, England had the rare distinction of being enlightened and animated by great ideas and good principles. But she shrank from an imperial policy. It was long before she dimly discerned her position in the globe or her destiny. Otherwise, the English speech and English letters would by this have overspread the greater part of the earth. On the other hand, France made the most of her opportunities in this behalf.

In Southern and Eastern Asia, although the enterprise of the Jesuit missionaries gave the French language the start, the political ascendancy of the British has enabled the English tongue to distance it.

THE following is being innocently related in all the newspapers of Christendom as a fine joke, characteristic of the interesting idiosyncrasy of a British wit of quality :—

"One of the best stories told of Lord Lytton refers to the maid servants whom he kissed. Buried one day in a dream he entered his carriage with Lady Lytton, when she asked :—'Do you know what you did when you came out?' 'I have not the slightest idea' said the Ambassador, when Lady Lytton continued—'you kissed all the maid-servants.' The astonishing assertion made an impression upon the absent-minded diplomatist for some while, but at last he answered—'Let us hope that there were some pretty ones amongst them.'"

We wonder how the lady appreciated the compliment. How considerate towards the feelings of the poor wife was the repaitee ! So much for the chivalry of the practical lord ! The lady was, of course, used to this sort of treatment as his mother was used to worse brutality from his still more eminent and far more poetical father. This sort of day-dream was too common. Speaking from Indian tradition, it was his normal condition. His vicereignty was one long dream.

THE Bengal Government is developing persistency in error. The curtailment of the Doorga Pooja holidays has been a blundering business throughout. Last December, the Local Government published the public holidays it would allow under the Negotiable Instruments Act during the current year. We pointed out at the time that the number of the Act relied upon was not XVI but XXVI of 1881. This week, the same notification without any rectification is repeated in the Gazette without any justification for its reproduction.

THE Times of India's "Pen" is now far away on the tramp in France. He is of course reminded of the commonplaces current in English society in regard to that country. A good soul, he naturally remembers the more pleasant remarks on the natives, whether he agree with such remarks or not. He writes :—

"They manage these things better in France," is an old saying, to which, as a true born Briton, I by no means give an unqualified adherence."

It is difficult to compress more blunder in a single sentence. There is no such "saying," "old" or new. "They manage these things better in France," is simply a popular mistake—one of the numerous misquotations current not only in society, but also among literary men who are content to take remarks at second hand. It is the popular recasting of a little passage at the outset of Sterne's Sentimental Journey. The author writes, if we may trust our memory, "They order the matter better in France".

IN our Poet's Corner this week, we present to our readers some notable little pieces. The first consists of three stanzas on Patience which were clipped from an old magazine by the indefatigable collector, Dr. Robert Southey, Poet Laureate. The second is an anonymous piece which we ourselves draw from a similar source. The third and fourth are two of Mr. Swain's English Melodies. Although they have already appeared, few in this country are acquainted with them, specially of our Hindu and Mussulman readers. All, we are sure, will be glad of this opportunity of reading a couple of the loveliest little lyrics in the world. We reproduce them on purpose to show to our fellow Orientals who delight in erotic literature, what the pure Poetry of Love is like—Poetry as true as ever stirred the human heart, but free from the grossness of the flesh. Until they can appreciate such effusions, their claim to civilization will scarcely be fully admitted by the Western world.

REIS & RAYYET.

DEATH OF ÆSCULAPIUS.

SUCH, indeed, was the late Hakeem deemed. Mahmood Khan was not only the leading Mahomedan doctor of Delhi, but the chief physician of all India.

Hakeem Mahmood Khan's ancestors accompanied the Emperor Babar Shah from Kashghar to India. The place where they at first chose to settle in India was Hyderabad (Sind), and the tombs of two of his ancestors, Khajah Mahomed Hashim and Khajah Mahomed Kassim, are still to be found there. From Hyderabad they shifted to Akbarabad (Agra), where two or three generations passed away, and their dwelling houses are still in existence there. It was from this place that Hakeem Wasil Khan removed himself to Delhi, where since that time up to the present moment his descendants have permanently settled. The beginning of the family's medical profession dates from the time of Hakeem Fazil Khan, whose son Hakeem Wasil Khan had become the then court physician. After his death, his son, Hakeem Akmal Khan, succeeded him. The latter had completed all his education necessary for the profession when he was only 15 or 16 years of age. His genius was unequalled. He was the contemporary of the famous physician Ulvee Khan. After the death of Hakeem Akmal Khan, Hakeem Shareef Khan (one of his two sons) was appointed physician to the Emperor of Delhi and the Royal Family. He was a well-known man of extensive Eastern learning, and, as such, he is held in great regard and admiration in the world of letters. He is the author of some several useful and valuable works; and most of the Indian physicians read his book Ilāj-ul-Amrās with much benefit and advantage. It contains the most rare and choicest Yunani prescriptions. There is not a single educated physician who is not aware of Hakeem Shareef Khan, or has not been benefited by his professional writings. After the death of the latter, Hakeem Sadick Ali Khan (one of his six sons) became his successor; and although he did not figure prominently as an author, he showed special ability and skill in his own practice. There are people still living at Delhi who have been eye-witnesses to his marvellous power of curing most serious cases. Hakeem Sadick Ali Khan had three sons. The eldest, Hakeem Gholam Mahomed Khan, who was the court physician at Patiala, died, in the lifetime of his father, on his way back from Mecca. After the death of Hakeem Sadick Ali Khan, Hakeem Mahmood Khan took upon himself the burden and responsibility of this honorable profession. Though the venerable Hakeem used to live a free and independent life, and besides his professional practice he had nothing to do with the Government or the public at large, yet during the mutiny he rendered yeoman's service to thousands of people then in trouble. He had all those persons released who had been unjustly arrested. It is a well-known fact in Delhi that, at the time of the mutiny, when things worth thousands were sold at hundreds and those valued at hundreds could be had at tens, Hakeem Mahmood Khan, though well off, did not then buy anything worth a pice even. Those articles that had been entrusted to his care during the mutiny were kept by him with great safety and perfect honesty, and finally restored to their respective owners at the time of peace. In the days of the mutiny, when many conscientious persons were ready to buy cheap articles, Hakeem Mahmood Khan acted up to his own lofty conscience, and would refuse to buy anything brought to him for sale. To the following Native States, the Hakeem was called in for treatment—Hyderabad (called by Sir Khurshed Jah) Bikanir, Odeypore, Jumnoo, Rampore and Jheendh. Besides these, there are many other places whence he was sent for. His services were required at two or three other Native States, but he did not go, being utterly without avarice. Out of his 5 or 6 medical works, only two have been published. These two books treat of the most important matters for India considered from a medical point of view.

THE DRESS QUESTION.

THE recent order of Sir Charles Elliott that ministerial officers should be respectably and decently dressed, deserves careful consideration. While the question of the higher training of our young men is engaging attention and when so many other important questions of social reform are on the tapis, it is, I think, worth while to make a few observations regarding the dress of our younger generation which has of late undergone a remarkable change.

Dress is a great thing for a nation and a great link of unity. The Arabic proverb says, a person's worth is to be gauged from his dress and it makes the first impression upon an observer. I believe the greatest diversity prevails in dress among the people of Bengal generally and especially among the present generation of Bengalis. English education, European ideas of fashion, great changes in social association, frequent visits of our youngmen to England and changes in religious thoughts, all these have to account for this remarkable change. It seems that the Hindus had no national, or at least decent and respectable, dress which they could call their own. Therefore, during the Mahomedan rule, they adopted the Mahomedan costume in full which, although transformed in many ways, holds its place still among the old classes of Bengali gentlemen. Even in these days, on ceremonial occasions, we are not surprised to see the jamas and lattoo dar pugrees and other remnants of old times. Generally speaking, the dresses of our young men in Bengal and also most of the respectable classes and durbarees, is a ludicrous and shabby mixture of the European and the Mahomedan, each in itself incomplete and based on no principle or good taste. A large amount of money is spent on them, but without much good result. A respectable Babu is not often seen with a loose satin trouser, a fine black coat, a fashionable neck-tie and an embroidered cap. Another would prefer a kinkhab trouser, a satin or silk choga resembling a night gown, capped with a peculiar Bengali pagree. I have seen several young Babus with their Santipore dhoties and fashionable frock coats and high neck-ties. Shirts and dhoties of the above kind are used by many. As far as ones private home dress is concerned, I have not much to say if it is only decent, that is consistent with notions of decency as understood among educated and respectable classes. But when any person or member of a community attends a public place, party or durbar, with any particular dress and it is objectionable, it comes within the range of public criticism.

The English Government is no doubt a very liberal Government, and it has given much freedom to its Indian subjects. Freedom of speech is the first great boon which it has conferred on us with many others. But I think all of us have not up to this time made a very good use of it. Government has hitherto been very indifferent to the question of dress, with the result that matters went from bad to worse, and even the rules of darbar were transgressed. The dress with which some of our people attend Viceregal durbars and parties, is most objectionable and shows not only their bad taste but also want of proper training. Twenty years ago, no one would have dared to go and see a young Assistant Magistrate in such ludicrous and disrespectful dress. There was a time when the nobles of the land would not see the Commissioner except in proper durbari dress, and this rule is still observed in all the Provinces in Upper India, where again there is at least in each Province some uniformity in dress. A Mahomedan reis would not admit any man in his durbar or in his presence until and unless he was properly dressed, and subordinates were severely punished for neglect in that behalf. Englishmen have their own dresses and their rules which they strictly observe. It is time that the attention of the authorities should be directed to this point, as they can introduce many reforms by one word and one stroke of the pen which it would take our reformers years to effect. If the Viceroy really means to teach our young people good manners, he ought to insist upon their dressing properly in either the English or the native fashion. It is true that many young men have now a great liking for European dress. If it is so, let them have it by all means. But it must be perfect and respectable and not such as is neither fish nor fowl. If they like the Hindustani dress, let them adopt it in full, and I think most of them would look more respectable in it, as was remarked by Lord Dufferin.

We want uniformity, completeness and decency in the dress of our people. There are young men of each community who are now after English fashion and English dress. I don't wish to deprive them of their legitimate desire if they wish to fulfil it. The young English-knowing Mahomedans are quite welcome to adopt Turkish or Persian Durbari dress for ceremonial occasions, both of which are in reality European in two distinct forms. They may have the English dress also if they choose, but I should not like them to be dressed like a clown or a coxcomb. I think it is the duty of Government to prescribe the dress and uniform for its servants as for those who attend its courts or wait upon its representatives. There is in fact no exhibition of independence, as some think, in attending the Viceroy's parties and Durbars with brimless caps and China and frock coats. I believe, the Lieutenant-Governor could not see those ludicrous pictures of indecency and disrespect with which our courts have of late been full. Bench clerks with dirty shirts and dhotis, Moharruers with dhotis, chudders or wrappers, the Mahomedan Amla with ruj caps, and young officers with coxcombish brimless caps—these men must have changed their dresses or kept themselves aloof during his Honor's inspection. I think most of them can be rightly punished for contempt of court. The district officers are to some extent responsible for this deplorable state of things. I believe clerks in the Calcutta mercantile houses dress more respectably than the present Government clerks, and it is a pity that Government servants should not be taught how to appear before their superiors. Poor chaprasis and the rich pleaders have up to this time stuck to their old dresses and lebas Durbari. The Lieutenant-Governor's order is quite opportune, and since it has been issued officers are busy carrying it out. In detail that order may be advantageously modified, and I shall revert to it in my next letter if I have time.

An order of the same kind from the Viceroy in distinct terms will put matters to right and rouse the people to their sense of duty in this respect. It must have a good effect upon the manners of our young men who admittedly don't learn these things either in the school or at home. The class of men who are now being made respectable as a result of Government policy, cannot learn these things in our schools or in their homes. Most of the men who now enter public life in different professions and become durbaris and title holders, are entirely left at the mercy of their tailors regarding matters of dress. The old rules must be relaxed in the case of youngmen who adopt either European, Turkish, or Persian dress in their integrity. Noblemen of other countries and representatives of other Powers who have attended the Viceroy's durbars and parties in Calcutta, had occasion to remark the laxity which prevails in his court as regards the dress of the durbaris.

AN OBSERVER.

5th February.

ANOTHER CASE OF LIBEL.

THERE seems to be no end to the attacks, public and private, on the press. The last case took place in the Western Presidency, which is the special hot-bed of this species of litigation.

Captain H. de B. Howell, of the Worcestershire Regiment, sued in the Bombay High Court, Cursetjee Rustumjee, printer and publisher of the Poona Observer, claiming Rs. 5,000 damages for defamation.

The case as stated in the plaint is this. Pursuant to an advertisement in the newspapers, a walking match took place at Poona, on the 17th July, 1891, between Hancock, a professional pedestrian, and Private Watts, of the Lancashire Fusiliers.

The match took place on a course measuring 230 yards, or ten yards over a furlong. The walk was restricted to an hour, within which, in order to win, Hancock must walk five furlongs further than Watts. No judge having been appointed, Mr. T. Le Mesurier, who was time-keeper, announced, at the close, that Hancock had won. The announcement came upon the plaintiff, as on others, as a surprise, as he believed that, in point of fact, Watts was the winner. The whole thing having been conducted irregularly, without any constituted judge, Mr. Le Mesurier having acted beyond authority and made a mistake, the plaintiff, with many others, thought that the walking ought to be gone through again under proper arrangements, particularly as Mr. Le Mesurier was disqualified from being judge by having a bet on the race. To this end, he supplied to the sub-editor of the Poona Observer, of which the defendant is the proprietor and publisher, a true report of the circumstances attending the match. The sub-editor received it and made certain additions of his own. This report was published in the Poona Observer of the 18th July 1891. Subsequently, the defendant published in his issue of July 23, the libel complained of, charging Captain Howell with misleading the public by a false report attacking Mr. Le Mesurier's honour for nothing, &c.

The defendant denied that he was the publisher of the Poona Observer and averred that he was not in a position to know how far the allegations of the plaint were accurate. His account of the publication of the plaintiff's version of the match was this, namely, that the plaintiff called at the office of the Poona Observer, at the middle of the night of the 17th July, when the proof-reader, Mr. Cronan, alone was in attendance. Mr. Cronan showed him the report by the journal's reporter, which was then being set up in type. Captain Howell condemned the report as inaccurate and offered to give a correct version, which was taken down by Mr. Cronan, handed to the compositors, revised in proof between the Captain and Mr. Cronan, and thus published in the issue of the 18th July. The defendant denied that the sub-editor noted down and made certain additions, as Mr. Cronan was not the sub. No such responsible person was present in the office at that hour, or such a report would never have been admitted. Mr. Cronan clearly went beyond his authority in substituting a stranger's account for the reporter's report already accepted. Mr. Le Mesurier complained of the report published, correspondence took place, and the result was the insertion of the article, of which the plaintiff now complained. According to the defendant, the plaintiff had no just ground of complaint against the article, still, for the sake of peace, Cursetjee Rustumjee had published the letter of Captain Howell's solicitors, containing his complaint, in the Poona Observer of the 25th August, and at the same time he had caused portions of the article complained of to be withdrawn and regret was expressed that the same had been published. The defendant maintained that, whatever the case before, Captain Howell had no more ground for complaint left after the amende of the 25th August. Of course, the defendant concluded with denying that the plaintiff had suffered anything like a damage of Rs. 5,000. In short, the defendant prayed that the suit be dismissed with costs.

On application from the defence an order having been made by the court for the production of certain documents, the Advocate-General, for Government as well as Captain Howell, stated that the documents were official and the plaintiff had been ordered by the Commander-in-Chief not to produce them. Upon this, an interesting conversation took place.

"His lordship: But you have the documents and can produce them?"

Mr. Latham: We cannot do so, as the plaintiff is a public officer.

His lordship: I have nothing to do with that. I am only considering whether I shall dismiss the case now or give you some grace.

Mr. Jardine: When I asked for the production of the documents, I mentioned that the matter might be allowed to stand over till Thursday, so that we could have Wednesday for the inspection of the letters; but if I had thought the plaintiff would not have produced them, I should have at once asked for the case to be dismissed.

Mr. Latham: I may say that Captain Howell, after hearing your decision that he must produce the documents, is willing to do so; but I must now ask your lordship to hear me on behalf of Government as objecting to their production.

His lordship: I cannot hear you.

Mr. Latham: Will you rule, then, that I have no locus standi here as Advocate-General? Will you rule that you will not hear me on behalf of Government?

His lordship: I thought you were speaking on behalf of Government before.

Mr. Latham: No, on behalf of Captain Howell.

Mr. Jardine: I thought he was then appearing on behalf of Government also; he spoke about the Commander-in-Chief's letters.

Mr. Latham: The important point is whether Government is to be heard or not. That is what I should like to know.

Mr. Jardine: This is simply a matter between private parties, so the Government have no right to interpose.

Mr. Latham: Will your lordship rule that?

His lordship said an order had been passed on which the plaintiff was liable to have his suit dismissed. In order to give him time to produce the documents, as it was then past five o'clock, he would postpone the case to Thursday, when, if the order was not obeyed the suit would be dismissed. He had made a note to the effect that he understood the Advocate-General had been addressing him on behalf of Government, and that it was not necessary for him to be heard further in regard to the matter.

Mr. Latham: It is important to know whether Government has any locus standi here or not.

His lordship: I have decided that and ruled they have not.

The case was then adjourned till Thursday.

On that day the documents were produced.

The case was dismissed with costs on the 29th January, Mr. Justice Parsons holding that the article in question was not a libel, but was strictly and literally true in every particular, as the account furnished by the plaintiff contained statements which were incorrect and had not been verified.

THE UNIVERSITY CONVOCATION.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR'S ADDRESS.

The Hon. Justice Gooroo Das Bannerjee, the Vice-Chancellor, in reply to the call from his Excellency the Chancellor, after a few introductory remarks, addressed the Convocation in the following terms:—

The number of candidates for our examination in the past year, was, I observe, less than the number in the year preceding. One cause of this is, I think, to be found in our own statistics. The successful candidates at the Entrance and F. A. examinations of 1889, who would in due course form respectively the majority of the candidates for the F. A. and B. A. examinations of 1889 were comparatively small in number, the year 1889 having been, as you will remember, a year of heavy failures; and the year 1890, which was one of fair average results, did not leave any unusually large residue of unsuccessful candidates to make up the deficiency.

Another circumstance, which may also partly account for this decrease, was the exercise of greater care and discrimination by the heads of institutions in sending up candidates for examination. So far as the falling off is due to this cause, it need not create much misgiving, especially when our schools and colleges, which are the real source of our strength, are steadily increasing in number.

The question whether the growth of our educational institutions has not reached a point after which their further growth requires to be regulated and restrained, came up before the Senate last year, and is still under consideration. Some are of opinion that new schools and colleges should be recognized and affiliated irrespective of their effect on older institutions, and then free competition would lead to the survival of the fittest; while others maintain that if rival institutions opened for purpose of gain, but not required to satisfy any real want, are allowed to exist, they lead to unhealthy competition, injurious to the interests of discipline and sound education. There is some force in the argument on each side.

Remembering that it is only a small fraction of the vast population of the country that shares the benefits of education, we must not too rigidly adhere to the principle that demand should precede supply, but should sometimes allow supply to anticipate and create demand, as it not unfrequently does. But, on the other hand, it must be borne in mind that as in nine cases out of ten the customer here is not likely to be a competent judge of the commodity, free competition requires control to secure efficiency and usefulness.

The subject involves conflicting considerations of some nicety, and much will always depend upon the good sense and discrimination of the controlling authority. We may hope that the question will be considered by the Senate, in all its bearings, and a satisfactory solution will soon be arrived at.

The Regulations relating to the examinations in the several Faculties have undergone revision more or less during the past year.

The scheme of Law Studies has been carefully revised by a committee consisting of a learned Judge of the High Court, who is the President of the Faculty of Law, and of the Advocate-General, the Senior Government Pleader, one of the leading Attorneys, and two experienced Professors of Law representing the affiliated Law Colleges. A scheme thus prepared may well be accepted as including all that it is necessary to equip the young lawyer with, to qualify him for the responsible duties of his profession; and the B. L. degree will, I hope, continue to enjoy and deserve the recognition it has hitherto had, as a test of fitness for entering the profession, or the judicial service.

In the Regulations in Medicine an important change has been introduced requiring unsuccessful candidates to go through a fresh course of instruction in the subjects in which they are found deficient, before they are admitted to examination again. The rule is intended to secure that standard of proficiency which is necessary to be attained by those who must be entrusted with life and health.

The Regulations in Engineering have been referred for revision to the Faculty of Engineering along with a letter from the Director of Public Instruction and a Resolution of the Government of Bengal recommending certain changes. One of these recommendations is to introduce an alternative course for Mining Engineers. The somewhat better prospects held out to graduates in Engineering in the Government Resolution just referred to, may, I hope, make our degrees in Engineering more attractive than they have hitherto been.

The privilege granted last year to the M. As. and holders of corresponding degrees in the other Faculties to elect two gentlemen from among themselves for appointment as Fellows was again allowed by his Excellency the Chancellor to be exercised this year; and electors resident in the mofussil were invited to take part in the election by signing their voting papers in the presence of a Magistrate. How greatly the privilege is valued is shown by the fact that out of about 900 Masters and Doctors whose names are on our rolls, no less than 641 took part in the election, and voting papers came from the most distant parts of the empire. The voting resulted in the election of Babu Pran Nath Pandit and Babu Upendra Nath Mitra, and I am glad to say that their election has met with the approval of His Excellency. To these, and the other gentlemen who have been just appointed Fellows, I accord a most hearty welcome.

After a passing tribute to the late Mr. Downing, Raja Rajendra Lal Mitra and Pandit Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, the address alluding to the death of Pandit Adjudhaya Nath, said :—

In Pandit Adjudhaya Nath we have lost another distinguished colleague, a man 'of whom,' as the Vice-Chancellor of the Allahabad University has justly remarked, 'any country and any race might be proud.' His numerous professional and other engagements in the North-West left him little time, it is true, to take any active share in our work, but his warm sympathy for our educated young men in all their hopes and aspirations, and his earnest exertions and immense self-sacrifice to promote the good of his country, made him loved and respected by the educated classes all over India, and Bengal mourns his loss as deeply as his Native province.

The speaker alluded to the death of the Duke of Clarence, and then proceeded to touch upon one or two of the educational problems that pressingly demand solution.

It is said, not without some truth, that the University is turning out graduates in much larger numbers than can find suitable employment; and that, while the education that it encourages is so ill-remunerative, the cost of time and energy that preparation for its examinations demands is disproportionately high. The question therefore presses upon us, how to regulate our courses of study so as to ensure the greatest usefulness and entail the least loss of time and energy to the student?

As regards the courses of study prescribed for examinations in the special Faculties of Law and Medicine, it is not easy to see what useful change the University can introduce. These courses have been settled by distinguished members of the respective professions with due regard to their usefulness for the careers for which they are intended to train our graduates; and considering the grave responsibilities to be undertaken, they cannot be said to be too exacting in their demand upon the time and attention of the student. If skilled labour in these professions does not find sufficient work or adequate remuneration, the law of supply and demand must be left to bring about the necessary economic equilibrium.

The case, however, is somewhat different with regard to our course of study in Engineering. Here it is, I think, possible for the University to introduce changes for the better. Though a well qualified body of legal or medical practitioners can create no new work for themselves, unless it be by making people oversensitive about their legal rights or health—a state of things not very desirable in itself—a body of engineers or persons duly trained in those branches of science and art which enable them to develop the material resources of the country, can create work for themselves and wealth for others.

But even here the University unaided can do very little. It may prescribe courses of study and institute examinations in Mining Engineering or Agriculture, or other similar subjects; but unless there are colleges established, competent to give a thorough and efficient theoretical and practical training in those subjects, the prescribed courses of study can never be profitably pursued, and the examination creditably passed.

But how are we to have such a college established? It must be a long time before private liberality which is taxed in so many ways can be expected to endow an institution of this sort. Though I am extremely reluctant to ask my countrymen to invoke the aid of Government where they can help it, in the present instance I must say we cannot do without such aid. We ought therefore to be deeply thankful to Sir Charles Elliott for the views expressed by him in the Resolution already alluded to, where he says: "He considers that the increase of the number of young men trained to engineering pursuits and qualified by their training to develop the resources of the province is an object on which he is justified in incurring large outlay, since he is confident that all such outlay will be fully reproductive."

The policy indicated in this Resolution regarding the training of our young men in Engineering and Agriculture will, if fully carried out, as I confidently hope it will be, mark a new era in the educational, and the general progress of the country, and the dreams of gold of which we recently heard so much, will be realized, though in a somewhat different shape.

In the courses of study prescribed for our Arts examinations, I think it is not only desirable, but absolutely necessary, to introduce certain changes, and I am glad to say that the attention of the University has already been drawn in this direction.

Our Entrance examination every year attracts several thousands of candidates, of whom only a small number intend to pursue their studies in Arts any further, the rest being anxious to pass the examination to qualify themselves for some occupation for which an Entrance certificate is considered a necessary or a desirable recommendation. It would, therefore, be ignoring the case of this large body of candidates if the Entrance course is prescribed only with a view to train students for entering the University. It may no doubt be said that those who do not intend to enter the University need not come up for the Entrance examination. But the passing of this examination implies a certain well-recognised education and even social position which has made the examination so attractive; and, in the interests of education and progress, we ought to do our best to foster the generous ambition which even the intending cultivator or mechanic feels to be an undergraduate of the University. Considering, however, the great diversity of careers for which the Entrance examination will have to prepare the students, if it is to be organised for such a comprehensive object, the prescribed course of study must consist of a large number of alternative subjects, each being suited for a particular career, but everyone of them ensuring a certain amount of mental training. If such a scheme is judiciously devised, it will qualify our undergraduates not only for literary and scientific careers, but also for industrial and commercial pursuits—a thing that is very much needed to remove the block caused by overcrowding in their avenues to employment.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Indisputable Remedies.—In the use of these medicaments there need be no hesitation or doubt of their cooling, healing, and purifying properties. The Ointment stands unrivalled for the facility it displays in relieving, healing, and thoroughly curing the most inveterate sores and ulcers, and in cases of bad legs and bad breasts they act as a charm. The Pills are the most effectual remedy ever discovered for the cure of liver complaints, diseases most disastrous in their effects, deranging all the proper functions of the organs affected, inducing restlessness, melancholy, weariness, inability to sleep, and pain in the side, until the whole system is exhausted. These wonderful Pills, if taken according to the printed directions accompanying each box, strike at the root of the malady, stimulate the stomach and liver into a healthy action, and effect a complete cure.

The movement recently set on foot to reconcile sea voyages with Hindu orthodoxy may, if it succeeds, stimulate commercial activity and enterprise, and hereby open out fresh fields of employment for our educated young men.

After pointing out that "though to enable us to supply ourselves with the necessaries of life must be the first object of education, to earn wealth is certainly not its sole, nor its chief end;" the speaker referred to the hurtful effect exercised on the mind of the student by the great extent of the course of study.

Another cause, he said, which operates prejudicially in a similar way is the time-serving spirit in which our young men often pursue their study. A pernicious habit, which I am sorry to hear is gaining strength, prevails with the great bulk of our students, of reading not with a view to gain knowledge and improve the mind, but merely with a view to pass examinations. It is high time now that our teachers and professors should exert all their influence resolutely to put down this evil, and should use every opportunity forcibly to point out to their pupils the lamentable folly of wasting their time and energy in learning the petty art of achieving unmerited success at the temporary trials in the examination hall when they should be improving and strengthening their minds to qualify them for the continued trial in life.

While imputing to our students the blame that justly attaches to them, I must not disclaim our own share of it. Our examinations have, no doubt, from a desire to make them thorough and searching, occasionally been such as to require special preparation as distinguished from such general study of the prescribed subjects as a student desirous of gaining knowledge and improving his mind would naturally go through. We have sometimes demanded from our examinees a too minute knowledge of minor details or knowledge of a sort that is not likely to be necessary or useful anywhere except in the examination hall. As a very eminent and experienced examiner, Professor Huxley, has remarked, 'examination, like fire, is a good servant, but a bad master.' It should serve as a test for diligent and thoughtful study, instead of making study serve its peculiar requirements.

One great reason why our University education fails to awaken much original thinking is because it is imparted through the medium of a difficult foreign language, the genius of which is so widely different from that of our own. The acquisition of such a language must, to a great extent, be the work of imitation; and the habit of imitation gradually becomes so deep rooted as to influence our intellectual operations generally. Again, the costly foreign drapery in which our students have to clothe their thoughts, taxes their limited mental resources to an extent which does not leave enough for the proper feeding and fostering of thought. The only way out of the difficulty is for the student to economise his means, and to forego all temptation for finery in language, and concentrate his efforts to the cultivation of the thinking faculty; and he may rest assured that noble thoughts never fail to command attention, though clad in plain and homely garb.

The Vice-Chancellor then referred to what he characterized as the "deplorable neglect of physical education":—

The University can do very little to remedy the evil, but those who are entrusted with the management of schools and colleges should never forget their responsibility in this matter. They should strongly impress upon their students the indispensable necessity of attending to health, and they should encourage healthful and harmless physical exercise, and supply facilities for it, without however introducing any element of compulsion or restraint.

One very hopeful sign of progress in this direction is to be found in the fact that the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province is taking a kindly personal interest in the physical well-being of our students, and I take this opportunity of sincerely thanking his Honor for the encouragement they have been receiving from him.

And may I here appeal to Government and private liberality to acquire for us some suitable playground near the Senate House where our undergraduates may resort, so that side by side with the seat of those trials that so severely tax the mind, there may be a place for refreshing recreation to strengthen the body, and the University may be associated not only with distressing thoughts of impending examinations, but also with joyous recollections of youthful pastime and innocent pleasure?

There is one other educational topic upon which I have a word to say. A good deal of adverse criticism, sometimes proceeding from high authorities, is levelled against the fluctuating percentage of failures at our examinations, which no doubt ranges between widely divergent limits. The fact commented upon certainly requires examination, and I must thank our critics for drawing attention pointedly to it. If it is due to any variation in our standard, the result is clearly unfair to the examinees. But it may be due to other causes (besides, as a little consideration will show. Ordinarily no doubt one year is just as good as another, and the percentage of good candidates would not vary greatly from year to year. But owing to some change in the teaching staff of a large college or owing to an epidemic such as influenza (causes which are not altogether imaginary, but have sometimes been in actual operation), the percentage of ill-prepared candidates in any year may greatly exceed the average. Besides, there are, as every one who has experience in the line knows, good and bad years in respect of the proportion of good and bad students in a class, just as there are good and bad years in respect of many natural phenomena, though we are not always able to ascertain the cause. So then the University may not always and alone be responsible for the fluctuations noticed. So far as it is, it should do its best to prevent any recurrence of the evil. One of the remedies suggested, the appointment of a permanent Board of Examiners, though theoretically perfect, involves many practical difficulties. The subject will, however, I hope, receive careful consideration soon.

While on this subject of criticism on our work, I would beg leave to say to our critics in all sincerity and earnestness, that such of them as are in a position directly to assist the University in its deliberations, will do immensely greater service to it, if they will favour it with their counsels first, and then, if need be, with their criticism next.

I must now offer my young friends who have just obtained their degrees my most hearty congratulations. The success of the lady graduates whom I have had the pleasure of admitting to their degrees is to my mind matter for special congratulation. In saying this I am far from insinuating that their success was unexpected or exceptional; on the contrary, considering the highly susceptible and impressionable nature of the gentler sex, which enables them to imbibe knowledge soon and retain it long, such success is but natural, and the poet truly says,

Men seeking knowledge long must strive,
And over many volumes pore;
But favoured women all their lore
With ease from Nature's grace derive.

What I mean to say is that their success is a more sure index of the progress of education than the success of young men can be. Young men may, and very often do, seek for knowledge in order to succeed in life; but when women who are far less likely to be swayed by such motives, seek for it, the love of knowledge for its own sake must be influencing those whose influence upon society though gentle is irresistible.

I would also specially congratulate the three distinguished graduates in Arts who have won our most valuable prize—the Premchand Roy Chand Studentship, and the young Doctor who, after a brilliant college career, has so well earned the highest degree in Medicine.

Many of you, my young friends, may be thinking now that you have passed through the first stage of life, the stage of preparation, and are about to enter the second, the stage of action.

Now one of the most distressing realities of the world you are going to enter, is the immense disproportion between the many that toil and the few that succeed. If at any of the examinations held in this hall, there is heavy failure, the result attracts public attention, and evokes criticism, and steps are taken to prevent its recurrence in future. But who can criticise to any purpose the conduct of the world's examinations? We must take the world as it is. But if you cannot make the world conform to your views, you must not on the other hand servilely suit yourselves to the world to achieve success.

Another perplexing reality of our situation is the strange inconsistency between profession and practice. As students you have spent much time in learning principles; be it then your first aim upon entering life rigidly to adhere to those principles in spite of the contaminating influence of example. If you wish to succeed in life, that is, if you wish to control the material forces of nature, and the still more subtle forces that move society, so as to make them subserve your purpose, you must possess a powerful and a resolute will,—a will at least as powerful and resolute as can enable you to bring your own actions into conformity with the principles you profess.

If you are able to surmount these difficulties, if you can reconcile your practice with your principles, and if, furthermore, you can reconcile yourself with your lot, you shall have earned that peace within, that true source of happiness, which even the most successful men often fail to attain. And your success, though measured by the amount of work done it may not be great, will surely not be small if measured by the moral strength acquired, strength which will not only sustain you in the race of life, but will stand you in good stead even in that awful stage of it that leads to eternity.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

DAMAGES, TWO HUNDRED POUNDS.

SPECIAL Jurymen of England ! who admire your country's laws,
And proclaim a British jury worthy of the realm's applause ;
Gaily compliment each other at the issue of a cause
Which was tried at Guildford 'sises, this day week as ever was.

Unto that august tribunal comes a gentleman in grief,
(Special was the British jury, and the judge, the baron chief,
Comes a British man and husband—asking of the law relief,
For his wife was stolen from him—he 'd have vengeance on the thief.

Yes, his wife, the blessed treasure with the which his life was crowned,
Wickedly was ravished from him by a hypocrite profound,
And he comes before twelve Britons, men for sense and truth renowned,
To award him for his damage, twenty hundred sterling pound.

He by counsel and attorney there at Guildford does appear,
Asking damage of the villain who seduced his lady dear ;
But I can't help asking, though the lady's guilt was all too clear,
And though guilty the defendant, was n't the plaintiff rather queer ?

First the lady's mother spoke, and said she 'd seen her daughter cry
But a fortnight after marriage ; early times for piping eye.
Six months after, things were worse, and the piping eye was black,
And this gallant British husband caned his wife upon the back.

Three months after they were married, husband pushed her to the door,
Told her to be off and leave him, for he wanted her no more ;
As she would not go, why he went ; thrice he left his lady dear,
Left her, too, without a penny, for more than a quarter of a year.

Mrs. Frances Duncan knew the parties very well indeed,
She had seen him pull his lady's nose and make her lip to bleed ;
If he chanced to sit at home not a single word he said ;
Once she saw him throw the cover of a dish at his lady's head.

Sarah Green, another witness, clear did to the jury note
How she saw this honest fellow seize his lady by the throat,
How he cursed her and abused her, beating her into a fit,
Till the pitying next-door neighbours crossed the wall and witnessed it.

Next door to this injured Briton Mr. Owers, a butcher, dwelt ;
Mrs. Owers' foolish heart towards this erring dame did melt ;
(Not that she had erred as yet, crime was not developed in her,)
But being left without a penny, Mrs. Owers supplied her dinner—
God be merciful to Mrs. Owers, who was merciful to this sinner !

Caroline Naylor was their servant, said they led a wretched life,
Saw this most distinguished Briton fling a teacup at his wife ;
He went out to balls and pleasures, and never once, in ten months' space,
Saw his wife, or spoke her kindly. This was the defendant's case.

Pollock, C. B., charged the jury ; said the woman's guilt was clear ;
That was not the point, however, which the jury came to hear,
But the damage to determine which as it should true appear,
This most tender-hearted husband, who so used his lady dear,

Beat her, kicked her, caned her, cursed her, left her starving, year by year,

Flung her from him, parted from her, wrung her neck, and boxed her ear
What the reasonable damage this afflicted man could claim,
By the loss of the affections of this guilty graceless dame ?

Then the honest British Twelve, to each other turning round,
Laid their clever heads together with a wisdom most profound ;
And towards his lordship looking, spoke the foreman wise and sound :
" My lord, we find for this here plaintiff damages two hundred pound."

So, God bless the Special Jury ! pride and joy of English ground,
And the happy land of England ; where ~~from~~ justice does abound !
British jurymen and husbands ; let us hail this verdict proper ;
If a British wife offends you, Britons, you 've a right to whop her.

Though you promised to protect her, though you promised to defend her,
You are welcome to neglect her ; to the devil you may send her ;
You may strike her, curse, abuse her ; so declares our law renowned ;
And if after this you lose her—why you 're paid two hundred pound.

—Punch, 1850.

ODE TO THE BED.

A POSTHUMOUS POEM BY THE LATE THOMAS HOOD, THE ELDER.

OH, bed ! oh, bed ! delicious bed !
That heaven upon earth to the weary head ;
But a place that to name would be ill-bred,
To the head with a wakeful trouble—
'T is held by such a different lease !
To one a place of comfort and peace,
All stuffed with the down of stubble geese,
To another with only the stubble !

To one, a perfect Halcyon nest,
All calm, and balm, and quiet, and rest,
And soft as the fur of the cony—
To another so restless for body and head,
That the bed seems borrowed from Nettlebed,
And the pillow from Stratford the stony !

To the happy a first class carriage of ease,
To the land of Nod, or where you please.
But, alas ! for the watchers and weepers,
Who turn, and turn, and turn again,
But turn, and turn, and turn in vain,
With an anxious brain,
And thoughts in a train
That does not run upon sleepers !

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, nor other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

Wide awake as the mousing owl,
Night-hawk, or other nocturnal fowl—
But more profitless vigils keeping—
Wide awake in the dark they stare,
Filling with phantoms the vacant air,
As if that crook-back'd tyrant, Care,
Had plotted to kill them sleeping.

And oh ! when the blessed diurnal light
Is quenched by the providential night,
To render our slumber more certain,
Pity, pity the wretches that weep,
For they must be wretched who cannot sleep,
When God himself draws the curtain !

The careful Betty the pillow beats,
And airs the blankets and smooths the sheets,
And gives the mattress a shaking—
But vainly Betty performs her part,
If a ruffled head and a rumpled heart
As well as the couch want making.

There's Morbid, all bile, and verjuice, and nerves ;
Where other people would make preserves,
He turns his fruits into pickles—
Jealous, envious, and fretful by day,
At night to his own sharp fancies a prey,
He lies like a hedgehog rolled up the wrong way,
Tormenting himself with his prickles.

But a child—that bids the world good night,
In downright earnest, and cuts it quite—
A cherub no art can copy—
'T is a perfect picture to see him lie
As if he had supped on dormouse pie,
(An ancient classical dish, by the by,)
With a sauce of syrup of poppy.

Oh, bed ! bed ! bed ! delicious bed !
That heaven upon earth to the weary head,
Whether lofty or low its condition !
But instead of putting our plagues on shelves,
In our blankets how oft we toss ourselves,
Or are tossed by such allegorical elves
As Pride, Hate, Creed and Ambition !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Secretary of State has sanctioned the appointment of a fourth stipendiary Presidency Magistrate for the city of Bombay. In Calcutta, we have only two such magistrates.

PARIS ate last year 21,291 horses, 229 donkeys, and 40 mules, the meat weighing, according to the returns, 4,615 tons. Not many years ago, within our remembrance, there was no strong prejudice against eating these quadrupeds.

MR. Chunilal Punalal, of the Kalbadevi Road in the city of Bombay, "in submitting his condolences to her Imperial Majesty the Queen and their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in the general calamity which has overtaken the Empire in the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale," had "the honor to send (to the Bombay Government) a sum of Rs. 1,000 in aid of the sufferers on account of the famine, though partial, that is now raging in Bijapur and its adjoining districts."

THE Governor of Bombay has just declared, under the Famine Relief Code, that famine is now prevailing in the Bijapur district, area 5,757 square miles, population 796,339 ; Athni, Gokak and Paragad talukas (with Murgod Petha), area 2,096 square miles, population 350,249 ; Belgaum district and Gadag (with the Mundargi Petha) Ron and Navalgund (with the Nargund Petha) talukas of the Dharwar district, area 1,631 square miles, population 321,199.

WE draw the attention of the Indian paper-manufacturers to the following:—

"Very satisfactory results are now being obtained by some of the English paper manufactures in bleaching paper by electricity ; the process rendering the paper perfectly white, without in the least injuring its strength. The process in question depends on the use of a solution of magnesium chlorid, which is decomposed by the action of strong electric current into chlorine and oxygen on the one hand and into magnesium and hydrogen on the other. Plates of platinum are used as electrades."

THREE years ago, Robert Sims, an intelligent farmer living in Choctaw County, Alabama, started a sect called the "Simsites," the chief doctrine of which was that every man was master of himself, and owed no obedience to any human law. In a short time, there were over a hundred Simsites, who started an "organ" named the "True Way," which was edited and set up by Sims' three accomplished daughters. It gradually transpired that the Simsites distilled illicit whiskey, and this was a frequent cause of quarrel with the revenue officers. Social order is still nebulous in those parts, for these fiscal differences led to free fights, resulting in the loss of men on both sides. The struggle could not go on for ever, and after all Sims was captured, and lynched, together with his son and a friend appropriately named Savage. It is reported that since then Sims' three daughters, who, though well educated, are chips of the old block, fanatical and determined to the last degree, have been lynched too—the first example of this rude judicature against woman.

MR. Barker, of the Survey Department, of 24 years' service, is charged, before the District Magistrate of Bellary, with criminal breach of trust, in connection with the salaries of his establishment. He was refused bail.

THE following passages about volunteers and volunteering are from the speech of Lord Roberts, the Commander-in-Chief, at the inspection of the Presidency Volunteers on the 30th January:—

"The fact that the Government so promptly accepted the offer made by the Calcutta Volunteer Rifle Corps and the Surma Valley Light Horse to take part in the Manipur expedition shows the use it believes that Volunteers may be in time of trouble. And, since I had the honour of addressing you in March last, the Viceroy has been pleased to mark his appreciation of the services of the Volunteer force by appointing four Volunteer Officers to be his Excellency's Honorary Aides-de-Camp, which distinction must be very gratifying to every Volunteer in India. Their Excellencies the Governors of Madras and Bombay, and their Honors the Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal, the North-Western Provinces and the Punjab have all shown their interest in Volunteers in many different ways, and have connected themselves with the force by selecting Aides-de-Camp from it, an example which, with the approval of the Government of India, I propose to follow, if I can persuade any Volunteer Officers to honour me by becoming my Honorary Aides-de-Camp. Then, the committee which is about to sit in Calcutta to enquire into various matters connected with the Volunteer service, some of which have been already partially discussed by the preliminary committee which assembled at Simla last September, must satisfy every one belonging to that service that there is every desire to make all reasonable concessions, and to confer on all ranks such substantial advantages as may be practicable, in return for the efforts and sacrifices which Volunteers make on behalf of their country."

"It is not for me to anticipate the decisions that may be arrived at in regard to the recommendations that have been made by the Simla committee, or, judging by those recommendations, what are likely to be made by the Calcutta committee, but Volunteers may rest assured that no one recognizes more fully than myself the value they possess as an important element in our military organization. Having this high opinion of Volunteers you can understand how anxious I am that they should be in all respects thoroughly efficient ; that the rank and file should be really good shots, and the officers so intimately acquainted with their duties as to be able to instruct those whom they command. As in the Army, so with Volunteers, the efficiency of a regiment or battery mainly depends upon its officers, but there is this difference between the two services, that, while in the Army, the men have nothing to say to the appointment of their officers, in the Volunteer force in India the selection of the officers, under existing regulations, practically lies with the men. A grave responsibility thus rests on the force generally, and I earnestly hope that the selections may be made with a due sense of this responsibility, and that men intended to hold the position of Volunteer Officers may be chosen for their ability to instruct their companies in all duties they are likely to be called upon to perform, and not because of the length of their purses. Money is undoubtedly a great power, but since the abolition of purchase we have done our utmost in the regular Army to prevent its coming into competition with military efficiency."

"Another point to which I desire to draw attention and which is applicable to officers and men of the regular Army and Volunteers alike, is the desirability of cultivating a smart and soldier-like appearance in uniform, on and off parade. Every man should be correctly dressed, he should invariably carry his rifle himself, and he should salute all officers in uniform and also those not in uniform whom he knows to be officers."

"To give you an idea to what length the want of a proper soldierly spirit may go, I may mention an incident which was brought to my notice a short time ago. At an up-country station a Volunteer battalion was brigaded with the regular troops, as part of a force holding the bridges across a river, and it was ordered to advance at a certain hour to the assistance of a convoy which was supposed to be attacked by the enemy's cavalry. The Officer Commanding the Volunteers was directed to take every precaution to prevent his own corps being cut off by the enemy, and in compliance with this order, a reconnoitring party was sent forward previous to the advance of the battalion. As you all know there are certain very simple rules laid down in the drill book for the composition and movements of such a party, and yet in the case under reference the reconnaissance actually took the form of one corporal and three privates driven along the road in a ticca gharry—a proceeding which could not fail to bring discredit on the battalion concerned, and which really amounted to the ludicrous."

They have undertaken a Herculean task who are for making an army, even of the amateur auxiliary kind, of such material. And the state is truly to be pitied which depends upon such easy soldiering. The unspeakable Baboos of caricature have never been worse represented by Anglo-Indian wits than Lord Roberts paints his dear Volunteers.

ACCORDING to a German paper, when Prince Alexander, now Count Hartenan, was ruler of Bulgaria, the Czar sanctioned a large subvention which he was told would be the means of Alexander's submission to Russian dictation. Notwithstanding the grant, Alexander proved himself hostile to the Russian Minister at Sophia. This was a surprise to the Czar. He, thereupon, conceived a disliking for the Bulgarian ruler, and Alexander was deposed. On learning the cause of his deposition, the Prince expressed his surprise—he was not aware of any subvention and he never saw a rouble of the large sums said to have been sent from Russia to Bulgaria.

Where then did the money go? Doubtless to the pockets of the officials. Great ministers of state are not above suspicion in the West, any more than in the East.

THE Times of India says:—

"General Von Kodolitsch, in course of an interview with a press representative, said he envied and admired the Indian Army. He considered the Indian Cavalry quite up to the standard of that of any Continental power, and were able to hold their own, man for man, against any regiment of the French and Russian Cavalry. The sporting qualities of the British officer particularly struck the General during his tour in India, and this sport seemed to give the officers such good physical training for war, that in his opinion this training in field sport was almost as important as that on the drill ground. He nowhere had seen so much money offered for prizes in rifle shooting as in India. As regards a Russian invasion, the General said the Russians would have absolutely no chance of success."

This is reassuring, and, in the face of the British habit of grumbling and self-depreciation, it is even valuable.

THESE limbs of the press are not to be easily appeased. Not content with the frank way in which General Von Kodolitsch gave his opinion of the Indian army, specially in its cavalry branch, a correspondent of a Madras Anglo-Indian journal—probably the same as the press representative mentioned by the Times of India—pursued the distinguished foreigner with impertinence. The General said that he had seen the Indian native troops in Abyssinia look well and fight well too, but there is a wonderful improvement in them since then. He confessed he was never more astonished in his life than at the horsemanship and skill displayed by the native cavalry at the Poona manœuvres. He added:—

"They are splendid looking men too, and their seat and bearing very soldier-like. Everything about their saddlery and appointments was thoroughly clean, smart and serviceable. I am an old cavalry officer myself, and I must say I consider your Indian cavalry quite up to the standard of that of any of the Continental powers, and able to hold their own, man for man, with any of the regiments of French or Russian Cavalry."

Nothing could be better than that tribute. But the "gentleman of the Press" had got a live Continental General within range, and he could not have the heart to let him off easily. He actually asked him "Or Austrian?" The man is so sure of the wit, to say nothing of the propriety, of his query, that he adds, "I asked, with a smile." The General was, of course, too prudent, in a foreign territory, to answer by a slap in the face. As the correspondent himself relates—"But the General laughed and said, 'Ah, well.'"

THE following, started by a Lahore paper, is going the round of the press:—

"A horrid story is brought to Peshawur by some fugitive eunuchs from Jellalabad. According to them, a Cabuli Sirdar, a relative of the Ameer, was celebrating the birth of a son; and some ten eunuchs, of whom there are about 30 in Cabul, were employed to dance and sing in the women's apartments. One of them misbehaved towards one of the women present, the young and beautiful wife of a Sirdar guest, whereupon a great clamour arose among the women. The men, rushing upon the scene, seized the supposed eunuch and found that he and another of the ten were not what they represented themselves to be. They were then, so the story goes, taken before the Ameer, who ordered them to be flayed alive, which was done, and the flesh thrown away. The rest of the eunuchs were driven out of Afghanistan, and the terror of the Ameer also caused the eunuchs of Jellalabad, some ten in number, to flee to Peshawur, where they arrived and told the above story."

There is evidently a little misconception here. These are not eunuchs proper but hermaphrodites, a despised and miserable class, who live by singing and dancing at births and marriages, and by begging and bullying. Eunuchs have more respect, as they are far more respectable, living as members of the families in which they are slaves, and often commanding influence in their respective households. They do not go about singing and dancing at different families—an occupation forbidden to the good Mussulman. Hermaphrodites, so far as one may judge from their gestures in this city, are lascivious, while, as regards capacity for mischief, all are not quite so fangless as might be imagined. The preceding account seems to suggest that the outrage was committed by a man—whole and sound—who had got himself smuggled into the sanctum sanctorum of the Oriental home in the company, and as one of the eunuchs, or hermaphrodites as we take them to be. There is no impossibility in this idea. An Emperor of Delhi, one of the most abandoned wretches who ever disgraced the throne, used to visit the houses of the nobility in female disguise, in the company of musicians and dancing girls.

BABOO Gonesh Chunder Chunder, attorney-at-law, has walked into the shoes of the Hon'ble Dr. Rashbehari Ghosh in the local Legislative Council, leaving his friend the Rai Bahadar Surbadhicary in the lurch. How the successful limb of the law must be astonished at the latest trick of Fortune!

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

PARLIAMENT was opened on Tuesday, the 9th instant, by Royal Commission. The Speech from the Throne referred to the death of the Duke of Clarence and Avondale and the deep sympathy shewn by her Majesty's subjects throughout the empire; to the death of the Khedive Tewfik of Egypt; to the friendly relations with Foreign Powers and the throwing out of Zanzibar as a free port conducive to the development of the Sultan of Turkey's dominions and to the promotion of British commerce in East Africa. The House of Lords voted an address in reply to the Speech, Lord Salisbury informing the House that Government would never abandon Egypt to the supremacy of any other Power or to anarchy.

In the Lower House, they are still debating on the Address. Mr. Samuel Smith, Member for Flintshire, complained of the neglect of Indian affairs. He advocated the elective principle in the Indian Legislative Councils and the suppression of the opium trade. He was replied to by the Hon. George Curzon, the new Under-Secretary for India. He hoped the Indian Councils Bill would come before the House of Lords before Easter, and that a despatch of the Government of India shewing a resolute intention to restrict the traffic complained of, be shortly presented to Parliament. According to the Times, that despatch displays the qualities of vigilance, prudence and zeal for which the British rule in India is remarkable. Mr. Smith's opposition was formulated in an amendment moved by an Irish Member, Mr. Macneill, for Donegal. It also regrets the absence in the Speech of any proposal for the decrease of the salt tax.

THE Bills announced deal with Local Government for Ireland on the lines in force in Great Britain; proposals for improving the Legislative Councils in India, and for revising the agreement between the Government and the Bank of England.

THE Unionists have elected Mr. Joseph Chamberlain their leader in the House of Commons. Mr. Chamberlain attacked the speeches made during the recess by members of the Opposition regarding the occupation of Egypt. Mr. Morley replied, saying that the Opposition only wants Great Britain to persevere in her declared policy, based on the prospect of evacuation. The permanent occupation, he said, was incompatible with true statesmanship and good faith. He denied that Mr. Gladstone had ever demanded the immediate abandonment of Egypt. Altogether, Mr. Morley's tone seems to have been rather apologetic.

THE House of Commons has ordered the attendance of Mr. Decobain in his place on the 23rd.

MRS. OSBORNE is lodged in the Holloway Gaol. The charge against her of fraudulently obtaining money has been abandoned. She is now accused of perjury.

It is reported from St. Petersburg, that the Amir of Bokhara, in his loyal attachment to the Russian throne, has expressed his intention to pay one hundred thousand roubles towards relief of the famine in Russia. That is an act at once of statescraft and charity. We hope England will have the wisdom to take it in good part.

THE Hotel Royal in New York has been destroyed by fire. It was full of visitors, and fifty inmates perished.

THE Silver question presses itself once more to the fore. The rupee has gone down below 15. 4d. That means ruin to thousands.

THE Finance Committee of the American Senate vetoed the proposal for free coinage of silver. But the Coinage Committee of the House of Representatives has reported in favor of Mr. Bland's Bill for free and unlimited coinage.

THE Viceroy, unaccompanied by Lady Lansdowne, left yesterday for Darjeeling. After a stay there of a week, Lord Lansdowne visits Cooch Behar, where preparations are making for the advent. Lady Lansdowne joins his lord at Cooch Behar. The illness of the Maharani having taken a chronic turn, the Maharaja of Cooch Behar feels himself free to welcome in person his august guest in his State.

THE Committee appointed more than a year ago to report on the subject of European and Eurasian poverty, have concluded their inquiry and will shortly announce to Government the result. The Europeans and Eurasians of Calcutta are 19,000 in number, equally divided, and it has been ascertained that 8 per cent of the former are paupers and 25 per cent of the latter live on public charity. Their relation with public employment shows a gradual falling off, from 70 per cent of the appointments in the Government of Bengal having been filled by them in 1840 to a little over 18 per cent in 1890. In 1870, the Europeans and Eurasians held over 9½ per cent of posts under Rs. 100 per mensem. In 20 years, the per centage fell to about 5¼ per cent, that of 1890 being actually 5·23 per cent. In the higher grades of service, the proportion was far more favorable, as many as 45 situations between Rs. 100 and Rs. 300, out of every 100, being held by Europeans and Eurasians, while in 1890 they were reduced to 25 such appointments. We await with interest the suggestions of the Committee for improving the condition of the poor Whites and the Eurasians.

ACCORDING to the Gazetted programme, the Lieutenant-Governor left on the 9th instant for the Cuttack tour. Among others, he will visit Balasore and Puri. At the former place, he will lay the foundation-stone of the female ward—the gift of the sons of the late Raja Syamanund De—to be attached to the dispensary bearing the Raja's name. At Puri, Sir Charles Elliott will not omit to enquire into the safety of the temple, and the sanitation and water-supply question prominently brought to the front by Baboo Jodoolal Mullick of this city. The Baboo interested himself in the subject during his visit to the holy shrine in February 1887. He was disappointed to find the city as it is. He was dissatisfied with the management of the temple. The mahaprasad was an abomination—"prepared from the coarsest stuff, unfit for human consumption." The whole place is insanitary. There is no regular mehter service. To add to all these discomforts, there is no pure drinking water. Baboo Jodoolal, a the double spirit of religion and sanitation, saw the Magistrate on the subject, who, while agreeing with the Baboo, regretted his inability to mend matters and referred him to Government. Not to leave a stone unturned while still in Orissa, the Baboo saw the Commissioner, the late Mr. Metcalfe, who subsequently presented him with a scheme of water-supply and a report of a former date for the better sanitation of Puri to Government. The Baboo has a scheme of his own. He advocates a municipal debenture loan for the water-supply scheme, and a pilgrim tax and a poll tax to meet the interest and maintenance charges and for repayment of the loan. Mr. Metcalfe was for raising the required sum by public subscriptions. The Baboo is against such a proposition, for the very sufficient reason that those "who do not directly benefit from the work, should not be called upon to contribute."

Mr. Metcalfe's report to Government is dated 2nd October, 1886, and, we doubt not Sir Charles Elliott will make the necessary enquiries on the spot and issue his orders as soon as possible in a matter which concerns not only Puri and but the entire Hindudom.

Baboo Jodoolal's view is entitled to every consideration as that of an orthodox Hindu who has had experience of local self-government. When a man like him suggests a pilgrim tax, the proposition loses all its offensiveness. The purpose for which he proposes it, is the least objectionable that might be imagined. For the rest, the old horror of Exeter Hall of this impost has, we believe, been a good deal whittled away. And certainly, if ever a tax on pilgrims could be justified, it would be a tax to be devoted to the purpose contemplated.

THE Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation held Baboo Nobin Chand Boral disqualified to vote in Ward No. 12 in the forthcoming election. Not that he had not qualified himself by payment of rates, but he failed to produce the rate bills in proper time. Armed with the rate bills, the Baboo applied to the Chief Magistrate for an order on the Chairman to include his name in the voters' list. That functionary was surprised at the application—for it was the first of its kind—but the law being quoted, he granted it and made an order—without any notice to the Chairman—as prayed for. He would not, however, fix the number of votes, till after refusal by the Municipal Chairman.

"ATLAS," of the World, was told by a French lady, whose husband was an ambassador in London some forty years back:—

"One evening there were some private theatricals, in the course of which a young lady came on to the stage dressed as a danseuse, with low body, short sleeves, and round her neck a very beautiful pearl necklace. This 'young lady,' who danced a passeul, was no other than Lord Dufferin, then a lad of about nineteen and very juvenile in appearance. The statement was corroborated by his Lordship."

Who can identify in the several lines of Lord Dufferin's deeply marked countenance the mock lady of the stage? But frail is beauty, whether masculine or feminine. Forty years make a great difference.

Danger, long travel, want, or woe

Soon change the form that best we know.

For deadly fear can time outgo

And blanch at once the hair,

Hard toil can roughen form and face,

And want can quench the eyes' bright grace,

Nor does old age a wrinkle trace

More deeply than despair.

And Lord Dufferin has had his full share of at least "long travel" and "hard toil."

Yet, beauty is a hereditary possession with our late Viceroy. Even now, though the lines are obliterated, the figure is still slim and graceful, defying the encroachment of adipose degeneracy, while the hands are supple and soft, as those declare who have felt them, and the voice musical.

IN the Wilts Quarter Sessions, John Kebblewhite and John Gray were found guilty of night poaching at Purton, but not sentenced. Just at the time the Chairman, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, was about to make his order, the counsel for the defence offered to produce the real poachers, one of whom was then in court. Judgment was stayed and the two found guilty let out on bail. A second postponement was granted for surrender of the real culprits and prosecution of the game keepers for perjury. It is the occurrence, from time to time, of such mistakes of haste founded on insufficient evidence that makes us cling to the noble principles of British criminal jurisprudence and to abominate the dangerous innovations introduced into this country.

by Sir James Fitz James Stephen. We hope Sir Alexander Miller will revert to the sound old English maxima.

On Monday, the 24th Jamadus-Sani, corresponding to the 25th January, at 11 A.M., the remains of Hakeem Mahmood Khan were buried at Syed Hassan Rasool Noma. Some seven thousand people attended the funeral. The prayer or service was conducted by Mowlana Shah Abul Khair, the Sajjadah-Nashin of the Khanga (or the spiritual head at the shrine) of the late Shah Golam-Ali.

On the 5th instant, they held a meeting at the Town Hall, to mourn the loss of the Hakeem. It was densely crowded by representatives of all sections of the community of Delhi, and presided over by Mr. R. Clarke, the Deputy Commissioner. Learned men like Moulvi Nazir Ahmed, noblemen and prominent citizens like Nawab Ikram Ullah Khan, Nawab Ahmed Said Khan, (son of the late Nawab Ziauddin Ahmed Khan Bahadoor) Khan Bahadoor Ilahi Baksh, Rai Bahadoor Sri Kishen Dass, lawyers like Lala Girdhari Lal, Senior Pleader, and Mr. M. Lutfur Rahman, Barrister-at-law, took part in the proceedings. A committee appointed includes, besides some of these gentlemen, a few more important names, namely, Rai Bahadoor Pyarey Lal, Khan Bahadoor Syed Hadi Husain Khan, Rai Bahadoor Ram Kishen Das, and Shumsul Ullama Khan Bahadoor Munshi Zakaulla Khan. The meeting began with a Resolution of sorrow for the dead and of recognition of his merits and services, and concluded with one desiring in some way to perpetuate the memory of the deceased.

On Sunday last, in our neighbourhood, a miniature dacoity was enacted in broad daylight. A childless widow died, leaving a house and five thousand rupees in charge of a relative—the house and rupees three thousand being dedicated by a deed to the service of a god established in that house. The heir-at-law coveted the little estate left by her, and wanted to take possession of the house and other things found there. He came to the relative in charge who was willing to make over the Rs. 2,000 on proper receipt granted. But that would not satisfy the heir-at-law. He must have the house. He offered to perform the obsequial ceremonies of the deceased at that house. This being suspected by the relative in charge as the way to enter into possession, he would not consent to the proposal. Other arts and devices failing, the heir came, accompanied by men armed with clubs, attacked the house, routed the defenders, broke open the doors, and made a forcible entry. Then they broke into the doors within, smashed the furniture, broke open drawers and almirahs and chests, opened the iron safe. It was Sunday in the forenoon, and alarm spread throughout the neighbouring houses. Between the proceedings of the marauders and the cries of the attacked and the hurrying to and fro of panic-stricken neighbours, a scene of indescribable confusion occurred. The day before, the Police had been apprised of an impending attack, but it seems that the Police have no jurisdiction in an apprehended row or fight, and they declined any assistance unless there was an actual occurrence. The next day, however, being informed of the outrage which was being perpetrated, they came and arrested four men, the others making their escape on news of their advent. The four are now on their trial in the magistracy.

THE Great Dacca Bribery Case is over, but not so its consequences. Whatever may have been the zid of Official Dacca or the hopes of Partizan Dacca, while the litigation was going on in East Bengal, there were unmistakable symptoms of a disposition to decline the contest here. Hence the mysterious disappearance of the record from the High Court. Each side threw the onus of that disappearance on the other, but the defendant showed very good grounds why it was not for his benefit, and after his triumphant acquittal, it more than ever seems to have been the work of his enemies. Verily, some such mishap was urgently needed to save their credit. They would have hailed an overwhelming flood or earthquake or consuming conflagration, rather than meet their own handiwork! After all, the missing record turned up and the case proceeded. From the outset, however, it was evident that the prosecution had not a leg to stand upon. It never had one even in Dacca, if only the officials could see through the mist of secret misrepresentation or under the weakness of smelling a rat. The finishing collapse was contributed by the Majoochi of tender conscience and slippery memory of this case, Gooroo Charan Bhuttacharjee. Neither judge nor jury had the slightest hesitation. Nor had the public the slightest doubt, as to the result. It was for days openly said in and about the Court that there was not evidence enough to convict a dog.

The result is most humiliating to the Civil Service and a fine commentary on the boasted perfection of the administration in India. Here was a highly respectable man, a man of position, intelligence and wealth, himself the leading pleader in East Bengal, who has been calumniated and victimised in the foulest manner, and who had very nearly been sacrificed to the rancour of a faction and the simplicity of the magistracy and judiciary. Not even his innocence would have saved Babu Anand Chunder Roy, if he had stinted expense. But he paid like a prince, retaining the best legal assistance, &c., got his case tried in Calcutta, and succeeded in proving his innocence.

But is he to be so heavily mulcted for his innocence? Is an honest citizen to suffer incredible pangs for months and be impoverished for life, because the county magistracy allowed themselves to be the easy tools of professional jealousy and private feud and pursued an ignis fatuus? Such an impression ought not to be permitted to prevail, if it can possibly be prevented. Great as has been the scandal created by the trial, every effort should now be made to undo it, or at least, so far as may be, to reduce its proportions, and to exact guarantees for the future. Such is the plain duty of Government and the official hierarchy. The candour and liberality of Government in this behalf has already been appealed to in due form. As might be anticipated from the fate of the trial, Mr. Woodroffe, the leading counsel for the defence, promptly followed up the acquittal and discharge of both prisoners (Baboo Anand Chunder Roy and his Mohorur Madhub Chunder Das,) with moving the court for a recommendation to the Government to reimburse them for their expenses. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the claim for compensation was prima facie so reasonable that, although the presiding Judge expressed his inability to offer an opinion at that stage, Mr. Justice Wilson suggested an application to Government, and said that if, after that, the Government asked him, he would give his opinion. We see that Baboo Anand Chunder Roy has applied to Government for compensation. In a lucid memorial to the Lieutenant-Governor, he has laid bare all the circumstances of the trial and shown how he has been the victim of relentless persecution through the forms of law. He gives unanswerable grounds to prove that the prosecution against him pursued to the bitter end, was at once false and foolish and that it had never any chance before any properly constituted tribunal with an ordinarily sensible personnel. Respectful in tone and moderate in demand, steering clear of all debatable and unpleasant matters, the memorial is a model of such writings. How a man so deeply injured has been able to avoid all bitterness and anger, is a marvel. We trust it will be received by Sir Charles Elliott with the sympathy which the undeserved misfortunes of the memorialist merits.

CAPTAIN Duncan Ross, the Champion braggart who for some weeks filled all Calcutta with his potential prowess in wrestling, but who was never put to the crucible test of the arena, is touring back home through the Upper Provinces, and apparently tarnishing the easy laurels won down country. At Cawnpore, the Europeans got up a match between him and a sepoy. Colonel Prinsep specially patronised him, and by his exertions he got a retainer of Rs. 10 per diem and Rs. 500 besides if he fought the sepoy. Ram Dobey was a mere amateur and of no great pretensions even as such, being much smaller in size and far inferior in strength than his opponent. It was obviously infra dig. in the Champion to waste his powers on him. Even over such an unpromising contest, the Europeans thought fit to bet. Of course, they championed their own colour. It was the universal and firm belief among them all that Ram had not the ghost of a chance, to speak colloquially, against Ross, that the Christian would make short work of the Hindu. For the effect of the latter's obvious inferiority had been heightened by the former's brag. On the field of battle, however, Ross presented rather a sorry figure. He was not in the best "form," apparently. He was certainly not leaping for the fray. What wonder that Ram, remembering how the sahablogues had all made common cause with his antagonist and with all the praises of him still in his ear, eyed him with anxious interest! The more so when, before the commencement of the action, several new conditions were demanded, in favour of Ross and meekly acquiesced in on the part of the poor native. One of these was that to constitute a fall both shoulder blades must be brought to the ground at one and the same time—a condition unknown in Indian wrestling. All the preliminaries—even the 11th hour ones—settled, the spectators awaited the commencement of the fire, but they had to wait long. Notwithstanding the indulgence granted him at the last moment, Ross seemed as lukewarm as Ram. There was nothing worth seeing—no excuse for excitement. The betters were impatient. After an introductory shying, however, Ram seized his formidable-looking combatant straight by the neck and, with an agility which surprised all the Europeans present, laid him flat on the ground. Perhaps, Ram himself was astonished at his own easy success in prostrating the giant. At any rate, he did not follow up his advantage, but Ross did not take advantage of his antagonist's lapse to get up, so that Ram now quietly laid himself on Ross' back for the next move of turning him over. That was not easy to do, considering the difference in the weight and strength of the two. Accordingly betting went on briskly, Ross' backers indulging the liveliest expectation of his showing his mettle yet by throwing the puny native overboard. As the minutes passed, however, their hopes began to shake. Ross took an extraordinary length of time for his great move. He lay on the earth like a huge land-crab, that would not even walk backwards. Thus the two men remained motionless—a far from agreeable spectacle—to the infinite vexation of the sightseers, and specially the betters. Thus an hour and a half were consumed. Ram would have soon ended this infliction by handling Ross' waist band or string, but this the well known lungori manipulation, he was not allowed. Ross would not hear of it, growling at the least attempt in that direction by Ram. He threatened to break Ram's jaw if he touched the waist-string. In vain the natives said that Ram was entitled to seize the string. As it was manifestly impossible for the small light man by any other way to turn over the heavy lumber, they were of opinion that the foolish spectacle of piling of trunk over trunk should cease and Ross ought to get up and commence the wrestling over again de novo. But Ross preferred grovelling on the ground. In spite of his umpire Captain Ashley's efforts to cheer him up and draw him out, there he lay, without making the slightest sign. There being no way out of the tie, the spectators left and the wrestlers were told that they had tried the public enough.

Holloway's Pills.—In cases of chronic indigestion, disordered liver, and general debility, these Pills are wonderfully effective. They indeed have so general and powerful an effect on the whole system that they clear away or ward off most of the ills that flesh is heir to. They cleanse the bowels, purify the blood, correct the bile, give tone to the stomach, excite a healthy appetite, produce sound sleep, and impart increased energy to both mind and body. The admirable properties of these far-famed Pills are too highly appreciated to require any encomium here, as they are resorted to by rich and poor of every nation. The cures they effect are not temporary or imperfect, but they bring about a marvellous and most beneficial change throughout the entire body, and enable it with renovated powers to resist the approach of all future attacks.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE LORD OF THE MILKMAIDS IN EXILE.

GOPINATH or the Lord of the Milkmaids, is the presiding deity of the famous shrine at Agradwipa, within a few miles of the field of Plassey. Like that of his prototype of flesh and blood, the history of the Thakoor has been a chequered one, and at present a large section of the Vaishnava community feel deeply aggrieved at his enforced exile in the court of the prince who holds the office of his sevait. The former Rajas of Nuddea used to bring the image every year for a few days to their palace at Kishnaghur, in order to entertain and worship the god. But, since the accession of the present Raja to the gadi of Kishenchand, Gopinath has become virtually a state prisoner at his court. The lip-deep orthodoxy of Babu journalism does not concern itself with such events. But the removal of Gopinath from his shrine, is a real grievance to the Hindu community, though no political capital can be made out of it.

As to the legal aspect of this act on the part of the Raja, there cannot be any difference of opinion. In a case reported in I. L. R., 7 Cal., 767, the High Court of Bengal held, under very similar circumstances, that the manager or mohunt of a temple had no power to remove the objects which are worshipped in it. Gopinath is a public Thakoor set up, in the early part of the fifteenth century, by Govinda Ghosh, a Kayasth of the Utter Rarhi clan, who was one of the followers of Chaitanya. Govinda died childless, but such was the kindness of the deity towards him, that the god actually undertook to perform the functions of a son to him. At the anniversary of his death, thousands of devout Hindu pilgrims assemble at Agradwipa, to witness the celebration of his funeral obsequies by the hand of the stone image set up by him. Whatever explanation may be suggested to account for the phenomenon, the pious Hindu sincerely regards it as a miracle, which only proves the extent of the god's love for his own people.

True to the traditional policy of the mythical hero whom he represents, the Thakoor has always favored the cause of the rising sun. At the time of Raja Man Singh's invasion, Gopinath had already attained great celebrity, and the Raja, in pursuance of a vow, made a grant of some villages in the neighbourhood of Agradwipa for his worship. When the Nattore family first rose into power, the temple of Gopinath passed into their hands with its endowments. But at one of the annual gatherings in honor of its founder, there was an emeute which was attended with very considerable loss of life, and when Nawab Aliverdi Khan, who then ruled Bengal, threatened to punish the Nattore Raja for his inability to prevent the riot, he disclaimed his right to the temple, and in his defence declared that it belonged to the Raja of Nuddea. Thus, the famous Kishen Chand became the shobait of the god, and the manager of his property. He did not, however, remain in uninterrupted possession of the windfall. Within a few years, Nawab Aliverdi died, and the events which led to the downfall of Mahomedan power, followed in quick succession. The tradition goes that Agradwipa being on the route taken by Clive in his march towards Plassey, Nava Kissen, who was with him, made a vow to Gopi Nath invoking the blessing of the god for his patron. The success which Clive's arms or good luck secured for him, confirmed Nava Kissen's faith in the might of the god, and, as the easiest way to secure his favor permanently, determined to take possession of the idol anyhow. With the resources and prestige of Clive at his back, Nava Kissen experienced no difficulty whatever in carrying out his project. Gopinath was brought by force to Calcutta, and for a long time was entertained as an honored guest in the house of his captor. The Nuddea Raja was deeply chagrined at the loss, though he had hardly a better right to the idol than his adversary. To regain possession of the image, by force, was out of the question. So Kishen Chand made every effort to secure the good graces of the superior authorities. Nava Kissen had a powerful rival in Ganga Govinda Sing. Somehow, Warren Hastings was prevailed upon to order the restoration of Gopinath to his own temple. In spite of this order, Nava Kissen made one more effort to retain possession of the Thakoor. He pleaded that in his family chapel there were other idols of the same size and appearance, and that it was not possible for him or any of his men to make out what particular idol he brought from Agradwip. The authorities, however, gave permission to Kishen Chand and his people to have an inspection of all the Thakoors, and to take away the particular one that belonged to him. Kishen Chand came down to Calcutta with the priest of the Agradwip temple. The latter identified Gopinath, and marched off with the image on his back, to the delight of the Raja and his men.

From the above history, as to the main incidents of which there is, we believe, no dispute, it would appear that Gopinath is not the family idol of the Rajas of Kishnaghur. He is a public Thakoor, and though the Hindu community may have allowed his temporary removal in times past, the Nuddea Rajas, who are his sewaits, have no right to remove him permanently from his temple. We hear of preparations for the institution of a suit for the restoration of the god to his temple. But we hope the Nuddea Raja will have the good sense to concede to the demand without any litigation.

THE INDIAN LAW OF BRIBERY.

MR. JUSTICE Wilson, in his charge to the Jury in what is called the Dacca bribery case, is reported to have said that, "if a bribe was offered, and the person to whom it was offered accepted it, then they both committed an offence, and the person who offered the bribe became in the eye of the law the graver offender." Intended as a general proposition of law, nothing could be more erroneous than this, in view both of the circumstances of India and the provisions of the Indian Penal Code itself. In the draft Code of 1837—the Macaulay Code as it is generally styled—the receiving of a bribe was made punishable by substantive sections dealing with the various phases of that offence. The giving of a bribe, however, was left to be punished under one of the abetment sections. The Code, as passed in 1860, received numerous alterations and additions from Sir Barnes Peacock. Many of the chapters were entirely recast. Many additional sections were introduced. Extensive as were the changes with which the Code of 1837 was passed, no change was effected in the original principle of not making the giving of a bribe, in a country like India, an offence equal in gravity to the receiving of a bribe. Doubtless, circumstances may occur even in India, under which the giving would be more culpable than the receiving. The Dacca case itself furnishes a good instance to hand, for the charge here was that a respectable person, of superior culture, and himself a minister of justice—an inferior minister but a minister of justice still—tempted an impecunious man acting for the nonce as a public servant in the very important capacity of foreman of a Jury. The observation of Mr. Justice Wilson, however, in so far as it has been reported for the papers, is evidently one made without limitations of any kind. It is very true that in so far as the general character of the observation is concerned, its effect may be avoided by the common rule of interpretation founded upon the distinction between a dictum and a decision. Nevertheless, Judges fresh from England and under the influence of the traditions of the English Courts, very often err in matters of this kind by ignoring the broad distinctions that exist between the circumstances of England and India. The following extract from the notes appended by Macaulay to the Code of 1837 as drafted by him and his colleagues on the Indian Law Commission for submission to Lord Auckland, may be read with interest by Judges and practitioners alike. In explaining what might be regarded as an omission in the chapter on bribery, Macaulay observed:—

"One important question still remains to be considered. We are of opinion that we have provided sufficient punishment for the public servant who receives a bribe. But it may be doubted whether we have provided sufficient punishment for the person who offers it. The person who, without any demand express or implied on the part of a public servant, volunteers an offer of a bribe, and induces that public servant to accept it, will be punishable under the general rule contained in clause 88 as an instigator. But the person who complies with a demand, however signified, on the part of a public servant, cannot be considered as guilty of instigating that public servant to receive a bribe. We do not propose that such a person shall be liable to any punishment, and, as this omission may possibly appear censurable to many persons, we are desirous to explain our reasons.

"In all states of society the receiving of a bribe is a bad action, and may properly be punishable. But whether the giving of a bribe ought or ought not to be punished is a question which does not admit of a short and general answer. There are countries in which the giver of a bribe ought to be more severely punished than the receiver. There are countries, on the other hand, in which the giving of a bribe may be what is not desirable to visit with any punishment. In a country situated like England, the giver of a bribe is generally far more deserving of punishment than the receiver. The giver is generally the tempter, the receiver is the tempted. The giver is generally rich, powerful, well educated; the receiver needy and ignorant. The giver is under no apprehension of suffering any injury if he refuses to give. It is not by fear, but by ambition that he is generally induced to part with his money. Such a person is a proper subject of punishment. But there are countries where the case is widely different,—where men give bribes to Magistrates from exactly the same feeling which leads them to give their purses to robbers, or to pay ransom to pirates,—where men give bribes because no man can, without a bribe, obtain common justice. In such countries, we think, that the giving of bribes is not a proper subject of punishment. It would be as absurd, in such a state of society, to reproach the giver of a bribe with corrupting the virtue of public servants as it would be to say that the traveller who delivers his money when a pistol is held to his breast corrupts the virtue of the highway man.

"We should by no means be understood to say that India under the British Government is in a state answering to this last description. Still we fear it is undeniable that corruption does prevail to a great extent among the lower class of public functionaries, that the power which those functionaries possess renders them formidable to the body of the people, that in the great majority of cases the receiver of the bribe is really the tempter, and the giver of the bribe is really acting in self-defence.

"Under these circumstances we are strongly of opinion that it would be unjust and cruel to punish the giving of a bribe, in any case in which it could not be proved that the giver had really by his instigations corrupted the virtue of a public servant who, unless temptation had been put in his way, would have acted uprightly."

Since the above has been in type, we have been disturbed by doubts as to whether so able and experienced a Judge as Mr. Justice Wilson had announced so startling a proposition on a point settled by code. Accordingly, we prosecuted inquiry and we have learnt with a feeling of relief that the reporter has done the Judge injustice. Mr. Justice Wilson made a distinction which the reporter missed and substituted his own misunderstanding. We think we better quote the letter of a learned friend who was present. He writes :—

"There is no warrant for the proposition that the giver of a bribe is a graver offender in the eye of the law than the taker. You are quite correct in your remark that under the I. P. Code, the giver is only punishable as an abettor. Mr. Justice Wilson did not say what he is reported to have said. The reporters entirely failed to understand what he did say. He said that if a bribe were accepted, the giver, in the eye of the law, becomes a graver offender than in the case in which his offer was not accepted by the public servant concerned. What is, as you will see, not only a correct proposition, but a very different one from what the reporters have imputed to him.

The newspaper reports of the Dacca case were all extremely unsatisfactory."

PANINI IN ENGLISH!*

SUCH is the apparition that confronts us in the fasciculus the name of which is transcribed below. The elaborate Sanskrit grammar of the greatest of Sanskrit grammarians, with his 4,000 Rules divided into eight books—the glory of India and the wonder and admiration of the civilised world—done into a modern vernacular, would be a literary phenomenon. The very thing is, in part, before us, with promise of the remainder! That, before being reduced to any of the numerous Indian dialects, Panini should be done into English, is all the greater marvel. It is an audacious undertaking, from every point of view. The labour and the expense demanded, are appalling. As many as forty such fasciculi as the present, will be required to complete the work—or half as many parts as Mr. Pratap Chandra Roy calculates to finish his English Mahabharata. But the get up of the new book is much richer than that of the Mahabharata. The Ashtadhyayi of Panini is sumptuously printed in new type, on good paper, and covered over with a beautiful cream-colored cover of good stuff. The size is also superior, so that as much matter is compressed in the 70 pages of this part as in the 100 of the Mahabharata. The intellectual audacity of Babu Vasu is no less significant. To translate a grammar is never agreeable or easy work. How much less so to translate an antique Aryan grammatical treatise—the most ancient of all Hindu grammars extant! It is certainly quite as difficult to render Panini into English as to render Vyasa, perhaps more. The difficulties of the Mahabharata are no doubt manifold, but they generally arise from faulty texts. Those of Panini are different. It must, in the nature of things, be more difficult to make an ancient monument of philological analysis intelligible to English readers than to transfer into English the mammoth cyclopædia of the history, traditions, institutions, philosophy and ethics of early India of Vyasa. "For a' that and a' that," we give the undertaking welcome.

We admire Baboo Vasu's courage. He has started in a career of high enterprise worthy of a hero. We wish him all success. We are glad that the work of interpreting the grand old grammar to the English reading world has been taken up by a countryman of ours. The editing and translating of Sanskrit texts has hitherto been left to Europeans, at home or abroad. Men who have never walked the Indian soil nor talked to a live Indian, unearth the treasures of ancient Indian literature, sacred and secular. It was time, however, that the Indians themselves evinced a proper interest in the remains left by their glorious old ancestors and took their share of the business. In the province of English translation, hitherto Protap Chunder Roy alone has maintained the honor of our countrymen. Here, then, in Srisa Chandra Vasu is another worthy volunteer in the same cause. In the specimen of his work before us, he shows himself a scholar of parts. So far as we can judge, this specimen is well executed. Of course, this is only the first chapter of the first book. But if the succeeding parts are as well done, a great work will have been accomplished, to the credit of our country and the advancement of letters.

The translator's preface is pitched in a key of high enthusiasm for Sanskrit learning. This is natural, and excusable. When, however, he exalts the revival of Sanskrit above all the other effects of British rule, it is time to warn him against the false teaching. The Preface begins:—

"Since the advent of the British rule and the peace and prosperity that has followed in its train, India has witnessed a glorious revival of her ancient literature, in which is embodied some of the highest philosophies and religions of the world."

That view of Sanskrit literature as embodying some of the highest religions of the world, is peculiarly Hindu. For other nations, the prime question in regard to a religion is, whether it is true or false. It is the characteristic of the Hindu that he can steer past that issue to dwell on the good points of a creed. So far so good. The next sentence is :—

"Among the various blessings which our benign Government has conferred upon us, none can be greater in value or usefulness than this revival of Sanskrit."

That is simply extravagant. Can Babu Srisa Chandra seriously believe that the opportunities presented by the present régime for the cultivation of Sanskrit, are the best recommendation of British Rule? If he can, he must be singular indeed. Other thinkers think differently. Baboo Srisa Chandra must remember the lofty period with which Lord Macaulay crushed the Oriental Movement of his day and in which he exposed for all time the pretensions of Sanskrit literature as an instrument of culture in the modern world, or a means of regeneration of the Indian people. We Indians cannot sympathise with the great rhetorician's contemptuous treatment of our ancient writings. For our part, we have always been of opinion that Macaulay's ignorance led him to far too sweeping a condemnation, while the educational policy which was adopted under his influence, was too one-sided for the happiest results. But that there was a great deal of truth in his scathing remarks, must be admitted. Indeed, Lord Macaulay simply echoed from his resounding dome the estimate of Sanskrit learning first sounded by the greatest Indian of his times, Ram Mohan Roy. Surely, the illustrious Bengali knew what he was about, when he indited his memorable Memorial to Lord Minto against the multiplication of Sanskrit seminaries at the expense of more useful education. And can it be denied that the English language which the British have taught us, or enabled us to learn, is a superior blessing than the revival of Sanskrit?

In the same perfervid style, we are told of "the Sanskrit language, and especially that portion of it in which is locked up the highest aspirations of the ancient Aryan hearts, viz., the Vedas, the Brāhmanas, the Upanishads, &c." Here, the Brāhmanas and the Upanishads would seem to be differentiated from the Vedas, though the translator must know that they form different parts of the Vedas. Or, can it be that he restricts the term Vedas to only the Sanhitas? That would be a pedantic nicety, which will not go down with the learned world. We may here also note that, in the next sentence, he speaks of "the Vedāngas, or the helps to the study of the Vedas." From which one might suppose that the latter phrase is a translation of the word Vedānga. This sort of carelessness should have been avoided in a learned work. Our more serious objection is to the thought that the highest aspirations of the Aryan heart are embodied in the Vedas and the Brāhmanas. The Upanishads are the noblest of all Vedic writings, and they are very superior, specially the short treatises collected by Ram Mohan Roy. Even the modern Allopanishad would be a noble work, were it not a palpable forgery. But the other descriptions of the Vedas, are very different in character. The Brāhmanas are mere ritual and the Sanhitas are mere hymns and usually not good as such. They are all addressed to the gods of Fire, Air, Earth and Water, and, with a few exceptions, the aspirations embodied in them are of the most commonplace order. Nearly all are rude and gross, and sometimes revolting. Panini is a great work and worth translating, but let us not deceive ourselves as to the value of our ancient records.

THE FIRST YEAR OF THE INDIAN MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT.

BENGAL.

No. 130, dated the 27th April 1891.

From---The Collector of Customs, Calcutta,

To---The Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Lower Provinces.

With reference to your docket No. 305 B., dated the 20th December 1890, forwarding a copy of instructions for the guidance of Customs officers in the working of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, IV of 1889, issued by the Government of India, and calling for a yearly report, I have the honour to forward herewith a statement in the prescribed form showing the number of cases dealt with during the past official year 1890-91.

2. There were altogether 302 cases of detention, all of which were ordered without information having been given, the infringement of the Act being discovered in the examination of goods. Out of this number 252 cases consisted of unstamped or partially stamped piece-goods, 16 were false trade descriptions, and 34 were goods marked with the name of a British or British Indian trader made abroad and not showing the country of manufacture.

3. The piece-goods detained consisted of all descriptions---cotton, flax, silks, and woollens. In some cases the goods were not stamped at all; small penalties were imposed, and they were allowed to be stamped and then passed. In other cases the length was stamped in numerals only without the word "yards." These were passed after this word had been added without a penalty being imposed. Generally speaking, importers of piece-goods, which are the largest items in our list of imports, have complied with the requirements of the Act, and at its introduction I have not thought it advisable to impose heavy penalties, the less so that the obligation to make good the stamping involved much trouble and expense.

4. The goods in the 16 cases of false trade descriptions consisted of champagne, brandy, port, vermouth, sherry, butter, vermilion, soap, imitation gold thread, perfumery, porter, and cigars.

5. In certain of these cases re-shipment was allowed; in others the false trade description was allowed to be removed by obliteration or by the addition of the name of the country of manufacture as the case might be and the goods then passed. The only penalty imposed was on an importation of 84 cases of brandy. This was a glaring case of fraud, the liquor being of an inferior character, cheaper than Hennessy's brandy is sold, and the bottles bearing forged Hennessy labels. These goods, imported by a native dealer from Egypt, were confiscated. The value was declared to be Rs500. In the 34 cases where the goods bore the name of a trader in the United Kingdom or British India, the goods having been made or produced beyond the limits of these countries, the goods were all passed without a fine after the country of manufacture had been placed on the goods or the name erased. These articles consisted of port wine, binoculars, clocks, sherry, montilla, Pilsener beer, quinine, rum, brandy, and champagne.

6. In deciding cases that come before me I have, as far as possible, followed the practice obtaining in England under the Merchandise Marks Act in force in that country. When importers have erred through ignorance or want of knowledge of the law, I have not imposed penalties in most cases, but have thought it sufficient to allow them to mark their goods so as to bring them within the terms of the Act and at the same time to warn them. There was a little friction when the Act first came in, but not more than was to be anticipated. This has now disappeared, and I do not anticipate any further trouble.

7. The introduction of the Act has thrown additional work upon this office, especially in the Appraisers' Department, but it is now easier than it was at the beginning of the Act. Merchants and dealers are gradually becoming acquainted with its provisions, and I think they have generally tried to comply with them.

BOMBAY AND SIND.

No. 7388, dated the 27th October 1891.

From---The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Revenue Department,

To---The Secretary to the Government of India, Finance and Commerce Department.

Adverting to my letter No. 5983, dated the 1st ultimo, I am directed to forward, for submission to the Government of India, the accompanying statement (Memorandum from the Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and Abkari, No. 4035, dated 8th August 1891, with its accompaniments) furnished by the Commissioner in Sind showing the number of cases dealt with at the Karachi Custom House under the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, 1889, from April 1890 to March 1891, together with the reports and statements noted in the margin, submitted by the Collector of Land Revenue, Customs and Opium, Bombay, and the Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and Abkari, regarding the working of that Act at the Bombay Custom House during the same period, and to state that the Commissioner in Sind has been requested to submit as soon as possible a short report explaining and commenting on the figures supplied by him, which will be forwarded to the Government of India on receipt.

2. I am to add that recommendations similar to those contained in paragraphs 18 and 19 of Mr. Campbell's report were in 1889 laid before this Government, but that acting on the advice of the Solicitor to Government they did not then deem it necessary to take action upon them. In the circumstances now reported, however, His Excellency the Governor in Council has sanctioned these recommendations, and has directed the employment of the Solicitor to Government to prosecute in test cases of importance to the public. These cases will be selected by the Collector of Land Revenue, Customs and Opium, Bombay, who has been authorized to use his discretion in instructing the Solicitor to Government to prosecute, and has been directed to report to Government the result of such prosecutions.

No. 5753 C., dated the 31st July 1891.

From---The Acting Collector of Land Revenue, Customs and Opium, Bombay.

To---The Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and Akbari, Bombay.

I have the honour to submit the first Annual Report on the Administration of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, IV of 1889. The report, which is for the year ending March 31st, 1891, is submitted in accordance with the orders of the Government of India received by me with Government Resolution No. 8960 of 15th December 1890, Revenue Department.

2. The information specifically called for by the Government of India in the 4th paragraph of the Executive Instructions is contained in Appendix A. For the sake of comparison I have given the figures for each of the years 1889-90 and 1890-91. It will be seen that the number of detentions under section 18, clause (d) of the Sea Customs Act, was slightly larger in 1890-91 than in the preceding year, but that there was a marked decrease in the number of detentions under clauses (e) and (f), and also in the total number of detentions.

3. The increase in the number of detentions under clause (d) was the result of the orders contained in Government Resolution No. 243 of 11th January 1890. Till the receipt of that Resolution it was not held in practice that English words impressed on foreign-made goods constituted false trade descriptions when the words were unaccompanied by a definite indication of origin. After the orders of Government on this point had reached me, I took steps to acquaint the mercantile community with the change of practice that was necessitated, and having given them what I considered to be a fair notice, I began to enforce the new orders on May 1st, 1890. The decrease in the number of detentions under clauses (e) and (f) is due to the requirements of the Custom House being better understood by the mercantile public.

4. Appendix B shows the extent to which the various officers adjudicated on offences against the Merchandise Marks Act in the exercise of the powers that have been conferred upon them by section 182 of Act VIII of 1878. It also shows the amount of fines levied.

5. During the year under review only two appeals were preferred against the orders of the adjudicating officers. Both appeals were made to you against decisions recorded by me. In one case my order was upheld; in the other case it was reversed. In 1889-90 of eight appeals in only two was it found necessary to reverse the original order. The fact that only ten decisions have been appealed in two years shows that persons against whom orders are passed are usually satisfied as to the justness of the penalties imposed upon them.

6. Appendix C shows the number of packages detained under the Act during the past two years, and the manner in which they have been disposed of. The packages are those dealt with in the case appearing in Appendix A.

7. Appendix D shows the quantity of piece-goods detained under section 18, clause (i) of Act VIII of 1878. The large decrease in the number of pieces detained in 1890-91 compared with 1889-90 is due to the necessity of stamping the length on each piece having become commonly known. It is probable that ere long the import of piece-goods not having the length marked on them will practically cease.

8. This being the first time that an annual report on the working of the Merchandise Marks Act has been required, I have thought it advisable to prepare, for your information, summaries of a few of the more important cases. They are contained in Appendix E.

9. I will now make some remarks on the question how far the Merchandise Marks Act meets the end for which it is designed, i. e., the putting down of dishonest trading.

The Act is effective in so far as it renders it difficult and hazardous in most cases for importers to bring into this country goods that bear any marks for descriptions calculated to deceive the public as to the nature or value of the goods. Whether the Act puts any strong check upon dishonest trade practices within this country is less certain. It is easy for the importer to put false marks upon his goods when once they have passed the Custom House. It is true he may be prosecuted and convicted under section 6 of the Act, as may a person who sells goods bearing a false description under section 7, but it will seldom or never be worth the while of a private person to institute prosecutions in such cases.

10. I regret to have to state that the importation of labels which are obviously intended to be put to dishonest uses is by no means uncommon. One consignment of labels was clearly intended to be applied to bottles of country-made lime-juice and glycerine so as to show that the contents were made in London. Another consignment was to be used to show that packets of candles were of Dutch make.

11. I enclose two cards that were intended for use in the retail sale of thread. When thread is sold wrapped round cards like these, the purchaser will naturally suppose that the thread has been imported on the cards and has been passed by the Custom House officers as of German make and of the length marked on the card. It is easy to see how the public may be cheated by the use of cards of this kind. To lessen the danger of fraud from this source I have ordered that future consignments should be marked "Cards made in Germany" instead of "made in Germany" merely. But by importing blank cards or by having cards printed in Bombay this restriction can be easily evaded.

12. Paper for printing and some other purposes is sold by weight and is generally imported in bundles weighing 14 to 72 lb. On weightment shortages of 1 lb to 2 lb per bundle have been found. Manufacturers have explained that these shortages are due to the wrappers being included in the specified weights. This plea has not been accepted, as, if the weight intended to be expressed by the stamping was gross weight, it should have been so specified on the packages. Since full weight has been required, we have, as a rule, found absolute accuracy of weightment. This shows that the public have been saved from a practice which was of the nature of fraud. It seems doubtful how long this satisfactory result will continue. One foreign manufacturer has taken to sending out his paper with spaces for the figure to indicate weight and number of sheets left blank. These goods we cannot stop, and as soon as they are passed the importer may add as much false weight as he deems advisable.

13. Objectionable practices have also been noted in the import trade in oilman's stores. Hams marked as weighing 18 lb would weigh only 16 lb, and bacon marked at 25 lb would weigh 22½ lb. Importers explained that dryage occurred after shipment. This explanation was not accepted. From the examinations that have been made of recent consignments it appears that the actual dryage in these articles is nominal. To evade the Act some importers have begun to bring in hams and bacon without any weight marked on their coverings.

14. Boxes of common washing bar-soap are generally stamped to contain 45 lb. When we began to test the weights we found an average shortage of 8 per cent. In this case too the importers urged that the commodity dried between time of shipment and time of delivery. We now find that the actual dryage is trifling. The hardihood with which the plea of dryage has been put forward to explain the fraudulent marking of various articles is peculiar. It has actually been claimed that 2 or 3 per cent. should be allowed for dryage in the case of hardware articles, such as brass and copper nails.

15. The manufacturers of the very inferior brands of wines and spirits are now careful to describe the liquor they sell in such a way that it cannot be detained. One firm has just imported from London 50 cases of brandy described as "Guillaumat et Cie: Cognac made in France." The net value of this brandy is given in the bill of entry as Rs 5½ per case of one dozen quarts. The Chemical Analyser cannot say whether this decoction is made of grape juice or not, so we have no means of stopping its importation. A great deal of inferior liquor sold as Champagne, Chateau Margaux, Lafitte, etc., is manufactured in Germany and shipped to this port. German-made liqueurs, valued at about R 12 per dozen, have come in and are sold under the names of Chartreuse and Benedictine. It is only when these liquors bear descriptions on the labels or capsules that they can be stopped at the Custom House.

16. It appears desirable that in the interest of the public Government should undertake prosecutions under sections 487 and 488 of the Indian Penal Code, and sections 6 and 7 of the Merchandise Marks Act. Unless this is done it is morally impossible to put any effectual check on the sale of goods under false descriptions. We find that the quantity of goods that are brought to this port bearing false descriptions is rapidly decreasing, and it is believed that few such goods manage to pass the Custom House. At the same time we find manufacturers are beginning to send unmarked goods to this country where they previously sent marked goods, and there is reason to fear that in many such instances descriptions, which the Custom House would treat as objectionable, are affixed after importation.

17. In conclusion, I will quote the remarks made by the Select Committee of the House of Commons which reported last year on the working of the English Merchandise Marks Act, in so far as they relate to prosecutions:—

"The non-official witnesses examined before your Committee were unanimously of opinion that prosecutions under the Merchandise Marks Act should in future be undertaken by the State. Your Committee recommend that the Solicitor to the Board of Trade, or the Solicitor to the Customs, should prosecute in cases affecting the general interests of the country, or a section of the community, or of a trade, there being in such cases no sufficient motive to induce any individual to incur the expense, responsibility or trouble of a private prosecution. Your Committee consider that State prosecutions should not be undertaken for offences against private property, such as forging or improperly using trade marks or trade names. The prosecutions in these instances should be left to the person, firm, or corporation aggrieved."

18. I venture to hope that the facts brought to notice in this report, the importation of labels (paragraph 10), the importation of the thread cards of which specimens accompany, the importation of paper (paragraph 12) and hams (paragraph 13) without any statement of weight, will satisfy Government that the remarks of the Select Committee apply with equal force to Bombay. I am satisfied that since the devices of importing separate labels and of omitting details of description have been discovered, their practice will rapidly spread to the profit of fraud and the loss of honest trade and of the community. If existing arrangements are not altered, the labour of the Custom House will be vain; the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act will be a dead letter; and the attempt to guard the community from fraud will fail. As I am impressed with the benefits that follow the enforcing of the provisions of the Act and also with the ease with which its provisions can be practically enforced, I would earnestly recommend that the action of the Custom House be supplemented by public prosecutions. The Custom House is in a position to keep the police informed what classes of goods and what dealers are likely to infringe the provisions of the Act after the goods have passed the Custom House. The Solicitor to Government might be instructed to prosecute in a few test cases affecting the interests of the community or of a trade. I believe the supply of Custom House information to the police, regular police supervision, and occasional convictions, would crush the practice of false labelling and false description which, as it spreads in Bombay, is making the Merchandise Marks Act of no avail.

19. These remarks apply in the first instance to imported articles. My information is that both as regards yarn and cloth the local mills, or certain of them, act in a way which lays them open to the penalties laid down in sections 6, 7, and 12 of the Merchandise Marks Act. It appears that in the interests both of the public and of honest traders prosecutions should be authorised to prevent local manufacturers committing breaches of the Act.

No. 4035, dated the 8th August 1891.

Memo. by the Acting Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and Akbari, Bombay.

Forwarded to Government, with reference to Government Resolution in the Revenue Department, No. 8960, dated 15th December 1890.

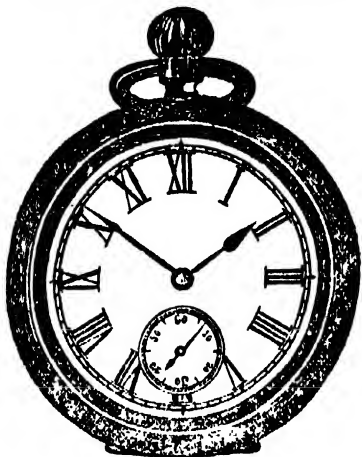

2. Mr. Campbell's report shows that the difficulties which were experienced at first in working the Merchandise Marks Act, have been almost entirely overcome, now that its provisions are thoroughly understood by the mercantile community.

3. The undersigned is of opinion that the remarks made in paragraphs 9 to 19 of Mr. Campbell's report deserve careful consideration. It was to be expected that unscrupulous merchants both in this country and abroad would devise means for evading the Act and passing their goods through the barrier of the Customs Act, and it is clear that to some extent they have been successful. The weak point in the present arrangements for the prevention of dishonest trading is the fact that there is no machinery to supplement the action of the Custom House, and to take notice of fraudulent trade marks and trade descriptions which have been applied to goods after they have passed through the Custom House. If in England people will not take the trouble to come forward and prosecute cases of this sort, still less is it likely that they will do so in this country, and the provisions of the law as to false trade marks and false trade descriptions will remain a dead letter outside the Custom House unless Government is prepared to take action. The undersigned is not in favour of Government undertaking prosecution in cases of imitations of private trade marks; these may be safely left to the parties concerned, but there are many cases which concern the public where Government might intervene usefully.

4. Again, there is no machinery at present in existence for enforcing the provisions of the Act against local manufacturers, and Mr. Campbell points out that there is reason to suppose that they at present evade the law. If it is desirable to check dishonest trading in imported goods, it is equally desirable to check the same practices in the case of goods locally produced.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LOVE!

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SILENT LOVE."

WE have been favored with the following original poem in the handwriting of the author of "Silent Love," an extremely sweet and tender poem, first published some six years ago, and which has since gone through many editions. The history of this poem was a remarkable one. The author, James Wilson, was a native of Paisley, and was born in the year 1749; he was the only son of his parents, who were of the middle rank of life. He received a good education in his native town, and then went to Glasgow College, to study the profession of physic. There he remained until the death of his father, after which he was withdrawn from college, and commenced business as an apothecary, in which he succeeded, and was enabled to realize a small independence, on which he retired, and lived with his mother until her death. His nephew, in the short biographical memoir prefixed to the poem of "Silent Love," goes on to state that—"he was long observed to look solitary; he had scarcely a companion; and it was thought that some disappointment in love was the cause; but, as he had no confidant, the matter was never revealed. He was then in his thirty-fifth year, and betook himself to travelling, and after many years he returned, and stayed with my mother in Causewayside-street. I was young at the time, and can only remember that he was my companion—had a good disposition—could sing well, and read much. He also wrote occasionally, but we never knew what; and at last he grew so morose, particularly when among strangers, that no one could elicit the thoughts of his mind. In the autumn of 1806 he fell into a speedy decline, and died on the 7th of March, 1807, leaving still the history of his love a sealed letter; and the name of his fair one is now a secret for ever."

It appears from the poem, which was brought to light long after his death, that he had, in the course of his life, entertained a secret passion for a young woman, which engrossed his whole being, and gave a color to his entire future life. It may have been a hopeless passion; it was a concealed one, for he does not seem ever to have revealed his love to the object herself. Strange the power of one thrilling glance from a human eye, that it should thus transfix another being, and enchain his thoughts for life! Yet such appears to have been the case here. This man loved tenderly, passionately, hopelessly—poured out his life in one long sigh—and went to the grave, taking his secret with him. The little poem, which his nephew has since given to the world, is an extremely graceful and touching production, and, though never destined for publication, it is worthy of the pen of Pope; having all his elegance, and much more than his feeling and passion. The following lines are inferior to it, but still they are curious and interesting; and we trust they will be found worthy of the perusal of our readers. From the date on the manuscript, the lines seem to have been written in the same year that the author died.—Eliza Cook.

In ancient time, when Homer sung,
His Grecian lyre to Love was strung;
Sweet Love! the soul-inspiring strain!
Which brings the greatest bliss or pain.
When Virgil tuned his Latin lyre,
It breathed the same celestial fire;
And when the English poet sings,
What other power can trill his strings?

'T is by Love's chain the world is hung—
The withering old—the glowing young—
The rich, the poor, and all incline
To kneel at Love's most sacred shrine!
The greatest genius earth can boast
Has on Love's troubled sea been tossed;
And as the mind and reason rise,
We read new bliss in woman's eyes!

Yet love is a most dangerous thing,
Even from the peasant to the king;
And, as all thoughtful poets sing,
Is safest in the marriage ring.
Love charms the heart, but blinds the eyes;
Love every patent truth denies;
Love, though it may believe in part,
No cautious word can reach the heart.

Love causes bliss, or causes fears—
A sun of smiles—a sea of tears—
A hopeful mind—a broken heart—
Sweet innocence or bastard art.
Love is no simple god to serve;
Those who enlist can seldom swerve;
Till, waking from their dream of joy,
They lead a life of cold alloy,

That love alone is safe from fears—
From broken bliss, and art, and tears,
Which through life's present veil can see
A glimmering of futurity—
Which values temper, truth, and health;
More than the fleeting power of wealth;
All other Loves will prove unkind,
And why?—because they have been blind!

—Eliza Cook's Journal.

A RECENT DEATH-BED.

"DRAW back the shrouding curtain—let me feel
The inspiring freshness of this radiant morn;
Slowly and surely does its influence steal,
Divinely healing—though so weak and worn,
My languid frame revives: I may not die
Beneath the splendour of yon balmy sky.

"Like thee to live, like thee to die, O Sun,
It was a boyish hope, and all in vain*—
With aims yet unfulfilled and course half run,
I, too, might murmur forth the poet's strain.
But, past the terrors of the darksome night,
My strengthened pulses bless the morning's light.

"I feel that I shall live. Within my heart,
With hopes renewed, its old ambitions wake;
Again amid the crowd I bear my part,
Foremost once more to toil for England's sake,
To strive, to struggle, and to link my fame
To the proud triumphs of my country's name.

"My mother's anxious watch may now be o'er.
Tell her the rays which light this faded brow,
Are answer to her prayer—for me no more
From those dear eyes the anxious tears shall flow."

* Schiller.

Alas ! alas ! the dream was false as vain,
Faded the sun—and Death resumed his reign.

Cold on that noble heart the omen fell.
The dark clouds hurried o'er the changeful skies ;
He felt their shadows told his doom—the spell
Closed with its silent seal. He raised his eyes,
And with the glory of the opening day
One of earth's brightest spirits passed away.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Mourbhunj minor, who has seen the world, is already showing the effects of the training he has received under British auspices. He has apparently ceased to rely his hopes of the future on the Lord of the Universe who, in his visible symbol, holds court in Orissa. He has given Rs. 500 and a quantity of timber for a Brahmo mandir at Balasore.

THE papers announce that the millionaire of Rawalpindi, Sirdar Sujan Singh Bahadur, has "decided" to give Rs. 12,000 to public charities, in gratitude for the recovery from illness of a near relative. A very good decision, and worthy of a millionaire. We hope the details of the accomplished grant will be soon published.

THERE was a meeting at the Town Hall on Wednesday, the 17th, in memory of the late Pandit Ajodhyanath, of Allahabad. The Maharaja of Durbhunga presided and the Hon'ble Dr. Rashbehari Ghosh proposed the chief resolution regretting the death of the Pundit and bearing testimony to his courage, devotion and self-sacrifice in the discharge of his public duties. The attendance was not large. The only European present was Mr. A. O. Hume.

MR. Jamsetjee N. Tata, of Bombay, proposes to found a Charity for the higher education of Parsee youths. He is prepared to render to a certain number, monthly assistance of not exceeding Rs. 50 in India or £10 in England, Germany or elsewhere, for not less than three years. To avoid the offence of being charitable, the successful student who begins to earn an income of Rs. 150, is required to repay the sums advanced to him by instalments of at least one-fifth of his yearly income, with simple interest at 4 per cent. In the event of the scheme succeeding, all moneys repaid will form the nucleus of a permanent Fund for a similar extended purpose.

A charity of a similar kind has been many years in existence in Bengal, established by a Brahman of no colossal fortune, Baboo Pran Kristo Chowdhry, a former Mayor of Chandernagore.

UNDER orders of the Secretary of State, the Chittagong Hill Tracts have been reduced to the status of a sub-division, and placed from the 16th November in the immediate charge of an Assistant Commissioner under the supervision of Commissioner of the Chittagong Division.

AN examination of the Provision Opium (Patna and Ghazeeport Factories) of 1890-91, will be held at the new Opium Range, No. 14, Strand, on Monday, the 29th February, in the presence of such merchants, dealers, and others interested in opium as may be present.

THE Governor-General in Council has ordered that in the case of official parcels on which the postage is to be prepaid, the service postage stamps should be affixed by the senders to the receipts handed in at the Post Office with the parcels, and not to the parcels themselves.

WOMEN in England are proving themselves competitors of men in the hard struggle for winning bread. In the census of 1831, the only occupation assigned to the fair sex was domestic service. In the last census, that of 1891, women are recognized as having 330 ways of getting a livelihood.

THE Achurch-Charrington Company have departed not quite in peace. At the twelfth hour they commenced an after piece of a personal kind to be played out thereafter.

ON Saturday last, the Statesman, in noticing a performance of the Achurch-Charrington Company, at the Corinthian Theatre, on a previous night, remarked :—

"But what the public have a right to expect is that actors and actresses should know their parts when they come on the stage, and that they should be able to conduct themselves with decency in sight and hearing of an audience. The company unfortunately failed in both these respects on Thursday. Neither Mr. Charrington nor Miss Ford, to say nothing of minor performers, had carefully studied the words of their respective roles; the former was, indeed, so ill-prepared for the performance that, towards the end of the play, in one scene, he brought matters to an absolute standstill for fully three minutes, by forgetting what he had to say, and he did not much relieve the awkwardness of this novel situation by walking off the stage twice, and returning each time as speechless as he went away. The interview with the prompter—which, presumably, he went to seek—had not proved satisfactory. In the midst of all this confusion, a drop scene parted from its fastenings, and exposed to view a portion of the stage that should have been temporarily cut off from the spectators. To finish up, no sooner had the curtain fallen upon a mutilated and otherwise badly treated play, than a scuffle apparently ensued behind the scenes, and the surprised and indignant audience heard Miss Achurch cry out, in hysterical tones, 'I will not be insulted!' The public did not wait for the end of the quarrel."

On Monday following, there appeared in the Indian Daily News a speech from Mr. Charrington, in which the actor, addressing the ladies and gentlemen attending the last performance of the Company, remarked :—

"But happening this evening to take up a copy of today's Statesman, I was astonished at finding in it a gross, cowardly and clumsy libel, commenting on events which took place on Thursday night at the fall, and on the other side of this curtain, which I contend is entirely outside the province of dramatic criticism. I must apologize to you for ringing up the curtain rather late and bringing our entertainment to a close past the usual hours. The libel was so grossly insulting to Mrs. Charrington and myself that I was compelled personally to take notice of it, and started off immediately to the Statesman office. After considerable difficulty and heavily feeling the bearers, I obtained admission to what I presume was the Editor's sanctum. He did not say he was the editor, nor would he give any name when I asked him in return for my own, but at any rate there he was, the representative of the paper, and I demanded from him a full apology in to-morrow's paper for the false statement of facts that had appeared. He declined to enter into the matter at all, and replied that if it was a libel, I had my remedy at law. I rejoined that I was leaving Calcutta on the morrow, and that he knew it (applause), which rendered me wholly powerless in that direction. I proceeded to tell him that if I could not wring some attention out of him the consequences would be very disagreeable to himself, and they would not be legal. (Laughter.) He still declined to take notice of my complaint, told me to leave the office, and sent for assistance. Well, ladies and gentlemen, I spat in his face. (Laughter and loud applause.) Then, after giving him full opportunity for retaliation, of which he did not avail himself (Laughter) I hurried on to my duties at the theatre (applause), where, I am happy to tell you, I found Mrs. Charrington very much better in health, and I am sure the performance will tonight proceed with more spirit and less imperfection than hitherto. (Cheers and applause.)"

If anything could be more shocking than the conduct of a player in trespassing into an editor's room by bribing his servants' for the purpose of chastising him for honest criticism, it is the impudence of publicly bragging of it. We are surprised that the audience not only permitted the harangue but also cheered it.

After all, as the sequel will show, this dramatic star was not the hero in his own miserable little way that he boasted of being before his hearers. He entered the sanctum like a thief, with hostile intent, but in the presence of the enemy his courage failed him. At most, he could soil the floor.

On the appearance of the speech, the editor of the Statesman applied to the Chief Magistrate for a warrant against Mr. Charrington on charges of trespass, criminal intimidation and offering intentional insult, reserving an application against the Indian Daily News. The Editor's version of the occurrence as given by his attorney Mr. Orr while making the application and corroborated by Mr. Paul Knight himself in his examination in court, is :—

"On Saturday evening, shortly after 8 o'clock, whilst Mr. Knight was correcting a 'proof' at his desk, the door was violently burst open by a man who quite unannounced, rushed into the room declaring that he had been grossly libelled and demanding an apology. The individual was a perfect stranger to Mr. Knight, being unknown to him even by sight,—and Mr. Knight told him that his intrusion was most unwarrantable, that he strongly resented it, and that if he (the visitor) wished to see the Editor, he should have sent in his name in the ordinary way, when he would have been admitted and he should have been prepared to listen to him. The accused then said 'My name is Charrington: I have been grossly libelled by a paragraph that appeared in this morning's Statesman, and I have come to demand a full apology and retraction in the next issue of your paper.' Having regard to the outrageous manner of his visit, Mr. Knight declined to listen to anything that he had to say, telling him so, and adding that if he felt aggrieved he had a remedy at law. He replied that he was leaving Calcutta next day and that the Editor knew it,—which however was not the fact. Then coming round the table he thumped himself down on a chair beside Mr. Knight, and again angrily repeated his demand for an apology and an assurance of a retraction in the next issue of the paper, adding that if he did not get satisfaction in that way he intended taking it in another (meaning that he would take the law into his own hands). Mr. Knight thereupon flatly declined to give him any such assurance, and requested him to instantly leave the room. Finding his threat had no effect, and plainly too much of a coward to commit the assault he had contemplated, the fellow got up and went to the door. He turned the handle, about to leave the room, as Mr. Knight (who had resumed work) thought, when he suddenly advanced a step or two, saying, 'Well, that's my answer,' and spat across the table on to the floor, and immediately bolted downstairs and off the Statesman premises."

Mr. Marsden was for a summons, but being told that it was not certain that Mr. Charrington will perform at Bombay and that he may leave British India, a warrant was issued qualified by an order for enlargement on entering into a personal recognizance of Rs. 1,000.

Mr. Orr insisted on an order for bail inasmuch as the accused was quite in a position to pay down the thousand rupees and have done with it, without either entering appearance or tarrying in India to take the consequences. Mr. Marsden, however, who is not for unnecessarily harassing people, stuck to the summons. On a subsequent application by Mr. Cranenburgh, the Magistrate fixed Tuesday, the 1st March, for Mr. Charrington's appearance.

On Wednesday, the 17th, the Indian Daily News, in a leader explained:—

"In conversation with the late Mr. Saunders of the Englishman, a gentleman once remarked that he thought the editor of a newspaper needs to have the hide of a rhinoceros. Mr. Saunders replied that he should not have the hide of one only, but of two. We regret that Mr. Knight, of the Statesman, has not yet become thus defensively armed. On Saturday the last night of the season of the company then occupying the Corinthian Theatre, the manager, Mr. Charrington, as it is not unusual on such occasions, made a few valedictory remarks, and thanked the audience for the very pleasant time the company had had in Calcutta and the support they had received during their stay. This was quite in order; but there was a fly in the ointment: and as Mr. Charrington rightly or wrongly felt himself aggrieved at certain remarks that had appeared in the Statesman, he related to the audience the steps he had taken to express his resentment. We cannot say that these remarks were in the best taste but they were publicly uttered, and were the subject of general conversation in the city on Sunday. Those who heard the speech were busy repeating it, and those who did not were anxious to know what was said, and the occasion of it. We gave the speech as reported to us, without a word of comment, and we are called upon 'to withdraw the statements you have made in the said report.' We do not see how we can withdraw statements that we never made, but which were made by Mr. Charrington in a speech delivered in a theatre. We certainly cannot vouch for the facts. But seeing that the statements which we published as a report, are objected to by Mr. Knight and painful to him, we regret that they should have been published. And we also regret that Mr. Knight should have shown himself unduly sensitive in his position, while he must have known that we could and would have given more prompt explanation or contradiction to any incorrect statement, than he himself has done, had he desired us to do so. It will be seen from the police report that Mr. Knight has taken proceedings against Mr. Charrington, and gives a different version of what took place in the Statesman's office from the account given by Mr. Charrington. Mr. Knight's position should claim credence for his statements, while the method adopted by Mr. Charrington to seek redress, or to avenge what he deemed the wrong done to him or his wife, is not likely to commend itself to society."

LONDON is described by Mr. Sydney Webb as "a colossal breeding and training ground of individual wills and intellects." MR. Justice Mathusawmi Iyer has rejoined his place in the Madras High Court. Dewan Bahadur Subramania Iyer, while acting for him, gave every satisfaction as a Judge.

WHO—unless indeed he be a Red Republican or Green Fenian—will not enjoy this smart treatment of Labby's latest exhibition?

"There is no nonsense about Mr. Labouchere. Even when he sinks to vulgarity his descent is thorough. This is what he has to say of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new leader of the Liberal Unionists in the House of Commons:—

'The Times announces that Mr. Chamberlain is to be chosen the leader of the Liberal Unionists in the House of Commons. I rejoice at this. The Liberal Unionists are mainly Whigs, and that they should be led by a Radical renegade is only a fit punishment for them. Satan, according to Milton, preferred to reign in Hell rather than serve in Heaven. So it is with Mr. Chamberlain. He left us because we declined to recognise him as our leader. He has now achieved the object of his ambition. He is a leader. Unfortunately, however, for him, he has no following. In this respect he is even worse off than Satan.'

The above choice specimen of—if we be allowed the oxymoron—refined Billingsgate does great credit to Mr. Labouchere's head and heart, and is well calculated to enhance the worth and dignity of Truth.—The Eastern Guardian.

THE Hon'ble Sir Charles Paul K. C. I. E., goes on medical leave for twelve months from the 22nd March. Mr. J. T. Woodroffe, the senior barrister-at-law, will officiate as Advocate General for Bengal.

MR. Justice Tottenham goes on furlough. Mr. R. F. Rampini, Additional district and sessions Judge, 24-Pergunnahs and Hooghly, as on a former occasion, will officiate as a Judge of the Bengal High Court.

"A strange story is told by the Calcutta journal Reis and Rayyet. According to this authority a public servant, a native, who after serving in 'almost every subordinate grade, rose at last to the head of the establishment, becoming what is called Sheristadar or Registrar of a Subordinate Judge's Court, has been dismissed after nearly thirty years' service, in a very extraordinary manner."

So writes the Times of India noticing our article of the 30th January "An Administrative Blunder, or the Story of a Sacrifice." After a brief summary of the extraordinary case of persecution and injustice, in its leading features, the leading journal of Bombay thus concludes:—

"The Sheristadar then appealed to the Viceroy, but his petition, if we rightly understand the somewhat vague language of Reis and Rayyet on this point, has never been allowed to reach Lord Lansdowne at all. The whole story is an incomprehensible one, but at the same time it is one that, told in the calm language of Reis and Rayyet, and left uncontradicted and unexplained will do the Government infinitely more harm than the wild vapourings of journals of the Bangabasi type. Whatever be the facts the case demands inquiry, and for that reason we direct attention to it."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

SIR George Campbell, K.C.S.I., member for the Kirkcaldy District and late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, is dead.

THE Bow Street Magistrate has committed Mrs. Osborne for perjury and larceny.

To reduce the output of coal and to prevent reduction of wages of labor in England, the National Miners' Federation has decided upon general stoppage of work in the collieries in the middle of March.

THE House of Commons has adopted the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

An amendment by Mr. Sexton, that Parliament was incapable of legislating for Ireland and that the Land Purchase Act had failed, was rejected by a majority of twenty-one, after the Opposition had obtained an application of the closure in an attempt to snatch a victory in a thin house.

Mr. Macneill substituted his amendment relating to elective Indian Councils by another demanding equality for natives of India with Europeans in regard to public appointments. This too was withdrawn, the Under-Secretary of State for India explaining that pledges had not been broken in this respect, and that employment of Indians in public offices was on the increase according to the recommendations of the Public Service Commission.

THE House of Lords has passed the second reading of the Indian Councils and the Indian Officers Bills. They are the same as those passed in the previous session. The last is to enable officers of high rank to leave India without resigning their appointments. Lord Salisbury, having already accepted it, recommended the measure, saying it was desirable to take advantage of the present short passage from India to England by enabling high officials to come and consult the Home Government. Earl Kimberley was of a different opinion. He thought, and justly we believe, the disadvantages outweighed the advantages. His Lordship approved of the Indian Councils Bill as a tentative measure. Its greatest recommendation to Lord Northbrook was its elasticity. Lord Salisbury deprecated the idea that the extra representation was to be mainly confined to municipal bodies. The Times considers it a scandal that the Bill is not yet law. While accepting it, that journal warns the Government against the free use of the provisions of the other measure.

IN spite of the Irish protest against English legislation for Ireland, Mr. Balfour introduced, on the 18th, amid the ridicule of the Liberals and both the Irish parties, the Irish Local Government Bill. It creates County and Baronial Councils to be elected triennially, the franchise including women, with power to the Irish Viceroy to suppress the Councils for corruption or oppression and replace the same by his own nominees.

THE French ministers have resigned, having been defeated in the Chamber of Deputies on a motion of confidence of their own inviting on the Bill dealing with Clerical and other Societies.

THE real trial of self-government in the great Pacific Empire has begun. The Parliamentary elections in Japan have been attended with serious rioting in many places. Several persons have been killed and many wounded.

THE last year closed in England in anxiety in the almost immediate prospect of war. Whatever might be the indifference of the general public or any portion of it, the warrior profession and specially the thinking part of it, felt that war was on the cards, and they forthwith brought it on the carpet, and went on kicking at it with spirit and kept it rolling. In the abandonment of this game, many of the experts contrived to lose their wits, and several of them found themselves rolling in the ground. One of those who kept their heads—the Army and Navy Gazette—without going the length of the alarmists, deliberately warned the public of the danger of undue and uninstructed confidence. The British feeling of security is, of course, founded on the insular situation of Great Britain and Ireland, coupled with the command of the sea. The geographical advantage is a permanent one, but the other is governed by circumstances. Our London contemporary observes :—

"In the early part of this century England was relatively more powerful at sea than she is to-day, and yet she was by no means beyond the reach of a coup de main. While Bonaparte was preparing his flatbottomed boats at Boulogne we had fifteen men-of-war cruising off the port to watch the movements of the invading army. If the great Corsican had had at his disposal a Sea Captain of even ordinary ability to execute his scheme he would certainly have had a very good chance of gaining the mastery of the Channel for forty-eight hours, which he demanded. Villeneuve having collected sixty ships and sailed for the Antilles, was to have swiftly returned by the North, rounded Scotland, and so come down on the petty squadron of observation off Boulogne with the united fleets of France and Spain. But he followed a course of his own, made for Cadiz, where he was blockaded, and the great manœuvre eventuated in Trafalgar."

SUCH designs, the Gazette assures us, are sure to fail in these days, inasmuch as the secret of movements even on the sea cannot be kept. But it seems that England must more than ever confine herself to the defensive. The Gazette confesses that "It would be far more hazardous for us to engage in expeditions such as we were very partial to before the French Revolution, to North and South America, to the East and West Indies, to Spain, the Coast of France, etc., if our transports were not convoyed by enormous fleets, than it was before torpedo-catchers and torpedo-boats were invented; but, on the other hand, a Boulogne invasion would be now a laughable bugaboo."

That admission has a special suggestiveness for us. The luxury of frivolous expeditions may be abandoned, but is England in the event of war going to abandon her colonies and dependencies? Not certainly, without a struggle—a life and death struggle. She cannot abandon us without effacing herself. Hence she must be prepared for expeditions—necessary expeditions—to the East and the West, the North and the South, even if her transport were to be convoyed by enormous fleets. She already enjoys ships, colonies and commerce. She must have enormous and irresistible fleets to protect her colonies and dependencies and her commerce. And here, en passant, we cannot help lamenting the abolition of the Indian Navy and the Indian docks. It was a great blunder to abolish the Indian Army. The abandonment of the Indian Navy and Marine was a stupendous mistake. We must build in the country again to protect it.

Just now, we are afraid England is not quite so prepared for war as we wish to see her—powerful on land and irresistible at sea. We therefore observe with uneasiness the impatience of the profession of arms for a conflict :—

"Our more enterprising generals 'are getting sick of waiting' for the coming war for which they have been longing with all the expectancy of 'Mariana in the moated grange,' but instead of 'wishing they were dead' they are looking out for 'command which will atone,' in some measure, for the loss of service distinctions. The years are passing swiftly. The young lions are becoming elderly and rheumatic. A little while and they will be among the 'superfluous veterans,' and all the studies, exercises, and trainings of their lives will be profitless! It must be a disturbing reflection to some of them that they were wrong when they proved to demonstration that 1889 could not pass without an outbreak of war—that they relied on it in 1890 as inevitable—and that they piled their bottom dollar on its explosion in 1891! What of the year that has just opened? No one can say that the armed peace will endure for a month. The incident of a day can fire the mighty train; but it may well be that the most warlike, confident, and eager master of many legions has no desire to 'let slip the dogs of war' in a chase of which he cannot predict the course or the result. As far as we can see, the only field on which a British general can play a great part is in a war in which Russia will be arrayed against England in India. Granting that our alliances with Germany, Austria, and Italy—alliances of common interests—demanded the co-operation of British troops in a war on the Continent of Europe, it is plain that we could never at once assume or obtain the position which we held in the time of Marlborough or Wellington. A British contingent even of two army corps—a greater force than we had on the Rhine or in the Peninsula, and in the Low Countries—would be smothered in the prodigious masses of troops with which our generals would be called to act. Nevertheless, if a Marlborough or a Wellington could be evolved from the British contingent, the sheer force of military genius would drive him to the front, and the fleet would be a preponderating factor in the calculation of our strength, and would secure adequate recognition of the claims of England in the field."

In India, we have experienced the evils of the ascendancy of the dashing Hussar spirit of fire-eaters like the lamented Sir George Pomeroy Colley.

THE following is a bad sign :—

"Appropos the announcement in the World that the Duke of Connaught is to succeed the Duke of Cambridge as Commander-in-Chief of the Army—an announcement, by the way, which rests on nothing better than rumour—a contemporary raises the question why should we not also have a Royal Prince at the head of the Navy?"

Yes, to be sure, why not? If, according to the well-known mot, a Russell as such is equal to the office of Archbishop of Canterbury or up to the command of the Channel Fleet, what miracle is above a Prince of the Blood? One would have thought that England had suffered enough from royal command or administration for any more patience. But the charm continues. Or else, we would not see respectable publicists hankering for royal mediocrities. At a time like the present, when all Europe is armed to the teeth, when the Powers, great and small, have made the greatest progress in arms, when even third-rate Powers boast of larger armies, and not inferior weapons, when states which thirty years ago scarcely counted a single sail now own ironclads and torpedos, England must more than ever cherish talent and bring out merit to the fore. There never was a time when she needed her Cochranes and Nelsons, her Wellesleys and Churchills more.

SINCE his disgrace, the author of Greater Britain has returned to public life more than ever as an authority on Foreign Affairs. He has been lately studying the relative strength of the different Powers. Of his most recent deliverances, we cull the purport of that which concerns us most :—

"Sir Charles Dilke says that the only two Powers in the world which can do us harm are France and Russia: France because her maritime enterprise would enable her in case of war to imperil our trade; and Russia, because by moving a few men in Central Asia she can force us to spend so much money upon Indian Military preparation as to jeopardise our hold on India. The chief danger is an eventual advance by Russia on the North-West portion of India, but he admits also that in the event of a coalition against us of France and Russia there is peril to our sea-borne trade. The French Naval Estimates show that during the year 1892 they will have thirty efficient armourclads fit for immediate service against thirty-one of ours; while they will have actually in barracks more trained men than we have, with a vast superiority in torpedo squadrons. Finally, he contends that, as matters stand, in the event of a single-handed war with France, we should be unable to hold the Mediterranean, could only mask the French fleets at Gibraltar, and might find ourselves forced to undertake dangerous expeditions for the relief of Malta, while Cyprus must be given up. And the Suez Canal and Red Sea sealed; at the same time France intends to continue to build ships in sufficient numbers to prevent us from carrying out our traditional policy of blockade."

A VERSION of Enoch Arden has been reproduced in life at Boston. A man named Hall has been missing for ten years. He was one of the survivors of the crew of a wrecked ship, but had not been seen since and was generally believed to have died. Mrs. Hall mourned his loss for a time and then took another mate. Three years ago, her first husband returned. He found her mated. Still, naturally enough,

Enoch yearn'd to see her face again;
'If I might look on her sweet face again
And know that she is happy!'

Indeed, he longed to be united to his wife but was loath to disturb the peace of the household. So he resolved

Not to tell her, never to let her know.

Thus he strove with himself and waited patiently in hopes of another turn in his fortune. Thus life dragged on for three years which seemed three ages, until the lord of the unsuspecting bigamist, his rival in the affection of his wife, died. At last, he regained his own. On New Year's Day, Hall remarried Mrs. Hall as a widow.

THE week in Calcutta has been marked by the absence of both the Viceroy and the Lieutenant Governor.

Lord Lansdowne reached Darjeeling on the 13th in fair but threatening weather, which broke out next night into a heavy storm of hail, sleet and snow. Next day there was a severe storm followed by hail, thunder and lightning. The day following, the hills were covered with several feet of snow. He refused an address from the municipality, as the visit was private. It was not, however, confined to Darjeeling, but included Suriel, Kalimpong, Philut, Tuglool. Lord Lansdowne was charmed with Darjeeling, as who is not who has visited it, and thoroughly enjoyed his trip. Lady Lansdowne left Calcutta yesterday for Cooch Behar whereto she will accompany her Lord.

SINCE Mr. Caine's fillip, Lord Wenlock seems more than ever determined to do everything himself, as far as he can. His Governorship is a new broom, and young ambition thinks nothing of attacking the Augean Stable. But has it come to this? Has the Lord of Madras already entered in right earnest on a revolutionary rôle of economical reform, beginning with a clean sweep of the brood of Secretaries, Private and Public, of various species, Superiors and Subs, Principals and Ordinaries, Joints and Deputies and Assistants and Assistant-Deputies, Personal and Impersonal Assistants, and of different degrees, substantive, non-substantive and unsubstantial, officiating, acting, and not acting at all, which constitutes the Great Circumlocution Office down South? Or else, how comes the following letter to appear in the Madras papers?—

"Government House, Madras,
December 30th, 1891.

To Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.,
Gentlemen,—I beg to acknowledge, with many thanks, the receipt of your letter of the 11th inst, in which you announce your intention of bringing out next March a Company for the construction of Electric Tramways in Madras. I note with peculiar satisfaction the intention you therein express of endeavouring to place as many shares as possible in India, and also of largely employing native labour both in actual construction and also in supervision, as well as of obtaining as much material as you can of native manufacture. I sincerely wish you all success in your efforts in these directions. I am well aware that in these days of intense competition, when profits are cut down as low as possible, it is very difficult to allow philanthropic motives to be introduced into commercial enterprises, and if you can demonstrate that, while largely benefiting the people of this country, you can at the same time prove your works to be a success from a purely business and financial point of view, you will have done much for the industrial development of India. I need hardly say that I shall watch your progress here with the greatest interest, and earnestly hope that your efforts may be crowned with success. I shall have much pleasure in seeing Mr. Chalk, when he arrives out here, and will be glad to render him any assistance in my power.

I am, Gentlemen,
Yours faithfully,
(Signed) WENLOCK."

All that is very human, and even amiable for that, but it is scarcely Grand-Pashalik, to say nothing of Sultanlike. In any case, it is not diabolical, God be thanked! His Lordship has made a creditable advance since he danced with the congenial spirits on the heights of Ooty.

It will be remembered that, many years ago, the late Mr. Pogson, the Madras Astronomer, announced a meteorologico-astronomical Law of Famine. Accepted by Sir William Hunter, it was attacked in various quarters. But now Mr. Michie Smith supports it by his own observations, so far as the Coromandel Coast is concerned. According to Mr. Pogson, the weather was dependent upon certain spots in the sun which appeared in cycles, the rainfall being least at the time of the minimum spots and most copious when the spots reached their maximum. Mr. Smith has made some reassuring observations in the heavens. He lately discovered some great spots. He thought he noticed a great cyclone blowing in the great luminary. He laments the want of means at the Madras Observatory for measuring the speed of the storm. Nevertheless, he hazards the conjecture that the wind high up there was blowing at the rate of 100 to 200 miles per second. For the rest, although by the rotation of the sun these spots have been carried towards the edge, to be soon sent to the right about on the other side away from us, some fresh clusters have formed themselves.

THE Magistrates in and around Bellary are unwilling to try Mr. E. M. Baber, of the Revenue Survey Department, charged with criminal breach of trust as a public servant. Mr. Sewell, the District Magistrate of Bellary, applied to the High Court to be relieved of that duty, in that he was a personal friend of the accused. Their Lordships—the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wilkinson—refused the application, saying that all the Magistrates of the neighbouring districts had also asked to be excused from trying the case, and that Mr. Sewell in trying it would do nothing more than his duty, but if he did not feel disposed to deal with the matter himself, he could commit the accused for trial to the Sessions Court. These neighbouring magistrates have served their friend by thus creating a character for Mr. Baber, which will probably stand him in better stead than any formal deposition in court. Still their scruple is creditable to them. But we cannot understand the rationale of a man's committal to the sessions as the alternative of a Magistrate's indisposition to take up any case. It is a compromise unwarranted by the law. Strange that a bench of a High Court headed by a Chief Justice should issue such an instruction!

A CONTEMPORARY who is not very choice in its Correspondence, has distanced itself by giving insertion, doubtless unwittingly, to a most impudent puff of a person who has got himself elected one of the principal office-bearers of a neighbouring municipality. That municipality has, for some length of time, been the worst-conducted in the whole country—a description the full force of which will be understood by those only who know how wretched, in their personnel and proceedings, are many of these institutions. It has now reached its climax of absurdity in the election and elevation of the man in question. The Editor had no idea of the amusement which the particular issue of his paper was sure to cause not only in the town in the suburbs, where his hero is now a municipal magnate, but also at the factory-town where he earned his first laurels and made his unenviable fortune. Were a Joy Mitter appointed to the office in Calcutta held by Baboo Gopal Lal Mitter—which would be like installing a typical Bæotian in a similar office in old Athens, of which he happened to be a freeman—it would scarcely be a less appropriate appointment than that which is glorified in the columns of our contemporary. The man himself makes no secret of the absurdity. Before his recent elevation, he used to defend his election as a Commissioner by pointing to the dependence on others of the very office-bearers for conducting their correspondence, and saying, in the words of the proverbial Joy Mitter, that they were all asses, only he had been "caught,"—that is, had acquired notoriety as one. However true the assertion about writing and, for the most part, even thinking, there is some inaccuracy in that characterization. There is vanity discernible even in the rags of apparent self-depreciation. Chips of the same Bæotian oak the others are, no doubt, but he is a block by himself, a prodigiously big, heavy block. And this is the man who has so charmed our contemporary's correspondent by his great affluence that he has been persuaded to sing poems in his patron's praise through the public press.

THE Pioneer Glass Manufacturing Company opened their works, last week, in Tittaghar, under the auspices of Lady Elliott. Baboo Chundy Lall Singh, one of the directors, welcomed Lady Elliott and the other ladies and gentlemen. He congratulated the promoters and the shareholders on the success of the movement which was thoroughly a national one, and he pointed out that it was quite in unison with the spirit of our national customs that a lady should first bless a new undertaking. Baboo Nobin Chand Boral, another director, explained the scope and objects of the undertaking. Mr. Struthers thanked Lady Elliott for the ceremony of the afternoon, and considered it fortunate that in the absence of the Lieutenant-Governor, they had an efficient deputy in Lady Elliott who, from the ability, earnestness, gracious manner and tact with which she discharged any duty she undertook, might well be regarded as the Lieutenant-Governess of Bengal.

Sir Edward Buck replied on behalf of Lady Elliott. He wished every success to the Company, who, he hoped, unlike another pioneer Company of an older date in Upper India, would turn out bottles that would stand upright, and set a good example of industry without the support of Government.

The Company had made special arrangements for the guests and, of course, refreshments were provided.

A SINGLE Englishman in the desert is as good as a host—or maybe as bad. Mr. Wyllie, the manager of Mohrbhunj, clearly has not enough occupation for his energies in even the largest of the Orissa Tributary States, so he pokes his nose into those of his neighbours. At any rate, on Monday, at Bhadrak, he got up a lively scene for the delectation and distraction of the great visitor who has strayed to those parts. The Lieutenant-Governor was besieged by a lot of natives, supposed to be two parties of Tributary Ooriyas, one from the plains and another from the highlands, headed openly by the said Wyllie, clamouring for the virtual deposition of the Raja of Keonjhar. It was a good plan cleverly laid: two different and presumably hostile parties combining in a common object—worthy of the best days of Orissan history, when the Ooriyas were a nation and not the remnant of a famine-destroyed people, consisting of coolies, palki bearers, porters, valets, and pipe-layers, with a sprinkling of hill chiefs remote from civilization and in mortal dread of the whiteman and his native underlings. They were for the detention of the Chief, but, in the present aptitude of public opinion in England to sympathise with Indian Chiefs, the Government have to be particularly careful. In vain Sir Charles Elliott reasoned with them. The men were all the more loud against letting the Chief loose. For those who belonged to his territory had reason, now at all events, to fear the Raja's vengeance. The outcry against him was of the usual kind, and we hope of the usual value. All the assurance that the Lieutenant-Governor could give, was to consider the petition carefully and to exact guarantees against abuse in the event of the Raja's being permitted to return. The first promise Sir Charles Elliott is sure to keep. The fulfilment of the second is not all within his power—or any man's.

AT the last Entrance Examination of the Calcutta University, some of the question papers were tampered with. Before the examination commenced, several questions had oozed out, and were for sale at the Bankipore market. It is reported that the papers were extracted from the box in charge of Mr. Ewbank, Principal of the Patna College superintending the Examination at Patna, by feigning his bearer. The Senate has decided to hold another examination for the Patna Circle in Patna on the 4th April. The proposition to hold the re-examination at Calcutta was abandoned as being inconvenient and expensive to the examinees. One paper will be set for each day, the hour of examination being from 7 to 10 in the morning.

THERE was on Saturday last a fight between the Police and the Military at Alipore, close to the Lieutenant-Governor's palace, on the occasion of the Flower Show and Miss Tassel's balloon ascent and parachute descent at the Horticultural Society's Gardens. A number of soldiers of the 17th Bengal Infantry occupying the barracks near the Gardens wanted to clear the ground of the crowd that had gathered there for a clear view of the ascent. The crowd shewed no disposition to move out. The soldiers were firm, with the result that the Police interfered and arrested a Naik who was taken to the Thana. The Sepoys demanding the release of their man, which being refused, a regular fight ensued. A military enquiry is being held.

THE following remarkable contribution by a friend deserves to be rescued from a back number of the last year's Indian Spectator :—

"A young lady residing with her family somewhere in Scotland was one day going down a flight of stairs, when she experienced a sudden and curious sensation in her eyes. She stopped and covered her eyes with her hand, and she then perceived sparks, emitting a brilliant light, flying in all directions. In less than a minute this passed away and left her eyes in their normal state. The family physician was, however, called in, but as the case did not present any symptoms with which he was familiar, he was only able to watch for further developments. These soon declared themselves. After a time when the attacks came on, sparks were no longer seen, but a bright, steady, diffused light, so that, when in a room at night in total darkness, she could see her way about as well as if it were day-light. The testimony on which this rests is that given by the medical man himself. Akin to this faculty must have been that possessed by a Mr. Duquid, an artist residing in Glasgow, who for many years was in the habit of painting in pitch darkness pictures in oil colours on cards and cavasses which had been previously marked."

THE BENGAL RAGE FOR INSPECTION.

WE are afraid good Sir Charles Elliott has no idea of the mischief he has caused by whipping his lieutenants in all departments into preternatural locomotion. His recent order regarding tours of inspections, at once ill-considered and uncalled for, will by and by be a dead letter, if it is not sooner largely modified. Meanwhile, it is doing more harm than good, and it is certain that little or no practical good can come out of it. Just now, false alarms about visits of high officials and heads of departments, are weekly and daily circulated to the great detriment of efficient work, and the worry of the unfortunate workers. It is the old story of the shepherd boy and the wolf, only the lying note does not issue from a single source that it may be disregarded after a few trials. Thus a permanent panic prevails in some places. Each European who alights from a first-class railway carriage, or gets down from a steamer, or is seen in or about a Dak Bungalow, is taken to be either a Member of the Board of Revenue, the Inspector-General of Police, of Registration, of Jails, or of Civil Hospitals, or the Director of Land Records or of Public Instruction, or some assistant of this, that, or the other, and he is carefully watched until his real personality or official designation is ascertained. The other day, in one of the metropolitan districts, a member of a respectable European firm in Calcutta went on his own business, and a rumour was afloat that the Junior Member of the Board had come to inspect the Revenue offices. There was consternation in the civil station. The Amla were seen wending breathlessly towards cutchery early at 8 o'clock in the morning, with their Pagrees on, and officers driving at full gallop to be in office as early as possible and put things right for inspection. Such rumours are also circulated by the mischievous by way of practical jokes upon the poor clerks and their unfortunate officers. For weeks people give up their regular work in order to meet the inspecting officer, when, at last, the occasion of all the ado turns out to be a false report. Imagine how a man's mind is disturbed by such false alarms and how his attention is diverted to other useless matters of detail from his graver daily duties! In a word, no department has any rest or its officers any peace of mind to attend to their important and regular occupations properly.

Many magnates are quite incapable of touring in this peculiarly forced fashion, but the fiat has gone forth, and they must be out at any risk. Some might be seen lying seedy in the circuit house of Dak Bungalows. Others are suffering from fever, but still going on with their inspection work at any cost. And what is all this inspection—but filling up of certain forms, collecting of some figures, and repetition of dozens of questions from old reports? A single false alarm keeps a department in a state of constant and permanent sensation for at least one week. The Deputy Collectors, with the inspection reports in hand or in the pocket, might all be seen continually running from one room to another. Under such circumstances, what man can fulfil judicial or other important functions thoroughly and carefully? The announcement of the advent of the Head of the Government is, of course, a more prodigious disaster. The news of His Honor's approach is enough to keep a district in commotion for a month before his arrival. No endeavour is spared to put up a grand and bright appearance on everything, which can be done only superficially. Cases of all kinds are disposed of with indecent haste and in quite an arbitrary fashion, which cannot appear from the record or the elaborate order sheet now introduced. Justice suffers and the regular and urgent business of a whole month (such as is beyond the scope of H. H.'s inspection) falls into arrear. Bundles are quietly shelved and takeeds are intentionally mislaid in order to prepare for H. H.'s and his party's inspection. The inspection in fact is a sort of assault-at-arms, and when the unprepared offices are attacked by the highly paid regiment of inspecting volunteers under their great commander, the scene is most amusing. All of a sudden, the enemy is at once besieged and bombarded along the whole line, and fire is opened indiscriminately upon the unfortified positions. The shuddering Amla, the confused deputy, the outwitted Munsif, the to-and-fro-hurrying assistant superintendent, and the half-dead clerk, all struggle hard, and most of them exhibit really comical airs and postures, quite unintentionally—only to please the head of the Government and his staff. Then these unfortunate men, who had passed a sleepless and anxious night, and, most of them being Hindoos, had to run to office without taking any food whatever, are put to the test of rigid official cross-examination, and unless they pass through this ordeal well and safe, their fate is doomed. At least, in their own minds, they think so. Now, let us see who is this cross-examining counsel. He is neither the Advocate-General nor Mr. Woodroffe nor Mr. Jackson to be sure, but then he is the very ruler of the land who can make and unmake a man with one stroke of his pen. Unless an officer himself who has had experience of that sort of terrible ordeal by his own superiors, it is not possible for any one to realise the wretched and miserable position of his poor subordinates. We see from our own daily experience that most intelligent and well educated persons get quite funkcd, while in the witness box, under a heavy fire of cross-examination from some good shot of the legal army. A bad impression left upon the mind, of a great and strong man like Sir Charles Elliott, cannot pass away easily and quickly, and it is not to be expected that such impressions will be temporary. Many good officers may not prove quite equal to the test of this novel inspection in which Sir Charles Elliott takes the principal part, making searching enquiries himself, and then they suffer for no particular fault of their own. Men who tremble before the District Officer or the Joint Magistrate in putting up a paper or telling a simple thing, men whose mother-tongue is not English, and who have but slender opportunities of speaking it, and who accordingly have no command over it even for practical purposes, cannot be expected to answer in it satisfactorily all questions put to them by a Governor who is master of details, who goes prepared entirely by the labours of others (because the materials are supplied by his secretaries) to inspect an office, and who is now greatly dreaded by all the native officers of all classes, particularly those who are directly under him.

We are sorry to hear the Subordinate Executive Service, which has held its own so long and proved its ability for all sorts of work, is the greatest sufferer under the present régime. It is whispered that the promotion of a number of officers of this service has been stopped, and the civil list also seems to give colour enough to the rumour, seeing that those officers who were once well spoken of, have been passed over at the last promotion. Their chief fault was the taking some, not unreasonably long, time in disposing of cases, or in displeasing some of their immediate superiors by their injudicious, though possibly just, decisions. Even explanations were not called for from the officers concerned, before they were punished as mentioned above. This state of things must be very discouraging to a class of public servants who are, in fact, the backbone of the administration in the Province.

RAJSHAHYE AND ITS CAPITAL.

RAJSHAHYE is one of the oldest, and is still one of the most interesting, Districts of Bengal. A glimpse of its present condition obtained from a reliable source, cannot be unwelcome to the intelligent reader. The official capital is at Rampore Beaulah. This station, once the headquarters of the Division, although somewhat dull, is not so bad from a sanitary point of view. On account of scanty rains, this season has unfortunately been unusually unhealthy, and people are for some months suffering much from malarious fever. The Municipality is poor, having only an income of nearly Rs. 30,000 annually. Its Chairman and Vice-chairman being a Hindu and a Mahomedan respectively, it has both the representative elements in its executive. It seems to do its work quietly and smoothly, and there does not appear to be much of the party feeling which has been the curse of the municipalities in so many of the districts of Bengal. This District has a very large Mahomedan population of the cultivating classes, which comes up to nearly from 75 to 80 per cent, but there are very few respectable and educated Mahomedans here. We are glad to learn that the Mahomedan students of the local College, although numerically small, are getting on very well with their studies, and some graduates have recently beat their Hindu brethren. The College building is a fine, ornamental structure, small but neat, and beautiful, one of which the Public Works Department may well be proud. Mr. Livingstone, the Principal, is a great blessing both to the College and the Medressah, the latter at present having only the junior classes.

There are only two respectable and wealthy Mahomedan families in this District, namely, those of Natore and Bagha. We are afraid that they are not in a very flourishing state. The people of this District appear generally to be very quiet, simple, and law-abiding.

The old town of Rampore Beaulah has been carried away by the Ganges, and its position can now be fixed on the other bank of the river. Almost all the brick houses in the native quarter of the town, seem to have been recently constructed on very low land, and there are a large number of small filthy and offensive tanks, excavations, and dirty ditches by the sides of these houses, which are a great cause of the insanitation of the town and hot-beds of malarial and infectious diseases. The Municipality being poor is unable to fill them up.

There are nearly half a dozen so called and real Rajas and Ranees in the district, who hold large landed properties, some of which are under the Court of Wards, and others are managed by themselves. We have not been able to ascertain if there are in existence any heirs of the old Rajas of this part of the country, who reigned over it before the Mahomedan conquest, or even those of the predecessors of the present Natore Family. There are about half a dozen European officials, who reside in the European quarter of Rampore Beaulah, and about a dozen European planters and silk manufacturers, who are scattered all over the District. The native officials consider this place very dear, and it is a common saying among them that in Rajshahye the gari and the bari (conveyance and the house) take up a great part of their income. This place has a reputation of being a sporting District, the northern part having jungles, and these again so full of leopards that some of these unwelcome gentlemen patrol the streets and trespass into houses at night at the chief town. There is a leopard or tiger somewhere in the interior or near the station, which has, of late, been attracting much notice, as it has killed and wounded two dozen men or rather more. Many attempts to kill it have failed, and it has now found a place as a ghost in the imagination of the lower classes. It is said that its face is black, and that it travels from one place to another with the rapidity of a railway train. A reward of Rs. 50 has been offered by the magistrate for its destruction, but nobody has been able to kill it. There are a good many shikaris in these parts, and almost every well-to-do cultivator has a gun to protect his life and property, particularly his fields against the inroads of wild animals, of whom the wild boars and leopards are most offensive and troublesome. During the last year, 96 persons were killed by leopards in this District, but the number killed by snakes is still more large.

It is reported that Mr. Brojendra Kumar Seal is coming to Rajshahye in March as the District Judge, and that the higher authorities wish to see this District chiefly manned by native officers. There is already a native District Superintendent in Babu H. G. Mullick, and for a short time there was a native District Magistrate also in Mr. Augusty.

THE MUNICIPAL ELECTION LAW OF CALCUTTA.

THE RIGHT OF VOTING OF INDIVIDUALS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

LAST week we noticed an application to the Chief Magistrate by a rate-payer in ward No. 7, Baboo Nobin Chand Boral—whom the Municipal Chairman had disqualified for the forthcoming election. He was late in producing the rate bills to prove that he had paid the rates as occupier which entitled him to be included in the voters' register. This week, the other stipendiary Magistrate was appealed to to order the inclusion of the name of an owner and occupier in Ward No. 1. From the reports in the morning papers, it seems that Baboo Moni Lal Banerji is now the sole heir of his father and his uncle who jointly owned and occupied the premises No. 33, Bagbazar-street. The house is assessed at Rs. 250 and stands in the books of the Corporation in the name of the uncle. The rates for the third quarter remained unpaid. Moni Lal had applied on the 21st January to have his name registered and he was provisionally registered as owner and occupier. On objection of an intending candidate for the commissionership of that ward, the Chairman subsequently held that inasmuch as Monilal was not the registered owner and had not paid the 3rd quarter's rates, he was not entitled to vote under section 13 of the Act. The Magistrate was of the same opinion with the Chairman, the Nawab holding that, on the strict reading of the law, the Chairman had taken a right view of section 13 of the Act and he the magistrate did not wish to disturb his decision.

We confess we do not understand the facts of the case and therefore the right application of the law. If the premises be the property of a Hindu joint family—in other words—if Monilal has co-sharers in the same property, the owners and occupiers of that property cannot claim the privilege which Manilal preferred. Section 13 seems to exclude a Hindu joint-family, a company, firm, or other association of persons from the privilege of voting, unless owning any land or house or occupying a house, assessed at Rs. 300 and upwards. They are not privileged, like single individuals, to vote at an election if they own and occupy any land or house assessed at not less than Rs. 150 and at less than Rs. 300. We think it is a misapplication of section 13 to disqualify other than such joint owners and occupiers. The section runs thus :—

"In sections nine, ten, eleven and twelve the word 'person' includes a Hindu joint-family, a company, firm or other association of persons who may be registered as the owners of any house or land, or as the occupiers of any house under clauses (b) and (c) of section eight or may be stated in any license to be the holders thereof. Votes under clauses (a) and (e) of section eight can only be claimed by a single individual paying the rates or taxes in his own name."

It seems to us that the section is intended to explain when and how far an association of persons is enabled to take part in the elections—under what circumstances it is qualified or disqualified. The concluding sentence—on which the decisions of both the Chairman and the Magistrate in the present case are apparently based—is introduced to point out that an association of persons cannot take advantage of the clauses (a) and (e) but that they are intended only for single individuals. "Paying the rates or taxes in his own name" must be taken to be in opposition to joint payment in joint names, or for joint owners.

If, however, Manilal be the sole owner of the premises and occupies it, it is difficult to understand why he should be pronounced disqualified because his name is not registered or he failed to pay the 3rd quarter's rates.

He had, we believe, applied for registration of his own name in the books of the Corporation and for registration of his votes for the coming election. If the Commissioners had accepted him, provisionally though it be, as the owner and occupier of the premises, there is no justification for the Chairman to throw him overboard. There is no fixed time for any application for registration of a name. Such an application may be made at any time. Nor are the Commissioners competent to refuse it, unless there is sufficient reason—which refusal again must be in writing. We do not see that there was any such refusal in the present case. After having provisionally admitted Manilal's name, there is no reason why he should be thrown out on a plea, however valid, taken subsequently. The qualifications for a voter in the Act are based on sex, age, residence or payment of rates, and ownership or occupation of land or houses assessed at certain sums. The qualifying sections do not fix any period for payment of rates. Non-payment of rates or taxes in proper time is no disqualification under the Act.

We are afraid both the decisions in the present case have been arrived at without any reference to the other sections of the Act. Particular stress seems to have been laid on one section which we have attempted to shew does not apply.

GOVERNMENT MANAGEMENT OF PRIVATE STATES BILL.

Supreme Legislative Council. February 12, 1891.

The Hon'ble Sir Philip Hutchins moved for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for the levy of a rate on private estates under the management of Government to meet the cost of superior supervision and management. He said :—

"In this country Government is landlord paramount and to a certain extent patriarchal. It intervenes for the protection of private estates in a variety of contingencies, and in order to protect them assumes their management. This is perhaps best understood in connection with the action of the Court of Wards, the popularity of which is both well deserved and universal; but encumbered estates have often been saved from the hammer by the intervention of Government, either after effecting an arrangement with the creditors, or under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, when a decree-holder presses for a sale. The laws for the recovery of revenue also favour the attachment and management of estates which fall into arrears rather than the sale either of the whole or a substantial part of them.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Dangerous Chest Complaints.—The enumeration of these diseases is scarcely necessary, as, unfortunately, most Englishmen know them to their cost. Coughs, common colds, influenza, bronchitis, asthma, pleurisy, inflammation of the lungs, and even consumption in its early stages, are best treated by rubbing Holloway's Ointment upon the chest and upon the back between the shoulders. It penetrates internally, checks the cold shiverings, relieves the overgorged lungs, gradually removes the oppression from the chest, and restores the obstructed respiration, hitherto so distressingly disagreeable and highly dangerous. In treating this class of diseases, Holloway's Pills should always be taken while using his Ointment; they purify the blood, promote perspiration, and allay dangerous irritations.

"But all such management costs money and occupies to a greater or less extent valuable time of public officers who are the paid servants of the taxpayers. In some cases the immediate administration of the estate is entrusted to a special paid manager under the Collector, but there must still be a good deal of supervision by the Collector himself, and probably by yet higher officers; and such supervision entails also considerable contingent expenditure. In many cases too even the direct management is undertaken by an officer in the position of a tahildar.

"The fundamental principle of the Bill which I now seek to introduce is that all such management is for the benefit of the private estate and should be paid for out of its income and not out of the pocket of the general tax-payer. The mere enunciation of the principle shows its fairness: the unfairness is to charge the public for services rendered to individuals. There is indeed another legal principle that no trustee should be allowed to make money for himself out of his trust, but even under the most jealous system of equity every trustee is permitted to charge for the services of his establishment, and that is all that I propose to do.

"There is only one case in regard to which I can foresee the possibility of objection, and that is the case of estates attached for arrears of revenue. It might be said that in this instance the attachment is for the benefit of Government, or, in other words, for the benefit of the general tax-payer, and that Government or the tax-payer should bear the expense. But, as I have already indicated, if the realization of the revenue is considered alone, it will be best secured by a summary sale of the estate. The grounds for preferring a temporary sequestration are a lenient consideration for the defaulter and his family, and a reluctance to proceed to extremities where milder measures are likely to prove efficacious. Even in this instance therefore the management is really undertaken for the benefit of the defaulting proprietor or others interested in the preservation of the estate.

"Assuming then that all the cost of management, so far as it can be estimated, ought to be thrown on the estate, I will now explain how my Bill secures this object. By section 3 I authorise a Local Government to impose a rate on all private estates under the management of its officers. The rate is in no case to exceed 4 per cent. of the income, which, having regard to the commission payable to private agents or to receivers appointed by the Courts, is certainly not an excessive maximum. But it is further provided that the actual rate shall be calculated from time to time so as just to cover, as nearly as may be, (1) the real cost of public establishments employed on, or in connection with, the management, and (2) the incidental expenditure on contingencies. Power is reserved to reduce or remit the rate in special cases, as where special managers are employed and only control and supervision supplied by public officers. Section 4 relates to charges for audit and legal advice, and allows Local Governments the option of prescribing special fees for such services or including them in the general rate. Where they are rendered by what are known as whole-time officers the latter alternative will probably be chosen, but there has been a practical difficulty in the way of laying this down as a universal rule.

"Section 6 validates charges of the nature of those now to be authorized which have been levied in the past. For in several provinces a general rate has already been levied on estates under the Court of Wards and credited to the public exchequer to meet the estimated cost of supervision and management by Government officers. I do not for a moment say that such a charge is even now illegal under the laws applicable to the particular provinces, but it is desirable to place its propriety beyond question.

"The other provisions of the Bill are merely incidental, except perhaps section 8. This constitutes the Local Government the sole judge of the value of the work entailed on its establishments, and will prevent the amount of the rate being questioned in a Civil Court, so long of course as it is within the very moderate maximum of 4 per cent."

The Motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir Philip Hutchins also introduced the Bill.

The Hon'ble Sir Philip Hutchins also moved that the Bill and Statement of Objects and Reasons be published in the Gazette of India in English, and in the local official Gazettes in English and in such other languages as the Local Governments think fit.

The Motion was put and agreed to.

The Council adjourned to Friday, the 4th March, 1892.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

In several provinces a general rate is already levied on estates under the Court of Wards, and is credited to Government to meet the estimated cost of supervision and management by Government officers. It is desirable to place the legality of these rates beyond doubt, and at the same time to limit their amount. It has been decided that other Local Governments should be empowered to levy similar rates, and that the rates should be leviable on all estates under Government management, and not merely on those under the Court of Wards.

Power has been given to the Local Governments to reduce or remit the rate in special cases. This provision is designed especially to meet cases in which Government officials are relieved of the supervision and management by the employment of special general managers.

Under section 4 of the Bill it is open to Local Governments either to charge special fees for legal advice and audit of accounts, where these services are rendered by Government officials, or to debit the contribution for these services to the general rate.

PHIL. P. HUTCHINS.

The 6th February, 1892.

S. HARVEY JAMES,
Secretary to the Government of India.

ATTEMPTS MADE IN BOMBAY TO EVADE THE INDIAN MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT, 1889. DURING 1890-91.

Summaries of a few of the important cases under the Act.

(1) Messrs. ——— imported eight cases of coloured satins per S. S. Singapore from France in July 1889. The satins were found to have been made up into rolls after the Chinese fashion and wrapped in paper similar to that which is used for wrapping China silks. To make the deception complete, each roll bore some writing in Chinese characters, as well as a stamp in an oval with the word "Longchong" in English. I held that there could be no possible doubt that the Chinese label was introduced with a view to make purchasers believe that the goods were of China manufacture, the intention of the importers being to pass off cheap European goods as more costly Chinese goods. A fine of Rs. 500 was imposed upon the importers, and the goods bearing a false trade description were confiscated, subject to redemption on payment of a further penalty of Rs. 500. Both fines were paid and the goods passed into town after the removal of the objectionable labels. The importers appealed to you against my decision, but you informed them that you saw no reason to reverse or modify the orders passed in the case. Messrs. ——— were not the only importers of French goods got up in imitation of Chinese goods. On my order being passed other importers of similar goods at once telegraphed to the manufacturers to stop further shipments. Goods of this description have not since been imported.

(2) Four cases of soap were imported by Messrs. ——— per S. S. Maria Theresa from Trieste in June 1889. It was found on examination that the boxes in which the soap was packed bore a false label in exact imitation of the registered trade mark of the well-known soapmakers, Messrs. A. F. Pears. The only alteration introduced was that, instead of A. F. Pears, the name Lyon and Adams, probably a fictitious firm, was introduced into the label. In another case of five packages of soap belonging to a native dealer imported in June 1889, for which the bill of entry was put in by a leading exchange bank, the small boxes of soap were found to bear counterfeit labels in imitation of Messrs. A. F. Pears' trade mark. In each case I imposed on the importers a fine of Rs. 500 and confiscated the goods subject to redemption on payment of further penalties of Rs. 500. In neither case were the goods redeemed. In the case of the exchange bank Government ordered the refund of the substantive penalty of Rs. 500, on the ground that, as they had no knowledge that the goods to which their bill of entry related bore a counterfeit trade mark, the bank could not be held to be concerned in any offence within the meaning of section 167, clause 8 of the Sea Customs Act. In the other case an appeal to you was rejected.

(3) Messrs. ——— & Co. imported from Trieste a case of shawls which bore a certain mark and a figure. There was no doubt that both the mark and the figure (714) were stitched on the shawls in imitation of similar marks always seen on Indian shawls with the object of inducing the public to believe the shawls were of Indian make. Attached to the shawls were printed paper labels showing they were made in Austria. But as these labels could be easily detached, they were held not to justify the false trade description stitched into the shawls. The importers were fined Rs. 100 and the shawls were ordered to be confiscated. Penalty in lieu of confiscation was fixed at Rs. 400, provided the stitched marks were removed. The importers unsuccessfully appealed against Mr. Winchester's order first to you and then to Government. The fine of Rs. 100 was paid. The shawls were not redeemed and were sold as confiscated goods. Before delivery to the purchasers, the objectionable marks were removed. The shawls were invoiced at 11s. 2d. per piece. A similar shawl of Indian manufacture costs Rs. 50 to Rs. 75.

(4) Of four cases of German broad cloth imported by Messrs. ——— & Co., each piece had in large gold letters the words "Extra fine broad cloth No. 60000:" on the reverse were the words "made in Germany." Besides being on the reverse, the words "made in Germany" were exceedingly indistinct and could be rubbed out with a wet finger. The cloth was confiscated.

Redemption was allowed on payment of a penalty of Rs. 200, provided either the false English indication of origin was removed, or the name of the country of origin was stamped in the same manner as the other words. On a representation from Messrs. ——— & Co., I declined to modify my order on the ground that the fact that a stamp "made in Germany" was impressed on the back of the cloth showed that the exporters were aware of the requirements of the Act, but had attempted to evade them by making an impression which could easily be rubbed out.

(5) Messrs. ——— imported from Hamburg two cases of euphoniums, value Rs. 318. As these musical instruments were of German manufacture and bore the words "Euphoniums, Regulator, Patent" which indicated British manufacture in the absence of any indication of German origin, they were confiscated. An option was given of redeeming them on payment of a fine of Rs. 20 conditional upon a statement of origin being properly stamped upon them. Re-shipment was allowed as an alternative to confiscation but was not availed of.

(6) Mr. ——— imported from Boulogne among other goods thirty dozen pocket books with calendars inside them headed "Calendar for 1891." In the absence of an indication of French manufacture the heading was held an indirect indication of British origin. A fine of Rs. 10 was imposed on the importers and the pocket books were declared confiscated, redemption being allowed on payment of a fine of Rs. 50, provided the country of origin was stamped on the books. An option of re-shipment was allowed in lieu of confiscation, but it was not availed of.

(7) Mr. ——— imported per S.S. May Field from Antwerp, a consignment of steel bars and bundles of steel stamped with a "goldmohur" brand in English without a definite indication of origin in that language as required by the Act. M. Monteath, then Collector, imposed a fine of Rs. 100 and confiscated the goods with an option of redemption for Rs. 500, provided the country of origin was added after each stamp of "gold mohur" or that stamp was removed. The penalties were instantly paid, but a representation was made to the Collector asking him to reconsider his orders and remit the penalties. The Collector, considering that the action of the manufacturers in this case was not such as entitled them to special consideration, regretted his inability to do so. He subsequently decided that the aforesaid fines should cover a number of consignments of steel bars of "gold mohur" brand already on their way.

(8) A case of woollen shawls was imported by Messrs. ——— per S. S. Clyde bearing two labels, on one of which appeared the name of "Mayer Bernhardt & Co, Hamburg," in English with an indication of origin "manufactured in Germany" in the same language. The name of "Mayer Bernhardt & Co.," with the omission of Hamburg, also appeared in Gujrathi and Baldodh characters without any indication of origin in those languages. On the other label were printed in two Indian languages descriptive expressions which in sense were the same as the English "all wool guaranteed." As all these expressions, with the exception of the first one, required a definite indication of origin to accompany them, the importers were fined in the sum of Rs 20 and the goods confiscated, with an option of redemption on payment of Rs 100 in lieu of confiscation, provided the labels were destroyed or on each label there was printed in all the characters used a distinct statement of origin. In this case the goods were passed on the removal of the objectionable labels.

(9) There were some importations of silver and gold lametta per S. S. Singapore from Marseilles. The reels in two cases bore an impression of the initials of E. C. Grammont. The letters E. C. G. were considered contrary to section 18, clause (e) of the Act. The importers were each fined Rs. 10, and the goods were confiscated, with an option of redemption on payment of a further penalty of Rs. 10. On representation that the stamping would entail excessive delay and trouble, the reels were allowed to be cleared without the name of the country of origin being stamped on them.

(10) Messrs. ——— imported per S. S. Peninsular from Boulogne two cases containing purses. In one case the purses had the word "Jubilee" printed on them in gold letters in English without any indication of origin in the same language. The other purses bore the Queen's head with the words "Victoria Regina Jubilee" without any indication of the country of origin. Mr. Monteath, then Collector, inflicted a fine of Rs. 20 and confiscated the purses with an option of redemption on payment of a further sum of Rs. 200, provided the country of origin was stamped on them. Re-shipment was offered as an alternative to confiscation.

(11) A consignment of five cases of steel files was imported by Messrs. ——— per S. S. Singapore from Marseilles. The wrappers of these files had three separate labels attached, one below the other. The first label purported to be a caution to the buyers in French and English against inferior imitations. The second distinctly showed "The Iron Steel and File Works Co., Limited, at Saut-du-Tarn, France" in the French and English languages with the registered trade mark. On the third label appeared in French and English the expression "Societe anonyme du Saut du Tarn"—"Refined cast steel flat pointed bastard files" So far as the labels went there was nothing which could be said to be in contravention of the Act. The files themselves bore on one side the registered trade mark and on the other in French "L. Talbot & Cie, Saut-du-Tarn" and just below this on the same level appeared the words "warranted cast steel." As "L. Talbot & Cie, Saut-du-Tarn" was not a definite indication of origin, a substantial fine of Rs. 20 was imposed by the Collector and the files were confiscated with an option of redemption on payment of a penalty of Rs. 100, provided an indication of origin was clearly stamped on them. As an alternative to confiscation re-shipment to the port of export was allowed. In this case Mr. Monteath noted, "the labels are, of course, unexceptionable, but as stated in other cases the important point where articles are ordinarily sold singly and bear marks is the mark on the articles themselves. Now, if one could read it, the stamp on the file "L. Talbot & Cie, Saut-du-Tarn" is no doubt a fair indication of origin, but I doubt if any body who had not seen the label could read it, and the stamp L. T. & Cie is still more illegible. On the other hand, the words "warranted cast steel" are very fairly legible. I have no hesitation, therefore, in holding that the files themselves contain a false indication of origin.

(12) In a consignment of two cases of cotton thread per S.S. Kangra from Antwerp the labels stated that the reels contained 200 yards each. On examination 14 of the 16 reels did not come up to 200 yards. After granting the one per cent allowance provided by Government of India's Notification No. 1118, dated the 13th August 1889, the average deficiency came to 8½ per cent. I imposed a fine of Rs. 25 and confiscated the goods with an option of redemption on payment of a further sum of Rs. 50, provided the false description was removed or a true description substituted. Subsequently, on representation, re-shipment to the place of export was allowed.

(13) Messrs. ——— imported a consignment of 13 cases of needles. The numerical quantity shown on the brown paper wrapper of each packet was "M" (mille). Counting showed in four packets deficiencies of 300, 300, 200, and 400 needles. The Collector imposed a penalty of Rs. 100 and the needles were passed on removal of the objectionable labels. Another consignment of five cases of needles was imported by ——— per S.S. Melpomene from Trieste. The labels on the tins containing the needles showed their number to be 10,000. Twenty-nine of these tins were examined and found on an average 400 needles short. The Collector ordered a fine of Rs. 5 to be imposed and the tins confiscated with an option of redemption for Rs. 500 or export to the place of shipment. Subsequently on payment of the substantive penalty, the needles were re-shipped to Trieste. Another consignment of five cases of needles was imported by the same firm per S.S. Peninsular from London. The bundles of needles, which were of German manufacture, had labels stamped on them, setting forth that they contained 10,000 needles. When opened and counted each bundle was found to contain only 9,500 or 500 short. A fine of Rs. 100 was imposed and the goods were confiscated with an option of redemption on payment of Rs. 100. The needles were finally allowed to be re-shipped to Hamburg in lieu of confiscation or payment of the redemption penalty.

(14) Messrs. ——— imported per S.S. Imperator from Trieste jewellery packed in fancy cases marked inside "warranted sterling silver." The indication of origin was printed on small paper labels on the outside of the cases. An order was passed confiscating the goods with an option of redemption on payment of Rs. 100 provided the country of origin was properly marked. As an alternative to confiscation, re-shipment was allowed.

(15) Messrs. ——— imported per S.S. Malwa from London two cases of Albert chains labelled "warranted best nickel silver." As nickel is not silver, the description seemed calculated to mislead the public. The chains were confiscated and a fine of Rs. 20 imposed. On reference the Commissioner held nickel silver was too well known a name to be likely to deceive. The penalties were accordingly remitted.

16. One case containing Albert chains was imported per S. S. Bengal from London by Messrs. ———. Attached to the chains small labels bore the words "aluminium gold." Aluminium is a recognised trade term for a particular metal. The question arose whether knowing that no gold enters into the composition of aluminium the Custom House were justified in allowing the chains to pass. As the question seemed doubtful, the chains were passed without penalty. The importer was warned to advise his consignors in England in future either to omit the word "gold" or to substitute "metal" for "gold."

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

DO I FORGET THEE?

BY THOMAS JOHN OUSELEY.

Go, in the summer when the morning breaketh,
And all-around is lulled midst placid light;
When the sweet tiny field-flower awaketh,
And softly sighs its perfume exquisite.
Behold the lark—up to the clear sky winging,
Trilling aloud his luscious free-born notes;
From his bright speckled breast the dew-drops flinging,
Away, away, till lost to sight, he floats.
Doth not the field-flower love the coming morning,
Unclosing every leaf to drink the light?
Doth not the lark's eye swell to meet the dawning,
His wings spread strong, to reach his airy height?
If flower and bird change not, why question me—
Do I forget thee?

Go, in the noon-tide, when the sun is gleaming,
To the deep forest—watch the panting deer
Under the trees umbrageous, watchful dreaming,
Tinnily starting at each sound they hear;
List to the thrush and the blackbird singing,
Whilst the calm breathing wind just rocks the leaves,
The emerald wood with melody is ringing,
As light with shade and music interweaves.
Do not the shy deer court the boughs o'ershading,
Their wide hot nostrils snuff the welcome bowers?
The songsters of the grove are serenading,
Each to its mate the joyful tidings pours:
If such as these change not, why question me—
Do I forget thee?

Go, in the evening—watch the streamlet flowing,
O'er pebbly banks, through green and velvet meads;
The sportive fish, in gold and silver glowing,
Plash in their crystal home as day recedes;
And mark the sun-flower, when the west is streaming
With rainbow clouds of light, as Sol retires,
Turneth its face to catch his last smile beaming,
Then bowing to its grave, the earth, expires.
Do not the sportive fish, when day's descending,
Leap to the streamlet's bosom in their play?
Doth not the sun-flower, faithful in its tending,
Linger to catch the last departing ray?
Beloved, if these change not, why question me—
Do I forget thee?

THE RAILWAY.

THE silent glen, the sunless stream,
To wandering boyhood dear,
And treasured still in many a dream,
They are no longer here;

A huge red mound of earth is thrown Across the glen so wild and lone,
The stream so cold and clear;
And lightning speed, and thundering sound,
Pass hourly o'er the unsightly mound.

Nor this alone—for many a mile,
Along that iron way,
No verdant banks or hedgerows smile
In summer's glory gay;
Thro' chasms that yawn as though the earth
Were rent in some strange mountain-birth,
Whose depth excludes the day,
We're borne away, at headlong pace,
To win from time the wearying race!

The wayside inn, the homelike air,
No longer tempts a guest
To taste its unpretending fare,
Or seek its welcome rest.
The prancing team—the merry horn—
The cool fresh road at early morn—
The coachman's ready jest;
All, all to distant dream-land gone,
While shrieking trains are hurrying on.

Yet greet we them with thankful hearts,
And eyes that own no tear,
'T is nothing now, the space which parts
The distant from the dear;
The wing that to her cherished nest
Bears home the bird's exulting breast,
Has found its rival here.
With speed like hers we too can haste,
The bliss of meeting hearts to taste.

For me, I gaze along the line
To watch the approaching train,
And deem it still, 'twixt me and mine,
A rude, but welcome chain
To bind us in a world, whose ties
Each passing hour to sever tries,
But here may try in vain;
To bring us near home many an art
Stern fate employs to keep apart.

Holloway's Pills.—Impurities of the Blood.—To ensure health it is absolutely necessary that the fluids and solids of the human body should be kept free from those impurities which are continually getting admission into the system by erroneous living, unwholesome atmosphere, or disordered stomach. The only safe and certain way to expel all impurities is to take Holloway's Pills, which have the power of cleansing the blood from all noxious matters, and at the same time removing any irregularities which their presence may have already produced in any organ. Holloway's Pills expel all humours which taint or impoverish the blood, which they purify and invigorate, and give general tone. They are applicable to all alike—young or old, robust or delicate.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

AMONG the deaths reported by the last mail, not the least noteworthy is that of a remarkable native of the British Isles. His life is well fitted to point a moral or adorn a tale. Of humble race and origin obscure, Tom, as he was called, succeeded, by dint of genius, aided by luck, to be one of the lions of the day. He was undoubtedly an interesting personality. Invested by Nature with the freedom of the City and the whole Metropolis, Citizen Tom never condescended to pay any taxes or rates. He was an inhabitant of the Government Place of London. He was of course a great politician. Residing in Downing Street, as tenant in fee of quarters right opposite to the official residence of the Prime Minister, he was known as well as appreciated by administrators, diplomats, generals and admirals, poets and men of science, artists and literary men. With statesmen he was specially intimate. Living day and night, for near a decade and a half, at the very centre of affairs, in the company of those who had had the making of England in their hands, with the leaders of both parties, he enjoyed the most magnificent opportunities for understanding public questions. But for a slight congenital physical deficiency, Sir Tom could have entered Parliament and undertaken the formation of a ministry. He died—as befitted the familiar of rulers and heroes—fighting. Attacked by the hereditary enemy, he met the aggression with a stout resistance, till he fell overpowered by odds.

Videre Canes; primusque Melampus,
Pamphagus et Dorceus, velox cum fratre Lycisca,
Ichnobatesque sagax, et villis Asbolus atris,
Nebrophonosque valens, et trux cum Lælape Theron,
Labros et Agriodos, et acutæ vocis Hylactor,
Quosque referre mora est. Ea turba, cupidine prædæ,
Quâ via difficilis, quâque est via nulla, sequuntur.
Heu famulos fugit, Ipse suos: clamare libebat,
Actæon Ego sum; dominum cognoscite vestrum;
Vellet abesse quidem, sed adest.

Brave Tom's fame never travelled to the East, and our stay-at-home readers may wonder at all this fuss about an unknown character. Accordingly, by way of authority, we subjoin one of the English notices selecting the most matter-of-fact of them:—

"For the past fourteen years a cat well known in the neighbourhood as 'Tom,' had taken up its abode in the sentry box opposite the Premier's official residence in Downing Street. He was a general favourite, and had been frequently noticed and petted by the late Lord Beaconsfield, Mr. Gladstone, the late Mr. W. H. Smith, Lord Salisbury, and the late Earl of Iddesleigh. On January 22, to the general grief of the inhabitants in the vicinity, it was set upon by two bull terriers, and after a brave fight was killed."

We hope Tom's bones have received honourable burial from his numerous ministerial friends. The place should be that very Downing Street, under the eaves of the sentry-box. Nor need they be at a loss or a suitable inscription. Who more worthy of the bad Latin and good sentiment of Siste viator! Heroem calcas!?

THE true cure for snake-bite is in demand in the same proportion as the bite is dreaded. Various are the remedies suggested and sometimes claimed as infallible. Meanwhile, the mortality continues unabated. The latest claimant of discovery in the line is Dr. Calmettes, a French physician now residing at Saigon, in Cochin China. This gentleman has informed M. Rochard, who has now reported it to the French Academy of Medicine, in Paris, that the subcutaneous injection of chloride of gold before apoplectic symptoms supervene, is a sure and infallible remedy against the venom of the bite of the deadly cobra di capello. The Doctor made several experiments, and all the results were of the most satisfactory character.

Such is the report of the Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph.

A SHILLING book without a title, says the Printers' Register, is one of the latest productions of the Leadenhall Press. Its attraction—or at least, interest—is enhanced by an offer of a prize of £100 to the one or more who succeed in guessing the title.

THEY have in San Francisco prepared a make-ready liquid to be used as a substitute for tissue paper. The preparation dries hard like India-rubber in a few seconds and is intended to bring out periods, even parts of letters, small lines, &c., where the pasting of thin or tissue paper is especially troublesome.

IN the Christmas number of the New England Magazine, Mr. W. B. Harte contributes a paper on Canadian journalism and journalism. He describes the newspapers in the Dominion generally as "a curious mixture of English and American methods," and, except in one or two instances, "destitute of all pretensions to literary merit."

THE following lines occur in the opening address of the Dublin Daily Independent, the new Parnellite organ:—

"Deprived of a journal now discredited beyond recovery by the most ungrateful and the meanest act of political and turncoat treachery in newspaper annals, and chafing under the grossest misrepresentations from the pen of the organ of scurrility and deadly treason to the unity of the Irish race and the martyred leader, our countrymen have awaited with eagerness the hour when a national mouthpiece would be at their service, one which they could in literal truthfulness call their own, and when they would, in capital and country, be no longer compelled to sit worse than dumb while their principles were travestied, their motives malignantly aspersed, and the programme and policy carried to the gate of victory by Charles Stewart Parnell, distorted and abandoned."

That is not writing so much as speaking—pouring a torrent of Irish eloquence. It certainly comes of the stumping habit.

ACCORDING to custom, the parishioners of the German village of Oldenburg deposited all their savings, their valuables and their bank-books, with their pastor. Herr Müller, in his vanity and ambition, speculated with the deposits, and, losing again and again, was driven to forging a cheque in the name of one of his depositors. At last, he decamped. He spent some days as a cattle-dealer, at a hotel in a neighbouring town. There at the table d'hôte one day, the fugitive parson being the talk, the cattle-dealer was naturally the loudest in indignation at such infamous conduct. He, however, soon quietly slipped out of the table and left the hotel. Not many hours afterwards, a detective came to the hotel, in search of Padre Müller. To the surprise of the guests, they recognised in the photograph he showed them their moral friend, the cattle dealer. As he had not had a long start, Müller was soon overtaken, and is now on his trial.

THE advance of knowledge in our day has not, as it was once the fashion to think, all made against traditional Faiths. While recent discoveries in Egyptian and Turkish archæology are supporting the historical credit of the Bible narratives, the energy and courage with which science is inquiring into obscure phenomena, are not only rescuing the Hindu Rishis from unjust detraction, but also arming the advocates of the Hindu Revival. For instance, we read in the English papers by the last mail of a modern Kumbhukarna:—

"A most peculiar case of prolonged sleep is at present occupying the attention of medical circles in Germany. A miner named Johann, Latus is at present an inmate of the hospital at Myslowitz, in Silesia where he was admitted four months and a half ago, and since then all efforts to wake him have been fruitless. Dr. Albers, the doctor attending him, is of opinion that the apparent sleep is really a state of catalepsy, though medical science has on record no previous case of such a prolonged nature. He has arrived at this conclusion on account of all the limbs being absolutely rigid. The appearance of the man, however, betrays no sign of this. The body lies quite still, the breathing is regular, and there is a healthy colour in the cheeks. In the last few days the body has become much less rigid, and the patient has even made some slight movement, without, however, the eyes opening or the condition of apparent sleep being in any way disturbed. In the four and a half months that the sleep has lasted the hair has increased in length, but the beard has remained stationary. Nourishment to the extent of two to three litres of milk is administered daily by a tube inserted into the throat."

Thus, quietly is Valmiki vindicated.

MR. Monmohun Ghose, of the Calcutta bar, is recruiting his health after his late illness, by shooting excursions into the Dighnagur jungles, in his own district of Kishnagur. The Chief Justice had been there and had marked a leopard which was unsuccessfully fired at by him. Mr. Ghose has, according to a correspondent in the Statesman, now killed that animal, and sent it by a special messenger to Sir Comer Petheram.

THE Bengal Times, we see, takes the same view with us of the taste of the interviewer of the Madras paper, who, in return for our distinguished Austrian visitor General A. Von Kodolitsch's frank opinion in favour of the Indian Army, and specially of the Cavalry, which he said was up to the standard of any of the Continental Powers, say, the French and Russians, pressed him for a declaration whether the Indian Irregulars could hold their own against the famous Austrian Cavalry. Our contemporary, in its unvarnished way, says—"What cads Madras papers must have on their staffs!"

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Labour question in Europe once more presses for immediate solution—this time on the continent. In Vienna, there is distress among thousands of the unemployed. The proprietors of a Socialist journal have taken them under their protection and are doling out bread daily to the starving.

In Berlin, on the 25th, several thousands, under the leadership of a noted Socialist, marched to the Imperial Palace demanding bread. It was no quiet march. There was a conflict with the Police—a conflict with swords on the one hand and sticks on the other. Several persons were injured and a number arrested. The rising was simultaneous in several parts of the city. Bands of the unemployed paraded the streets and looted the bakers' and butchers' shops. Troops were ordered to be ready, but not called. Next day, the Police dispersed fresh threatening mass meetings held in the centre of the city.

THE Labour demonstration was immediately preceded the day before by a stirring speech by the Emperor William at a banquet at Brandenburg. His Majesty deplored the attacks made on the Government and on the social reform agitation, and advised all malcontents to leave Germany for the good of the Fatherland, if not for their own. He looked to God for brighter days for Germany who, he was confident, would continue the ally of the Imperial House.

THE opposition against the Education Bill is now more than confirmed. The Emperor's speech at Brandenburg has united the whole of the Opposition against the measure and the Government.

In the Lower House of the Prussian Landtag, Count von Caprivi, on the 29th January, said:—

"The Government fully approved of the Education Bill, and regarded the fusion of the Freisinnige and National Liberals as a declaration of war by the latter against the Government. The Chancellor declared, however, that the Ministry was quite ready to dispense with the support of the National Liberals. The National Liberals, he said, wanted now to emphasize their Liberalism, as they did not seek to become National Conservatives. 'To allay their anxieties on one point,' exclaimed Count von Caprivi, 'I now declare that Prussia will vote in the Federal Council against the return of the Jesuits. The question before us is not one of Protestantism against Catholicism, but of Christianity against Atheism.' (At these words of the Chancellor's such a storm of protest broke forth from the Left that for several minutes he was unable to continue.) 'There is a spirit abroad which makes itself daily more and more felt, and which is peculiarly visible in the schools of Berlin—the spirit of Atheism.' (Protests from the Left.) With a purely moral education not founded on Christian principles we would have but little success with the children of the people. We have before us a struggle with the spirit of unbelief which is not necessarily identical with the social democracy. In face of this grave danger we desire, at least, to erect a barrier. Do not, I pray you, by agitation excite the masses, who are not capable of judging on this question. In face of this danger Germans will learn to live together in peace.' At the conclusion of the speech the House broke into an uproar of cheers and counter cheers, which lasted several minutes. The excitement was so intense that the words of the next speaker in support of the Bill were quite inaudible. Baron Zedlitz (Free Conservative) then said his party would work together for a compromise in the spirit of peace.

The sitting of Jan. 30 was less tumultuous than that of the 29th, and Chancellor Caprivi, who spoke twice, withdrew a great deal of what he had said that caused the excitement the day before, for the Left seem to have generally thought that he was calling them Atheists. Repeating his assertion that in the last resort the question was not one between Protestants and Catholics, but between Christianity and Atheism, he said he did not use these words with reference to the National Liberals or the Liberalists, but only to express his conviction that the question was not a superficial one."

THE anarchists of Paris are busy preparing for their Mayday demonstrations. A large quantity of dynamite has been abstracted from the Municipal quarries for use in other European capitals. A portion has already been despatched to Spain to avenge the recent execution of anarchists at Xeres. The police are keeping a close watch at the Spanish Embassy in Paris.

AN attempt on the life of M. Vulcovitch, the Bulgarian Agent, on the 25th, is reported from Constantinople. He was stabbed and seriously wounded by a hand still unknown. The Agent has since died.

M. ROUVIER who undertook to form a new French Ministry, M. de Freycinet having declined the task, has failed too owing to the hostility of the Radicals.

MARSHAL AHMED EYOUB conveys to Egypt the Sultan's firman, investing Prince Abbas as Khedive.

THE Indian Councils Bill has passed in the House of Lords and is in its second stage in the House of Commons. Mr. Macneill, Member for Donegal South, will move an amendment that no reform is acceptable to the people of India without the addition of the elective principle. Mere bunkum.

THE Indian Officers' Bill has passed through the Committee of the Lords. At the instance of Lord Northbrook, Lord Cross has agreed that the Bill will not apply to the Viceroy. The House divided on the amendment to exempt the Commander-in-Chief, which was rejected by a majority of seven. It was necessary, said Lord Salisbury, that in the event of the British and Indian armies being obliged to co-operate, the presence of the Indian Commander-in-Chief was essential for a previous personal consultation. All true, but who will prevent abuse?

AT a meeting of the Anti-Opium members of Parliament, held on the 23rd, under the presidency of Sir J. Pease, it was resolved not to introduce any special resolution in the House this session, but to seize every occasion to raise the question.

IN the House of Commons, on the 26th, Mr. Balfour, on notice, moved a resolution for the expulsion of Mr. DeCobain the member for Belfast East, inasmuch as he had fled from justice, which was adopted.

THE post-prandium eloquence of the German Emperor, on the 24th at Brandenburg, reported by telegraph, calls for a passing word. Like other foibles, sanctimoniousness and pharisaism too descend with blood. This young Prince is a chip of the Hohenzollern block and a grandson of his grandsire. He already speaks patronisingly of the Deity. We dare say he literally believes in the saying that Providence is the friend of the master of the strongest battalions. Otherwise, he could scarcely so glibly class God as an ally of his family.

HER Majesty has been fortunate in her very misfortunes. Through all her reverses she has been sustained by the spontaneous sympathy of the nation—of, indeed, all the nations and races under her wide and widely dispersed Dominions. She has been deeply impressed on this occasion and she has been naturally reminded of previous ones. The following, addressed through her Principal Secretary of State in the Home Department and published by that officer as a Special Supplement of the London Gazette, is the Queen's response to the demonstrations of sympathy by the people:—

"Osborne, Jan. 26, 1892.

"I must once again give expression to my deep sense of the loyalty and affectionate sympathy evinced by my subjects in every part of my Empire on an occasion more sad and tragical than any but one which has befallen me and mine, as well as the Nation. The overwhelming misfortune of my dearly loved Grandson having been thus suddenly cut off in the flower of his age, full of promise for the future, amiable and gentle, and endearing himself to all, renders it hard for his sorely-stricken Parents, his dear young Bride, and his fond Grandmother to bow in submission to the inscrutable decrees of Providence.

"The sympathy of millions, which has been so touchingly and visibly expressed, is deeply gratifying at such a time, and I wish, both in my own name and that of my children, to express, from my heart, my warm gratitude to all."

"These testimonies of sympathy with us, and appreciation of my dear Grandson, whom I loved as a son, and whose devotion to me was as great as that of a Son, will be a help and consolation to me and mine in our affliction.

"My bereavements during the last thirty years of my reign have indeed been heavy. Though the labours, anxieties, and responsibilities inseparable from my position have been great, yet it is my earnest prayer that God may continue to give me health and strength to work for the good and happiness of my dear country and Empire while life lasts.

"VICTORIA, R. 1."

That is queenly, and yet true womanly.

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.

It will be seen how a heart-rending bereavement sends the Queen back to our common humanity. Eschewing the stiff forms of expression imposed by etiquette, Her Majesty takes refuge in the first person singular. Thus, for the first time, she has the full advantage of her native tongue—that English language of which she is the mistress in every sense—and uses all its resources, whether Teutonic, Celtic, or classical, with thorough effect.

PREPARATORY to the General Election, the Marquis of Ripon, in his loyalty to the Grand Old Man and his zeal for the Cause, is stumping the country in the Liberal interest. He has lately been to Edinburgh. The handful of Indians studying at the Scotch capital, took advantage of the opportunity to ply the noble visitor with an address. In replying to it, his Lordship spoke with diplomatic reserve and moderation. As reported,

"Lord Ripon said that he did not desire to see the establishment of household suffrage throughout India, but what he did wish was that there should be infused into the Legislative Councils a reasonable proportion of the representative element which would enable educated Natives to make their voice heard in the government of the country."

That is a disappointment to our friends of the Congress. Certainly, an Under-Secretary from his place in the House could not have been more evasive or vague. Not the most sanguine among us could ever suppose even the good Marquis, Catholic Jacobin Lord and plutocrat as he is, capable of advocating a revolution in India, beginning all at once with household suffrage. But they certainly expected his Lordship to express in distinct terms his adhesion to the elective principle, and his readiness to secure them a large proportion of the boon.

GREAT Britain offered 12,000,000*l.* for the Portuguese territory south of Mozambique. Senhor Ferreira Almeida proposed in the Chamber of Deputies that a plebiscite of the administrative corporations of the kingdom be held on the question of the sale of the Portuguese colonies of Guinea, Whydah, Kabenda, Mozambique, Macao and Timor, and demanded urgency for his proposal, but this was unanimously rejected. Poor Lusitania is proud even in her rags.

THE appeal of the Englishman John Samuel Cooper, sentenced by the Court of St. Etienne, for espionage, to fifteen months' imprisonment and a fine of 3,000 frs., has not only failed but entailed on him a higher sentence. The Fourth Chamber of the Court of Appeal at Lyons, has enhanced the order for imprisonment to two years while confirming that for fine. Since Sir J. Fitz-James Stephen gallicized the British Law in India, the British Indian Courts enjoy the same cruel privilege with the French Courts of aggravating original sentences.

THE Austrian Chamber of Peers is engaged on a Bill granting indemnity to victims of miscarriage of justice. The House is unreservedly of opinion that the State ought to be compelled to afford ample compensation for judicial errors. Just as a railway company is answerable for an accident on its line, the Chamber believes that the State must be held responsible for a miscarriage of justice in criminal affairs. The Lower House has already adopted a similar measure.

Such a safe-guard is very much needed in India. The magistrates are protected by law but the victims of misapplied law have no remedy. Nor is there any disposition in Government to compensate, in however small a degree, for flagrant cases of hardship and persecution. Witness the rejection by the Bengal Government of the petition of Baboo Anand Chunder Roy, of the Dacca bar, for payment of his expenses in the Dacca bribery case. The matter, however, ought not to rest there. It must be pushed up. Anyhow, there must be a check on reckless persecution of the innocent under color of law.

IN noticing our article of last week "The Municipal Election Law of Calcutta. The Right of Voting of Individuals and Associations," the Statesman, says:—

"It might be a nice point, whether provisional registration was registration within the meaning of the law; and we should be inclined to think it was not."

There need not be any doubt in the matter. The law itself, while providing for provisional registration of the name of a person, says, "when his name is so provisionally registered he shall enjoy all the privileges and incur all the liabilities attaching to the owner of any house or land under this Act so long as no other person claims to be registered as owner."

AT Faridpur, they annually hold an Exhibition and Mela. The objects are: (1) to improve agriculture and to spread technical education; (2) to improve commerce; and (3) to cultivate social good feeling by arranging for a public gathering. The collections in 1899 amounted to Rs. 2,366, and in 1890, they were 2,183. The expenditure on prizes were Rs. 308 and Rs. 250 respectively for the two years. The balance was spent on jattras and nautches. Such is the account of a correspondent in the Statesman, who protests against the expenditure on amusements of money collected for improvement of agriculture as a breach of faith with the public. By his own shewing, though, public entertainment is one of the objects of the Exhibition. The pious scribe adjures the Mela Committee and local Zemindars to make "good use of the money contributed by the starving population of this district." Would "the starving population" contribute their quota of the fund, if there were no jattras or nautches—the singing and dancing to which this Quaker objects? The poor and the rich equally require amusements. It is only the senseless reformer who sees nothing good in jattras and other popular diversions. Those who think that money might be more usefully expended on more desirable, useful and lasting objects, do not know their own mind, far less the mind of the country on whose behalf they claim to speak.

THE case in which Mr. Earnest M. Baber, Deputy Superintendent of the Revenue Survey, and his cash-keeper, Bhagavatulu Suryanarayana Row, are charged with criminal breach of trust as public servants and abettors, closed at Bellary, on the 23rd instant, when the two accused were committed by the District Magistrate, Mr. R. Sewell, "for trial at the Madras Sessions. Mr. Baber reserved his defence, while the other accused contended that no case was proved against him.

There was no regular investigation, for the magistrate was unwilling to try his friend the Deputy Superintendent and had permission of the High Court to commit the case to the Sessions.

It appears from the evidence of Mr. H. O. C. Cardozo, the Superintendent of the Revenue Survey, that Mr. Baber is an impecunious official drawing a salary of Rs. 750 a month. He confessed to him that "I have done wrong—grievous wrong, and feel that it is right that I should be punished for the criminal offences I have committed. I make this full confession and throw myself on the mercy of Government, and trust that it will consider my long service of 24 years, and think of my unhappy wife and two children."

The defence of Mr. Baber in the Sessions Court will probably be insanity. We read in Mr. Cardozo's evidence:—

"Then I reported Mr. Baber to Government as untrustworthy. This was on January 13th. I said I thought that Mr. Baber was not of sound mind, and I had heard that there was insanity in his family. I am still of that opinion. The frauds were so easy of detection, and so certain to be detected, that I cannot conceive a man of sound mind resorting to them."

Mr. Baber had contemplated self-destruction and had armed himself for it. Mr. Cardozo deposed:—

"On the 30th, I took a statement from the Cash-keeper; while I was doing so, Mr. Baber came in. He began apologising for certain entries he had written. On his first arrival I had been stiff in my manner, but after his apologies I became more cordial and shook hands, and talked to him kindly and advised him to make a clean breast of everything. He was extremely agitated, cried and said 'you have saved me from taking my life.' I tried to calm him in various ways. When he got calm he said he was prepared to write everything. He begged to go home and tell his wife and then come back. I allowed him to go away. A few minutes later, Dr. Spencer came to me, asked whether I knew that Mr. Baber had the previous day bought a revolver and cartridges. We agreed to go to Mr. Baber's house and disarm him. We did so. Mr. Baber gave them up to us without objection, as also a rifle and cartridge. I also took away his razors as I was afraid he might commit suicide. Later on, in the afternoon, when I went to the office I found Mr. Baber with a concession written out. This I will put in when it arrives from Government. I have received a telegram saying they are being returned and ordering a prosecution. Meanwhile I put in a copy which I declare to be correct. In it Mr. Baber admits deliberate frauds and a series of them, in that he took money out of Government cash-chest for private purposes on several occasions, and misappropriated the sums so taken."

The Chief too, "acknowledged to have abetted Mr. Baber's misappropriation of Government money and to have falsified the accounts."

A CASE of deep interest to bankers and depositors has lately been concluded at Calcutta, with a conclusion, we are glad to be able to add, fully satisfactory to the public in general. The facts are few and plain. Radhajeetun Moustaphy sued, in the Original Side of the High Court, the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China, for Rs. 21,165, claiming the sum as balance of his deposit account. The Bank admitted its liability for Rs. 5,165 only and accounted for the balance Rs. 16,000 as paid to his account to his son-in-law on a cheque drawn by himself in favor of the son-in-law. To this portion of the defendant's allegation, the plaintiff demurred saying that on or about the 18th October, 1890, he signed a cheque written out by the son-in-law and dated the 16th December for Rs. 6,000, and that he did so under a threat of a dagger held over his head, that on the 24th following he stopped the payment of the cheque by his Calcutta agent, Uma Narain Sen and subsequently on the 6th November by a letter, that on the 7th November, he was informed by the Bank that he had been debited in his pass-book with a sum of Rs. 16,000 paid on the 24th October on his cheque to his son-in-law. The plaintiff contended that payment had been made after stoppage and the cheque altered by the son-in-law—the date to the 24th October and the amount in words and figures to Rs. 16,000 with initials not the plaintiff's. The Bank's pleas were that payment was made in due course, that payment was not stopped, and that if the cheque were altered, the plaintiff by his negligence and delay gave free scope to the son-in-law to deal with the cheque as he thought best. Mr. Justice Trevelyan gave judgment to the following effect:—

"I think there are in reality four questions before me.

1. Has the alteration in the date been proved to have been initialled by the plaintiff or is such proof unnecessary?

2. Is the Bank exempted from liability under the terms of Section 89 of the Negotiable Instruments Act?

[That section provides that when a cheque has been materially altered but does not appear to have been so altered, payment thereof by a banker liable to pay and paying the same according to the apparent tenor thereof at the time of payment and otherwise in due course, shall discharge such banker from all liability thereon, and such payment shall not be questioned by reason of the instrument having been altered.]

3. Has the Bank been guilty of negligence in paying the money?

4. Has the plaintiff contributed to the loss of the money?

It is not possible altogether to separate the consideration of these four questions. As to the first point I do not consider that it has been proved that the plaintiff initialled the alteration [evidence on the point examined.] Besides there being no evidence as to the initials being his, there is no evidence that they were placed there by his authority or with his consent. I must, therefore, find as a fact that the alteration in the date has not been initialled by the plaintiff, and was not made by his authority or in any way with his consent. I do not agree with Mr. Jackson's reading of Section 89 of the Act. It is clear from the cases that by the English law where a bill appears to have been altered or there are marks of erasure on it, the party seeking to enforce the instrument is bound to give evidence that it is not voided thereby. I am of opinion that the law is the same here, and I cannot see why the Bank should be entitled to debit the plaintiff's account with the amount paid by them. On this ground alone the plaintiff would be entitled to a decree, but I think it is necessary to make some further observations on the case. There is no doubt that 6,000 was altered to 16,000, and that the son-in-law's name was added after the cheque had been signed by the drawer, and there is not a particle of evidence on which I can infer that any of the alterations in the cheque were made with the plaintiff's consent. I do not, however, believe the plaintiff's story that the cheque was extorted at the point of the dagger. Other persons came in before he signed, so that he could have been in no personal danger, and his conduct afterwards was not that of a person who had been in bodily fear, for he never communicated with the police or took any other steps. I do not believe that the plaintiff's letters D. and E. are consistent with his story of a previous verbal stoppage of the cheque. Uma Narain Sen's story sounds improbable and his relations with the plaintiff are such that I cannot attach much weight to his evidence unless it is corroborated. I may assume that if Mr. Lindsay had been previously communicated with in the manner described by Uma Narain Sen he would have made the necessary entries in the books of the Bank. On the evidence, so far as I can make out the enquiries made before paying the cheque were not as to the alterations, but only as to the respectability of the presenter. The last question is whether the plaintiff has contributed to the loss of the money. I am not prepared to say that he has, but that he wrote to the Bank as soon as he discovered the alteration. As far as this cheque is concerned, there will be a decree in the plaintiff's favour for the sum of Rs. 21,165 with interest and costs."

THE INSPECTION FAD.

WE read with much interest a very good article in the Indian Daily News on the tour Resolution of Sir Charles Elliott. The veteran editor has made some sensible and practical remarks on the subject. It is all very well that a ruler should see the country over which he rules and acquaint himself with the details of the administration. Other Lieutenant-Governors also did something in the same direction in their own ways and according to their respective powers and abilities, and it must be admitted that they also knew their business and managed to obtain some knowledge about their own important charge. It is no doubt desirably expedient that important local questions and administrative problems should be discussed and decided on the spot, with the assistance of the head of the department and the parties concerned. At the same time, it is quite obvious that a Lieutenant-Governor can ill spare much of his most valuable time in inspecting petty details, such as registers of cases, fines, road cess, towjee and certificate, &c., and ask his highly paid secretaries to do the same sort of work. Can they inspect these offices more effectually and minutely, than district officers, canoongoes, &c., or the special officers of the department? Are they better acquainted with their details, their weak points, and their intricacies than these officers? Is it possible for them to inspect thoroughly and satisfactorily such voluminous records—the work of days and weeks—in a few hours? All these questions must be answered in the negative, by all experienced and sensible persons acquainted with the working of these departments. It is easy enough to criticize the work of others, to perceive its inadequacy, to discern its lacuna. Still easier for a superior to find fault with his subordinates if he incline to do so. Materials for the elaboration of a minute can be gathered in a few hours, nay, minutes, but to make a thorough and effective inspection requires much time and patience. Are these inspections worth the cost at which they are bought? If a district officer or his experienced deputy is allowed an opportunity to inspect the higher offices, he can find more faults in less time in those offices than it takes the Governor or his staff to overhaul these. What does the outside public know of the magnitude of the heavy ordinary and miscellaneous and multifarious work which nowadays devolves upon the subordinate native agency, and the stringent conditions under which they are called upon to perform their laborious and responsible duties?

The pressure on every department has increased tenfold within the last ten years and the more so within the last one year, so much so, indeed, that it is simply impossible for any human being to perform his share honestly. The District officers know full well what is the real state of things, and at what an illegitimate, not to say sinful, demand on their health and energy the present out-turn of work is exacted from the officers of all classes. If the rules laid down are strictly obeyed, it is impossible to get on one day with the current work, not to speak of the Begar—the novel and out-of-the-way burden which has increased out of all proportions.

It goes without saying that, in most districts, officers stay at court or in the office till 8 or 9 O'clock in the evening, sometimes till 10 O'clock at night, in order to discharge witnesses and dispose of cases or transact other work. Nor must it be supposed therefrom that they come late. Most of them commence work at 7 or 8 in the morning at their houses and leave it at court at 9 in the evening. That is, if ever they leave it, for they are doomed to dream it, as dream they must such absorbing occupation in their disturbed sleep. Microscopic prying into the performances of such galley-slaves is worse than madness—it is mere cruelty. How, under continuous labor from morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve, in a frame of mind and state of health better imagined than described, these unfortunate servants of the state are at all able to examine witnesses without the aid of a prosecutor and write out their decisions, is a marvel. But still they do it, and you can imagine at whose cost. If the quality of such work is found to be bad, none need be surprised. Officers saddled with all sorts of revenue, executive and miscellaneous duties, are at the same time judges, and they are again required to obey the stringent orders laid down in the recent circulars. Not even Treasury officers, Excise officers, are exempted from the burden of judicial work, although there are orders of the higher authorities to give them reasonable relief from it. It is under such circumstances that these inspections are being made by His Honor and his whole staff of Secretaries, besides the Commissioners, and yet it is expected that the work should be faultless—that no mistakes should be detected. The Governor has every power to enforce strict inspection by the District officers and the Divisional Commissioners and other officers, instead of taking so much personal trouble. In that way, the work would be much better and cheaply done and orders more strictly obeyed. If there is laxity in the supervision, as is thought, Sir Charles Elliott can make his orders obeyed and see that the district officers, Commissioners and special officers do their work of supervision and inspection more regularly and strictly. A Lieutenant-Governor has certainly power to make his orders obeyed by his officers.

There cannot be any just comparison between the quantity and quality of judicial work done by Deputy Magistrates and Covenanted Assistant or Joint-Magistrates. It is unjust to judge their capacity for such work by the result. The latter are never saddled with any kind of responsible and difficult revenue, executive, and miscellaneous burthen, nor are they, as a rule, placed in charge of the Treasury, Road-cess, certificates, land registration and other heavy departments, and so they can give their undivided attention to their judicial duties. The Deputy Magistrate, who is groaning under the heavy pressure of revenue and other functions, has to direct his attention to a dozen things and is interrupted in his judicial work every 5 or 6 minutes. Besides, he has, in most cases, to go through a larger amount of judicial business. If, under such disadvantages, the work of some is not equal to the work required of them, they are not to be blamed for it, but the system which handicaps them. In no civilized country, judges perform such miscellaneous and troublesome duties. With all this disadvantage, the Deputy-Magistrates are still doing well, and those who are required only to administer justice, (though they are a very few) have held their own up to this time with the Barrister, Covenanted and Statutory Civilian Magistrates, in the disposal of even the most difficult cases. If actually the Lieutenant-Governor wants to see the judicial work done promptly and thoroughly, he will not do any good by being hard on a valuable set of officers. Let him at least experimentally appoint one or two Deputy Magistrates (who have experience of, as well as taste for, judicial work) in each district, and give them only civil work, with that independence which Judges enjoy, and then he will see that they acquit themselves most creditably. Unless this is done, any number of circular orders will go for nothing, and the judicial work will not be done efficiently. This trial will cost nothing, only an executive order will do, and six months' trial will demonstrate the truth. In the same way, make some special revenue and executive Deputy-Collectors, like rent Munsifs, in each district, and we will never hear of embezzlements and defalcations of public money. This is the plain truth. They have made a good beginning in the Central Provinces. The system is sure to succeed. The suggestion made in this article is very simple and requires no expenditure or change of system at all. It is only based on the principle of a proper distribution of work.

LITERARY MANIPULATION AND MISAPPROPRIATION.

It is a pleasure to see one's self useful. Nothing gives a journalist greater satisfaction than to find himself quoted or followed by his brethren of the quill. We, for one, have, under God's blessing, often that satisfaction. But we confess we scarcely ever remember such a proof of appreciation of our humble labours as we have just received from a most respectable quarter in the South. The People's Friend is an excellent journal, whose vigour and independence have in these columns been repeatedly acknowledged. It is conducted not only with ability in the leaders and the occasional Notes, but also with attention to the smallest details, such as the selection of telegrams and extracts, the compression of news, the accuracy of the money-market intelligence, &c. Approbation from Sir Hubert Stanley is praise indeed, to be sure. Even implied patronage from such a quarter is comfort enough. Opening our Madras contemporary's issue of the 17th instant, we were not a little struck by a singular phenomenon of appreciation.

The best part—the professedly original part—of the paper, is virtually drawn from our journal. Beyond a single vague reference to "a Calcutta paper," there is no allusion to us. This is no new experience with us, our awkward name being usually shunned by our contemporaries, so we do not complain, content to see our labours valued. Although the name Reis and Rayyet does not occur once in our Southern brother's columns, we notice with pleasure that, out of the nineteen Editorial Notes in the People's Friend of the 17th February, as many as ten are echoes of, or are founded upon, our issue of the 6th February. This sort of ignoring of a distant brother whose services are so largely availed of, may be sharp, but is not always safe. The Nemesis of ingratitude is sure to overtake the astute wight, notwithstanding his too-cleverness-by-half. The writer has taken a good deal of pains to palm off as his own another's information, by compressing it or translating into his own language. But, in trying to avoid the rock of plagiarism, he has stranded himself on the shoal of inaccuracy and nonsense. Thus our article headed "Death of Æsculapius" has been reduced into a short paragraph announcing the death at Delhi of a worthy of Southren creation, called "Hakeem Mahomed Khan," author of an unknown Ilay-ul-Amraz, which "is considered a standard work among Hindu Hakeems, and is very widely studied." Hindu Hakeems are rare birds, whose standard works, if they at all depend upon any books, instead of picking up prescriptions from kind living physicians, cannot be of much account. The name given to the book is an obvious misnomer. Finally, there was no Hakeem Mahomed Khan at Delhi to speak of.

We pity the readers in the South who are supplied with this sort of information and who are expected to profit by it. They will doubtless take pains to treasure in their memory the glory of the famous Hakeem Mahomed Khan of famous Delhi town. We can hardly be expected to pity the Editor who, in appropriating our original information—the first and fullest notice of the great Delhi physician appearing in Reis and Rayyet—did not think it proper to thank us.

A still more shameful blunder occurs in another Editorial Note, which seeks to embody the substance of one of Mr. Skrine's letters on Vandalism in Upper India. "The Taj Mahal, that beautiful work of art in Delhi, has never been free from the hand of vandals," commences our contemporary, and complains

"how the fine marble is destroyed by apparently idle and illiterate soldiers, who are allowed to do what they like in the building in the absence of a proper curator. We think Government should do something to preserve one of the handsomest institutions in the whole of India."

The sentiment is unexceptionable, only the "facts" are astonishing. We suppose in the South the statement about the situation of the Taj may pass. Under any circumstances, the complaint in our columns, founded on Mr. Skrine's last letter to the Pioneer, referred specifically to the great Hall of Audience in Delhi and the Vandalism of the soldiery there.

We have no harsh feeling in the matter, the more so as we are accustomed to this sort of thing. We simply mention the matter in the way of business. We are bound to say that our Madras contemporary is by no means singular. This sort of sharp journalism is too much in vogue. We see our wit and wisdom (such as they are), our jokes and our original news, cribbed on all sides by contemporaries who stare at us with a fixed stare, as who should almost cry "stop thief!" There are no papers so systematically looted from as the Pioneer and the Civil and Military Gazette. A great many papers live in this way. From the practice of such papers, the word note has come to mean an unacknowledged "conveyance" from another source.

Nor does the evil exist in India only. "Dogberry," of the City Press, writes:—

"Under the heading of 'A Cool Piece of Plagiarism,' a morning newspaper recently exposed a case of piracy by another journal. But this is no solitary instance. In connection with the City Press I have ample evidence of the wholesale manner in which my paragraphs are pirated without the least acknowledgment. This practice will be exposed shortly if it is persisted in. If these attentions took the form of imitations I should feel flattered that my efforts to be readable had been so successful, but it is the piracy of my wares en bloc which I object to. Paragraphs in this column are purloined by London and other correspondents, and in some cases my paragraphs, like the children stolen by gipsies, are undressed and so disfigured that I scarcely know my child again in the garments in which it is trotted round the provinces. One of the most glaring and worst cases of indiscriminate 'appropriation' was an account of the career of Mr. Spurgeon, which appeared in the columns of the City Press. This matter was published by the Jersey Observer, whose editor had the impudence to set it up as a leading article, and a copy of the newspaper in question was forwarded to Mr. Spurgeon as evidence of the interest the paper had in his work."

THE DRESS QUESTION.

SIR Charles Elliott's prescription of a sort of black uniform for "blackmen," has caused an amusing sensation among the ministerial officers. This recipe bears apparent marks of that impatience and haste by which his treatment is usually characterized. It disavows the intention of prescribing any uniform for the Amla class, but all the same it has fixed a uniform for all. Even then it were some consolation, had that been a proper outfit. But it is, in fact, not quite suited generally to their position and means. Perhaps His Honor does not know what it would cost a suit of that kind and how ugly most of the lower classes of Amla would look in it. The selfish and exacting tailors, and the shrewd and businesslike Marwari and other cloth merchants, are not unaware of this order, and they have not failed to take advantage of it. Prices of black stuffs, such as alpaca, parametta and serge, have run up and the tailors have also increased their charges, to the great misfortune of these ill-paid class of public servants. Then they would each require two sets of clothes for the summer and the winter seasons, and the aggregate value of both (if a decent suit is required) would not be less than Rs. 40, or it may be a little more or less in some cases. The prices of these cloths have gone up in the local market and some poor officers are in great difficulty. There is no doubt that the head ministerial officers can afford the expense of this uniform and they should carry out the order without any grumbling. This will suit them and they would look more respectable and decent in it. But in the case of under-clerks, mohurrers and other officers of lower grades drawing very small pay, the order ought to be changed. Otherwise it would prove a great hardship to them. The principle is very good and there was great necessity for such an order, as things were going from bad to worse. I think in their case it would be quite sufficient for all purposes, if they are strictly ordered to wear chapkan or achkan of some decent cloth with pajamas and pagrees, care being taken that they are always clean. Ekharas and woollen shawls, during summer and winter respectively, would surely add to the importance and decency of their suit. This is I think all what is wanted. The old Amla used to have decent dhotis with long balabar chapkan and old fashioned pagrees of their own handiwork, and there is no reason to find fault with this outfit. The gazetted officers should also be directed to attend public offices and courts generally in decent and neat dress and not only on the occasion of His Honor's visits, when they may be seen going about begging and borrowing chogas and pagrees from friends, as they do not dare approach the Lieutenant-Governor in their nondescript English coats. It is expected that officers who draw a decent pay should at least devote a portion on this most important item of expenditure. I have seen offenders in this respect whose pay is sufficiently large. There are many among this class of men who have only two suits of clothes with which they commence service plus a shamla or pagree which lasts till they retire on pension. These two suits last as long as seven or eight years—a considerable time after they cease to be fit for decent use. This is attributed to the extreme regard for economy of the men. A Sub-Judge was summoned to attend a durbar in some station when the Prince of Wales visited it. The notice was very short and he was in a funk what to do, as his two or three old suits of clothes were all declared by me to have worn out and to be unfit for putting on on such an occasion. I managed to get him a suit very quickly prepared under special arrangement, according to my choice. Thus he got over the difficulty and thanked me very much.

I know it from my own experience that on many occasions in travelling and at public gatherings and places of amusement, that amount of attention and respect is not paid to some native officers to which they are entitled by virtue of their position. It is a general complaint among most of them that Railway employes, policemen, and Police officers and others are not always courteous to them. The complaint is true in a great measure, but the fault does not always lie with the men and officers of the Railway or the Police. In some cases, at any rate, the dresses of these respectable officers do not command any respect, but create contempt in the minds of those with whom they come in contact on such occasions. After they have been once insulted, it is vain to exact their right to respect and consideration. If you dress yourself decently and like a gentleman, you surely command respect of people of every class. No one can but respect a well-dressed person even if he is of a low position in life. On such occasions as I have described, no one enquires about your grade or title, nor are they engrossed on your forehead.

Dress has a wonderful effect upon a looker-on and on the public in general, and therefore all civilized nations are very particular about their dress. Take for instance an Arab or Moghal mendicant or loafer, and you will always find him in a respectable-looking attire and therefore always protected against the ill-treatment of the durwans of wealthy native gentlemen with whom they have to deal. In the case of a respectable and educated person, it is essentially necessary that he should dress well and in such a way as to benefit his position and income. If a man knows to dress, he can dress decently and even economically. The combined impression of dress and features is most marvellous, and many people in high positions cannot forget their first impression and adhere to it to the last.

When our youngmen are so mad after so-called Western civilization and boast so much of their English education, they ought to show practically that they have at least learnt to dress and to eat in a civilized manner, either according to the standard of Eastern or to that of Western civilization.

There are some officers who long very much to dress in English costume, but they are at the same time afraid of offending some old class English officials, who do not like native officers dressed as Europeans. These men in fact have no fixed dress nor is their dress based on any principle. They make a mixture of both native and European elements and look most ludicrous in it. If they had only the moral courage to appear in pure and proper European garb, I think they would have conveyed a better impression even upon those to please whom is their first care. I do not think sensible European officers like that sort of mixture which is good for nothing.

AN OBSERVER.

THE BENGALI PATRIOTS' MEETING FOR BEHAR.

IN the interests of "the rayyets of Hajeeapore, who had urged the Indian Association to use its influence to avert the carrying-out of the proposed Cadastral Survey in Behar," that Association held, on Tuesday last, in the Town Hall of this city, a public meeting to protest against that Survey. Mr. Lalmohun Ghose, barrister-at-law, not arriving in time, the chair was taken by another oratorical gun, Baboo Kally Churn Banerjee. The speaking was, for the most part, confined to the Secretary, Baboo Surendranath Banerjee. Mr. Ghose also spoke. The meeting recorded "its respectful but firm protest against the proposed Cadastral Survey in Behar, as being disastrous to the interests of the peasantry in that part of the country, inasmuch as the Cadastral Survey would tend to impoverish the people by fostering litigation, and, by the imposition of fresh burdens upon them, create discord between Zemindars and rayyets, and, in general, cause great harassment to the people, by the planting in their midst of a set of petty officials, at whose mercy they would be placed, even in regard to the record of their rights."

That is a singular statement, seeming something and being something else. The Resolution sounds at a distance like an angry blast, but on closer auscultation the storm subsides in a gentle hiss. At first sight, our friends manage to startle the public with the bugbear of the Cadastral Survey. But that is for a moment. Soon the apparition fades into thin air. So far as we could judge, they met to protest against a serious if not a shocking measure of ruin and discord, which could not fail to impoverish the people and cause a lamentable breach between landlord and tenant, and, above all, leave the people at the mercy of the worst description of petty officials. Did they make such a protest? They made-believe, to be sure. They complain of a measure which was rather in an evil direction. Their objection to the Survey is confessedly founded on a fear that it would tend to impoverish the people by fostering litigation, and, in some other mysterious way, tend to create discord between Zemindars and rayyets, and generally, by the planting in their midst of a set of petty officials, tend to cause great harassment to the people. That is rather a poor complaint, which scarcely justifies so much ado. Surely it were more to the purpose to attribute without reservation or hesitation serious consequences to the proposed Survey, instead of merely a tendency in the direction of those consequences. The poor peasantry of Hajeeapore, if they have any existence beyond the imagination, may well complain of the advocating Association whittling down their grievance.

That ludicrous result may be due to imperspicuity of language. But another difficulty seems to show imperspicacity. We wonder how the speakers on the Resolution made out that the Survey, besides tending to impoverish the people by fostering litigation, would also, "by the imposition of fresh burdens upon them, create"—or even tend to create—"discord between Zemindars and rayyets." The Cadastral Survey is not exactly a taxation Act. As regards the cost, it will be provided and levied by Government and there will be little room for misunderstanding. It will certainly not open any door to cesses and exactions.

The Association's response to the requisition of the Hajeeapore husbandmen, stamps it as a professional organ for agitation. The promoters seem to have felt that a meeting held under such circumstances had no proper bottom. Babu Surendranath Banerjee, therefore, tried to strengthen their position by letting the public, apologetically though, into confidence.

The Baboo's sympathy for Behar, as he himself suggested, was the outcome of the National Congress. "The National Congress," said he, "would have been started in vain if such sympathy was an impossibility." The next bond of union between Bengal and Behar, according to Baboo Banerjee, and "the strongest point in his contention, was that the Bengal Tenancy Act applies to Behar as well as to Bengal, and if it is found that it is good under the conditions of that Act to introduce the survey into Behar, it will not be long before very plausible argument will be found to justify the extension of the Cadastral Survey to Bengal." This foresight is commendable, but the question is—Is the Cadastral Survey ordered for Behar under the Bengal Tenancy Act? He was not disposed to place much reliance on the assurance that the Survey would not be extended to Bengal. "It was unnecessary to detail the long record of broken pledges and promises unfulfilled which could be urged against the Government of this Country"—the present Government always excepted. "He did not intend any disrespect to the present ruler of Bengal. Personally he had the highest respect for Sir Charles Elliott, and was happy to bear testimony to the great energy, personal official supervision, and obvious sincerity in his desires to promote the welfare of the people which had hitherto distinguished his administration."

Mr. Ghose laid stress on the inopportune of the Survey while scarcity threatens the Province and on the "evils of letting loose upon the people hordes of those harpies known as ameens, to whose blood-sucking demands the peasantry would have to submit." He was unwilling that dannias and even members of his own profession would profit by the litigation which is sure to follow the Survey operations to the injury of both the landlord and the tenant.

The Chairman was not satisfied that the Government scheme "contained all the elements of a great boon." Like a politician and lawyer he justly contended that "it must be conclusively proved that the boon is a necessity, and that those upon whom it is conferred may have no occasion to cry out 'save us from such philanthropy!'"

All that is good. But this sort of meeting by men ready for any agitation, is not likely to carry any weight—unless at a distance.

STORES.

No. 1 (Financial), dated 7th January 1892.

From—The Secretary of State for India, to the Govt. of India.

I have considered in Council your letter, dated the 28th of July 1891, transmitting the returns of expenditure in India on stores for the year 1888-89.

2. I observe with pleasure that the proportion of stores manufactured in India continues to increase, but it appears that in some cases articles made in Europe have been treated as if they had been made in India. Care should be taken that all stores included in the column "Stores manufactured in India and substituted for Imported Stores" are bonâ fide manufactured in India, as otherwise these annual returns will not serve any useful purpose.

3. According to the return furnished by the Indo-European Telegraph Department, guttapercha cable was purchased in India for Rs. 99,998, and it is estimated that it would have cost Rs. 1,89,709 had it been procured through this office. This discrepancy is so great that I request that copies of the specifications to which these cables were made may be sent home as they may be of service to the Store Department.

4. A report (dated 3rd December 1891) by the Director General of Stores on some of the purchases made in India is enclosed, and the necessary communications on the points raised therein should be made by you to the Departments concerned.

5. In my despatch dated the 6th of November 1890, No. 27 (Financial--Stores), I conveyed my approval of your decision that European stores should not be purchased in India merely to avoid the lapse of a grant, and I trust that this ruling will be strictly and generally applied.

Report by Director General of Stores, dated 3rd December 1891.

With reference to the annexed India Finance and Commerce letter, No. 200 of 28th July 1891, forwarding returns showing the expenditure on stores for the year 1888-89, the tabulated statement in paragraph 2 shows a satisfactory reduction in the value of imported stores purchased in India, the decrease being steady during the last three years and very considerable in the year in question. Omitting malt liquor, there is, as pointed out in the same paragraph, a growing increase in the amount expended on stores manufactured in India and substituted for imported stores.

The total expenditure on stores in 1888-89 is considerably less than in 1887-88, so that the extended use of native products is greater than might at first appear. The proportion which the expenditure on local products bears to the total expenditure of the last three years is as under :—

	Total Expenditure.	Expenditure on local products.	Percentage.
1886-87	4,40,62,716	67,71,757	About 15
1887-88	3,80,55,201	82,17,380	" 22
1888-89	3,08,97,065	81,37,988	" 26

The additional information referred to in paragraph 3 of the India letter and now furnished for the first time has added to the value of the returns. It is noticed, however, that the information is not given in all the returns.

With reference to paragraphs 4 and 5, it is satisfactory to note that the Governments of Bengal and the Punjab have been addressed by the Government of India relative to large local purchases of imported stores and cautioned accordingly.

Turning to the abstract the items which call for remark appear to be the following :—

Cannas, Chemicals, Drugs and Medicines, Cotton, Linen, and Silk goods, India Rubber goods, Paper and Pasteboard, Printing and Lithographic materials, Stationery and other stores not specified.—All show a reduction in the value of imported stores supplied by this office (column 2) and purchased in India (column 3), and an increase in the utilization of stores produced locally (column 4).

Cordage and Rope.—The value in columns 2 and 3 is largely increased whilst that in column 4 is reduced. India is prolific in suitable fibres for cordage and rope, and has several steam factories. It is thought, therefore, that local manufactures might supplant imported cordage and rope to a greater extent than is shown.

Leather and Manufactures of leather, and Wood, Articles of.—Show an increase of over 100 per cent. in the value of imported stores purchased in India.

Machinery and Tools and Plant.—Show a considerable diminution in the value of imported stores purchased in India, and, apparently therefore, a closer adherence to the regulations.

METALS—

Brass.—The value of imported brass purchased in India in 1888-89 was more than four times that of 1887-88.

Iron.—The value of importations, still high, has steadily decreased during the three years shown in the abstract. It is noted, however, that the value of the local products also shows a decrease on the year 1887-88.

The following remarks apply to the individual returns :

No. 5, Hyderabad.—This Department purchased locally pipes of European manufacture to the value of Rs. 22,887, and furnishes no explanation.

No. 8, Bengal.—It is thought that many of the items on pages 12 to 50 should have been entered in Part 2 instead of Part 3, as some of them are evidently not made in India and the great majority are similar to supplies obtained from makers of scientific and educational instruments in Europe. If it should happen that these should belong to Part 2, it would be of interest to know, for comparison, how the English rates were obtained. If taken from maker's catalogues, it should be borne in mind that these prices are subject to discount, as is the case when such purchases are made by this office.

The same return shows in Part II the purchase of a Carter's Disintegrator, Printing, Sewing, and Weighing Machinery, and 7,000 yards of serge, but affords no explanation. Large purchases of iron are also shown in the same part.

No. 10, Madras.—Shows under Part III the purchase of iron safes to the value of Rs. 12,345. It is presumed that these were of bona fide local make; but it may be well to observe that several of the large English makers have active agents in India.

No. 13, Bombay Mint.—A considerable loss has been incurred by the purchase in India of coke at Rs. 41-7 and Rs. 45 per ton as against the estimated cost (Rs. 30-6-1 per ton) if obtained through this office.

No. 15, Mathematical Instrument Department.—This Department furnishes no explanation of numerous purchases in India of European stores at prices in excess of those paid by this office. It seems desirable that explanation of such departures from the regulations should be furnished in future.

Nos. 22 to 35, Military and Marine Departments.—The returns of Military and Marine Expenditure are dealt with separately.

No. 37, Indo-European Telegraph Department.—Shows that gutta-percha cable of the estimated cost of Rs. 1,89,709, if obtained through this office, was made in India for Rs. 99,998. It is considered desirable that copies of the specifications to which these cables were made should be sent home, as it is thought that they may be of service.

No. 39, Madras Public Works Department.—This Department purchased iron and steel at an estimated loss of Rs. 3,880. As pointed out in my report of 8th November 1890, it would be advisable to obtain future supplies through the Secretary of State. It also purchased two portable steam engines at an estimated loss of Rs. 1,100, but affords no explanation.

No. 40, Rajputana Public Works Department.—Shows the purchase of eight conservancy carts of European make. It is thought that carts of local make might have been substituted. It is understood that they might be procured in Bombay and in Cawnpore or its neighbourhood.

No. 44, Hyderabad Public Works Department.—The value of European stores purchased in India exceeds the combined value of the stores supplied by this office and those made in India. Large purchases of European pipes and metals are shown.

No. 49, Central Provinces Public Works Department.—The letter (No. 103—8278, dated 22nd November 1889) from the Secretary to Chief Commissioner attached to this return, states that iron pipes to the value of Rs. 4,156, shown in the column of stores made in India, were purchased locally, as Messrs. Macfarlane & Co.'s agent was at hand to give advice and assistance, and as there would have been difficulty in sending home the necessary explanatory drawings. Apart from the question whether this explanation can be considered as entirely satisfactory, it would appear that the pipes should have been shown in the column referring to local purchase of European stores, the Messrs. Macfarlane & Co. referred to being apparently a Glasgow firm.

No. 51, Military Works Department.—Large local purchases of European stores which are explained as being necessary to meet urgent requirements and avoid lapse of grants.

Some of the railway returns show considerable local purchases of European stores which, however, are, except in the case of the North-Western Railway, explained. The attention of the Manager of this railway might be drawn to the omission.

Looking at the returns generally it is found that the reasons given for local purchases of European stores are urgency and a desire to avoid lapse of grants. With regard to the former of these reasons, it is thought that demands by telegram, where necessary, might considerably obviate the necessity for such purchases. With regard to the desire to avoid lapse of grants, it will be seen from the enclosures to India Finance and Commerce letter No. 234 of 5th August 1890, annexed, that the Government of India has ruled that this is not an adequate reason for infringing the regulations.

CHARGES AGAINST MR. P. C. WHEELER, C. S.

RESOLUTION NO. 37611—458B OF 1892.

Appointment Department.

Dated Allahabad, the 9th February 1892.

READ—

(1) Letter from the Officiating Registrar, High Court of Judicature for the North-Western Provinces, No. 29, dated 7th January 1892, to the address of the Chief Secretary to Government, North-Western Provinces and Oudh with enclosures.

(2) Letter No 139, dated 12th January 1892 from the Chief Secretary to Government, North-Western Provinces and Oudh to the Secretary, Government of India, Home Department.

(3) Letter No 147, dated 26th January 1892, from the Secretary to Government of India, Home Department to the Chief Secretary to Government, North-Western Provinces and Oudh.

Observations.—On 23rd December 1891, the High Court of Judicature Allahabad, pronounced judgment in the case of Queen Empress versus Debi Proshad. The case came before the Court on appeal by Debi Proshad, a Sub-inspector of Police, who had been convicted on 21st October 1891 by the Sessions Judge of Jaunpore of offences under sections 167 and 218 Indian Penal Code and had been sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment on each conviction.

2. In disposing of the appeal the Honorable Judges (the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Straight) remarked on the absence from the record of any judgment of the Sessions Court observing that the Officiating Sessions Judge (Mr. Percy Cotterill Wheeler) had stated that he did in fact write a judgment of considerable length, that he did in fact deliver the judgment in open Court, but that he had taken it back to his house and that in some unaccountable way it had, with the exception of the first sheet, been lost. The Chief Justice proceeded: "I am bound to say and I say it with considerable pain because it involves a severe criticism on the procedure and statement of the Sessions Judge that I do not believe that any judgment was read out or delivered by the Sessions Judge on the 21st October, nor do I believe that the Sessions Judge even wrote the judgment as he stated he did."

In these remarks Mr. Justice Straight concurred.

3. The judgment of the High Court was reported in the newspaper press of the following day and in this way on Christmas Day came to the notice of Mr. P. C. Wheeler. On the same day Mr. Wheeler wrote and telegraphed to Government denying with indignation the truth of the imputation made against him announcing his intention to file an affidavit and appealing to the Lieutenant-Governor instantly to appoint a Commission to inquire into the truth of the charge.

4. On receipt of this letter, and before taking it into further consideration, the Lieutenant-Governor communicated it to the Hon'ble Court, with a request that the Court would inform him of the circumstances which led the Hon'ble the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Straight to record the remarks referred to by Mr. Wheeler.

5. The reply of the Hon'ble Court is the letter quoted at the head of this resolution. With that letter were forwarded to Government among other papers copies of the judgment of the High Court of 23rd December and of the report by Mr. Justice Straight giving the result of his inspection of the office of the Officiating District and Sessions Judge, Jaunpore. It was stated that the Hon'ble Judges unanimously agreed in all the opinions expressed by Mr. Justice Straight in his report.

6. On a careful consideration of these papers and after such further investigation as seemed necessary the Lieutenant-Governor and Chief Commissioner is of opinion that in the terms of Act XXXVII of 1850, a formal and public inquiry should be made into the truth of the imputations of misbehaviour contained in the judgment of the High Court and in the inspection report of Mr. Justice Straight. In no other way can an opportunity be given to Mr. Wheeler to disprove, if possible, the charges made against him. It is necessary in the present case, as the inquiry will be regulated by the above Act, that the prosecution be conducted by and on behalf of Government.

7. The following appear to be the facts connected with the imputations made :—

Debi Proshad was committed to Mr. Wheeler's Court on 11th March 1891. His trial commenced on 5th May and was completed on 27th July. On the 21st October he was convicted and sentenced. On the same day and before the rising of the Court an application was made by the prisoner for a copy of the judgment and an order was passed that it should be given.

On 13th November application was made to the High Court on behalf of the prisoner by Durga Churn Bannerji, his Vakil, that the prisoner should be admitted to bail pending the decision of the appeal. This application was supported by an affidavit of Durga Proshad, brother of Debi Proshad, to the effect that copy of the judgment had not been obtained and that he had been informed by Lala Raj Kishore, Pleader, that the Judge had stated in Court on 10th November that the judgment was not complete.

On this Mr. Justice Knox passed an order dated 13th November that the accused should be admitted to bail and the Judge was directed if he had not already done so to grant a copy of the judgment immediately. Again on 23rd November on the application of Debi Proshad supported by an affidavit that he had been unable to obtain copy of the judgment, the Chief Justice admitted the appeal and ordered that the Sessions Judge should report forthwith why copy of the judgment had not been delivered and the cause or causes of the delay.

On 16th December Mr. Justice Straight at the request of the Judges of the High Court visited Jaunpore and up to that date neither had a copy of the judgment been given to the applicant nor had any explanation been offered as to the cause of the delay.

In the course of the interview between Mr. Justice Straight and Mr. Wheeler the latter stated that he had written the judgment before delivery and that at the time of delivery he had signed and dated the judgment in open Court.

He stated that he had, after doing so, taken the judgment back to his house and that though he had made diligent search he had been unable to find it.

He offered no explanation to Mr. Justice Straight's inquiry as to why having dated signed and delivered his judgment he took it back to his house when the official to whom it would ordinarily be handed was present in Court.

8. A further imputation of misbehaviour is contained in Mr. Justice Straight's report, namely, that "when an application was made to Mr. Wheeler to execute a decree against himself he dealt with it in a way that he could not have done had the decree been against a stranger."

The facts connected with this imputation appear to be as follows :—

On the 25th May 1891 the Subordinate Judge of Mirut, on the application of the decree-holder, the Bank of Upper India, transferred to Jaunpore for execution a decree against Mr. P. C. Wheeler for Rs. 6,755-12-0. The papers referred to in section 224 Civil Procedure Code were made over to the decree-holder's agent who himself went to Jaunpore and on or about 9th June, presented an application for execution of the decree to Mr. Wheeler as District Judge in open Court. With this application the papers referred to in section 224 Civil Procedure Code, were presented and the relief asked was attachment of half the salary of the judgment-debtor. On receipt of the application for execution Mr. Wheeler informed his Peshkar that the necessary orders would be subsequently issued and took the application together with the papers specified in section 224 Civil Procedure Code to his house. Mr. Wheeler then placed himself in communication with the decree-holder with the object of settling the decree out of Court. He failed to cause the papers received under section 224 Civil Procedure Code to be filed and to cause a note of the application for the execution of the decree to be made in the prescribed register. Moreover he removed the application and the papers specified in section 224 Civil Procedure Code so that they are not now to be found in the Judge's Office and no order has been passed on the application.

9. In accordance with section 2, Act XXXVII of 1850 the substance of the above imputations has been drawn into the following distinct articles of charge :—

(1) That when on 21st October 1891, Mr. Wheeler convicted and sentenced Debi Proshad to imprisonment in the case of Queen Empress v Debi Proshad he had not written a judgment in that case as prescribed by the Code of Criminal Procedure.

(2) That Mr. Wheeler falsely stated to the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Straight on 16th December 1891 that he had written a judgment in the case of Queen Empress v Debi Proshad prior to convicting and sentencing the accused.

(3) That when, on 21st October 1891, Mr. Wheeler convicted and sentenced Debi Proshad to imprisonment in the case of Queen Empress v Debi Proshad, he did not deliver sign and date any judgment as prescribed by the Code of Criminal Procedure.

(4) That Mr. Wheeler falsely stated to the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Straight on 16th December 1891 that he did deliver sign and date a judgment in the case of Queen Empress v Debi Proshad when he convicted and sentenced the accused on 21st October 1891.

(5) That on or about 9th June 1891, Mr. Wheeler did not follow the procedure prescribed [by section 38 of the Civil Courts Act of 1877, or] by Section 245 Code of Civil Procedure in the matter of an application presented to him in his capacity of District Judge by the agent of the decreeholder for the execution of a decree held by the Bank of Upper India against P. C. Wheeler; that he passed no order regarding this application up to the time that he made over the office of District Judge of Jaunpore to his successor; that he did not cause the papers referred to in Section 224 Code of Civil Procedure which were presented to him with the above application to be filed as required by Section 225 Code of Civil Procedure; and further, that he improperly removed from the Court the above documents, viz., the application for execution of decree and the papers referred to in Section 224 Code of Civil Procedure.

10. The Lieutenant-Governor and Chief Commissioner is pleased to order under Section 2, Act XXXVII of 1850 that a formal and public inquiry be made into the truth of the above charges.

11. The Lieutenant Governor and Chief Commissioner is further pleased under Section 3, Act XXXVII of 1850, to commit the inquiry to a Commission composed of the following members :—

Mr. W. Kaye, Member of the Board of Revenue. Mr. M. S. Howell, Additional Judicial Commissioner, Oudh.

12. Mr. Kaye is the senior Civilian in these Provinces employed under this Government otherwise than in the Judicial line. In lieu of Mr. Howell, the Lieutenant-Governor had intended to nominate Mr. W. R. Burkitt, Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, the senior Judicial authority in that Province, but has not done so because the proceedings out of which the present charges against Mr. Wheeler have arisen had come before Mr. Burkitt judicially when Judge of Jaunpore.

13. The Lieutenant-Governor and Chief Commissioner is further pleased, under Section 4, Act XXXVII of 1850, to nominate Mr. A. H. S. Reid, Barrister-at-law, as the person to conduct the prosecution before the Commission on behalf of Government. Mr. Reid will be assisted and advised by the Legal Remembrancer to Government.

Order.—Ordered that a copy of this Resolution be forwarded for information and guidance to Mr. W. Kaye and Mr. M. S. Howell, Members of the Commission, and to Mr. A. H. S. Reid and also to the Legal Remembrancer.

Ordered, further, that a copy be forwarded to Mr. P. C. Wheeler for information.

Ordered, also, that a copy be forwarded to the Secretary to the Government of India in the Home Department, and that this Resolution be published in the Government Gazette.

By order, &c.,
J. D. LATOUCHE,
Offg. Chief Secretary.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

SONNET

ON CHARLES LAMB LEADING HIS SISTER TO THE ASYLUM.

By the Rev. C. V. Legrice.

An angel's wing is wavering o'er their head,
While they, the brother and the sister, walk,
Nor dare, as heedless of its fanning, talk
Of woes which are not buried with the dead.

Hand clasped in hand they move; adown their cheek,
From the full heart-spring, tears o'erflowing gush;
Close and more close they clasp, as if to speak
Would wake the sorrows which they seek to hush.

Down to the mansion slow their footsteps bend,
Where blank despair is soothed by mercy's spell,
Pausing in momentary prayer to send
Ere the cheered sister passes to her cell,
Sure in the hope that yet there will be given
Calm and sweet hours of peace—foretastes of heaven.

A SUN-SET SONG.

When hope and joy have made me blest,
When she I love, in some lone dell,
Hiding her head upon my breast,
Half whispering, owns she loves me well,
Then, as I go, I'll gaze upon the west,
And watch the glowing sun go down to rest;
A lover lingering on the western groves,
Full loth to leave the earthly nymph he loves.

When prison walls enclose me quite,
And long duress my fate appears;
When changeless day succeeds long night,
A dreary lengthening chain of years;
Then, warder, let me gaze upon the west,
And watch the troubled sun go down to rest;
A sad-eyed king, with frowning guards borne on,
Defeated, wounded, and his kingdom gone.

When life's dark sands have run so low,
That men may count what few remain;
When my rapt soul is fain to go,
And when to breathe is toil and pain:
Turn me once more, O turn me to the west,
And let me see the sun go down to rest;
A weary wanderer, homeward bound at last,
But softly, sadly, smiling on the past.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE new Khedive Abbas inaugurated his accession by remission of the unexpired terms of the punishment of five exiles banished for their share in Arabi's rebellion. But the leader of that rebellion—Arabi himself—must pine in exile. His enlargement is perhaps above His Highness. We hope the conscience of England will awake to the grievous wrong before it is too late.

THE largest iron-clad in the world—the Rurik—has just been completed in the Russian naval dockyards. She will shortly be launched, and two more ironclads—one of 8,800 tons and the other of 10,960 tons will be put on the stocks. The dockyard of the Black Sea is engaged on three powerful ironclads—the Twelve Apostles, 12,480 tons; the St. George, 10,280 tons; and the Three Saints, tonnage unspecified. They are evidently intended to preach peace—by demonstrating a preparedness against war.

WILLIAM E. ROBINSON, "the British lion's tail-twister," otherwise known as "Richelieu Robinson," one of the most violent anti-British politicians in the United States, has gone to the majority. He was born in county Tyrone in 1814, and emigrated when twenty-two. Although not remarkable for modesty or moderation, he was a man of culture and eloquence. In the Congress, he directed his powers against the mother-country.

THE Millennium cannot be far off. We are already a happy family of mutual admirers in happy times. There is an obituary notice of a pleader of a court of requests somewhere, whose many merits the editor, emulating the modesty of the deceased, forbears to blazon forth.

Our old friend Mr. Kangali Charan Halder has earned kudos by proposing and carrying a resolution granting the Secretary and Assessor of the Corporation over the water a house-allowance of Rs. 50 a month and, above all, by another motion raising the municipal grant to the local general hospital from Rs. 2,400 to Rs. 3,600 a year.

THE following has an interest in this country at the present moment with the starting of the Indian Property Association:—

"The Earl of Courtown, chairman of the Property Defence Association, writes that the sum expended by the association during the last seven years was 140,800*l.*, and the receipts 143,070*l.* The latter included 58,950*l.* from the London Mansion House Fund and 16,000*l.* from the Irish Defence Union of London. Lord Courtown adds that it is said by the League that they would make the Government of Ireland impossible unless their demands are granted, and beyond question the law, so far as it relates to land, was to a great extent paralysed. The Property Defence Association was formed to perform that which the State found itself unable to perform, and it rendered services to individuals by which property was made more secure, and the State was relieved of a duty which during a time of extreme difficulty it was unable to discharge. Yet this had not saved them from a charge of 'apathy, indifference, and want of courage'; but they should be as indifferent to the unjust sneers of professed friends as to the insults of enemies. There was still work to be done, and, with God's help, it would be done."

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

WE give below the prospectus of the Indian Property Association :—

"1. It is proposed to constitute on a permanent basis an Association in India, analogous to the Property Defence League, established in England.

2. There has been a growing tendency in recent legislation both in England and in India, to disregard the state obligation of vested interests and to substitute for the long established sanctions of the rights of property, fanciful theories, which, though founded on benevolent intentions are directly subversive of the recognized principles of political economy.

3. In India, the mischief occasioned by legislation of this disturbing character, is accentuated by the fact that the Government of the country is for the people, but not by the people, so that where an enactment presses harshly and works injustice, the knowledge that it is imposed upon them without their consent, is apt to create a very much stronger feeling of dissatisfaction and unrest than in a like case in England, where legislation is only possible with the consent of the governed.

4. One of the primary objects of this Association therefore will be to render every possible legal assistance to the Government by endeavouring to keep it thoroughly well informed as to the possible consequences of intended legislation and to focus and collect public opinion upon all important measures calculated in any way to affect the rights of property, or to prove in any way oppressive or harassing to the community at large or to any section of it.

5. The Association will also, so far as it lies in its power, apply its best energies in co-operating with other existing associations for the removal of oppressive and unsuitable taxation like the Income tax and whilst justly recognising the absolute necessity for taxation on such a scale as will enable the Government of India to carry on the administration securely and permanently, the Association will strive to induce the Government to adopt a system of taxation more in harmony with the necessities and sympathies of the community.

6. The Association will in a special manner watch jealously and vigilantly all legislation likely to impose further burthens upon the landed interests, and when necessary will adopt such constitutional measures both in India and in England, as will render an active opposition successful.

7. For this purpose it is proposed to establish a Permanent Agency in England and a Permanent staff in India.

8. The Association will be open to all members of the community irrespective of nationality and will be governed by an Executive Council in Calcutta.

9. It is proposed to follow the precedent of the Anglo-Indian Defence Association and to register the Association and also to collect donations and subscriptions and so form like the Anglo-Indian Association a trust fund which will produce a permanent income to meet for all times the requirements of the Association.

10. Persons desiring to join the Association are requested to send in their names with the amount of their proposed donation and monthly subscriptions to his Highness the Maharajah Bahadur of Durbhunga."

The Executive Committee, we find, consist of Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, the Hon. Dr. Rash Behari Ghosh, Messrs. A. B. Miller, C. B. Gregson, D. Cruickshank, Rai Bahadar Shib Chunder Banerjee and Baboo Saligram Singh.

The society was started at No. 4, Clive Row, on 8th February, under the presidentship of the Maharaja of Durbhunga. The present association is distinguished from the existing ones, both in Bengal and Behar, by the fusion in it of the Indian and Anglo-Indian elements.

SIR Dennis Fitzpatrick assumes the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab this day with the following private staff: Mr. W. S. Davis, of the Frontier Police, Private Secretary; Lieutenant M. A. C. Crowe, R.A., of No. 4, Mountain Battery, P. F. F., Aid-de-Camp.

FOR sharply criticizing, in the Kreuz Zeitung, the new commercial treaties, Count Limburg-Sturum was tried at Berlin before the Disciplinary Administrative Court for Insubordinate Officials, in camera, found guilty and sentenced to be dismissed the public service, and to the loss of his pension and of the right to the diplomatic title of Minister. There is an appeal to the Ministry of State. The Count conducted his own defence.

The Cologne Gazette is now being prosecuted for its caustic remarks on the Bradenburg-banquet speech of the Emperor.

THE Government in England is prosecuting Mr. Horatio Bottomley and Sir Henry Aaron Isaacs, formerly Lord Mayor of London, on the charge of defrauding the Hansard Union of thirty thousand pounds.

The prosecution appears to be the outcome of the action heard before Mr. Justice Denman and a special jury—Hansard v. Lethbridge and others.

"Mr. Henry Hansard sued certain directors of the Hansard Publishing Union to recover £18,000, a balance said to be due in respect of the sale of the plaintiff's business and business premises in Parker Street, Holborn, to the company. The gentlemen sued were Sir Roper Lethbridge, Mr. C. K. Paul, Mr. A. P. Sinnott, Mr. H. J. Manning, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, and Sir R. H. Collins, who was sued as executor of the late Mr. Coleridge J. Kennard. The principal point raised for the defence was that the agreement for taking over the property had not been completed, inasmuch as it was not signed by Sir H. Isaacs, the then Lord Mayor, and therefore it had not become binding upon the defendants. Mr. Justice Denman said that the case was one of a somewhat unusual character. According to the general law, there was no doubt that when a document was prepared the nature of which was that certain persons should act as guarantors, certain money should be forthcoming, and that they should sign as such; then it was part of the bargain that if the name of some one guarantor was left out, either by accident or design, that document became worthless as against the rest of them. It would be unjust that those who had signed the document should become personally liable upon it, when those who had not signed escaped all liability. It would be unjust that parties should be bound by a bargain such as they never intended to enter into. It would be possible that by consent of the others certain of the signatures might be dispensed with, but such a state of things as that must be made out by evidence. The jury also would be careful how they consented to modify a written document upon parol evidence, and establish a state of facts like that. The plaintiff would be bound to establish that the name of Sir Henry Isaacs was omitted with the consent of the defendants. To make this out he must show that Mr. Bottomley did on October 22nd enter into such an agreement, and, further, that when he did it he had authority to bind the defendants by it. The jury, after considering the matter for a few minutes, gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £18,754 7s., being the amount of principal and interest. Mr. Justice Denman said that he would stay execution for a week against all the defendants but Mr. Bottomley upon security being given to the satisfaction of the master, with a view to an appeal. It was added that execution would be stayed against each individual defendant, except Mr. Bottomley, who should give security to the amount of £2,000. Some questions of law were raised later, when discussion took place as to how the judgment should be entered in reference to Sir R. H. Collins. Mr. Justice Denman, in the end, said that he should enter the judgment for the plaintiff as against Sir R. H. Collins, as executor to Mr. Coleridge Kennard, for £17,607, the amount of property admitted to be in his hands as executor, and if any question should arise as to what that amount really was, that could be disposed of by Mr. Justice Kekewich, who had the administration suit before him. As to costs, there would be judgment against Sir R. H. Collins personally. As to this particular defendant, his lordship added that execution would be stayed until the whole matter was before Mr. Justice Kekewich in the administration suit. Judgment accordingly. The appeal was heard a few days subsequently, before the Master of the Rolls and Lords Justices Kay and Lopes, when Mr. Reid, Q. C., on behalf of the defendants, submitted that, inasmuch as a nice question of liability was raised, the defendants were entitled to a stay of execution until the hearing of the application for a new trial without any levies being imposed upon them. Mr. Channell, Q. C., on the other side, maintained that the defendants ought to be put under some terms, otherwise the unfortunate plaintiff might lose the whole of his money. The defendants should have taken care to ascertain whether the guarantee had been signed by Sir H. Isaacs before they took over the plaintiff's business. Lord Justice Kay: The plaintiff is put in the awkward position that he cannot recover against the company who got his business, and if he cannot recover on this guarantee he will lose all the purchase money. The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that although the Court only interfered with the discretion of a learned judge in strong cases, the defendants were entitled to a stay of execution without any terms being imposed upon them, as they appeared to have made out a strong prima facie case against their liability. Execution therefore would be stayed without terms."

The Lethbridge of the cause-title is, we believe, Sir Roper Lethbridge, who with his savings and perquisites of an Indian educational magnate purchased a share in Hansard's business.

THE Reserved Forests in the Puri and Angul Forest Divisions are closed against hunting and shooting from the 7th March to the 15th June, except with the written permission of the Conservator of Forests or the Local Government.

THE Governor-General in Council has ordered that every applicant for leave to file a specification of an invention shall cause to be delivered, or sent, with the specification, not fewer than five copies thereof, the fifth copy being intended for the Director of Land Records and Agriculture, North-Western Provinces and Oudh.

SECTIONS 1, 6, 7 and 8 of the Excise (Malt Liquors) Act XIII of 1890, apply to the Sonthal Parganas from the 1st March, 1892. The order is dated the 27th February and appears in the Calcutta Gazette of the 2nd March. The order is therefore not retrospective only but sudden, without any preliminary warning.

THE Toll Collectors of the Nadia Rivers have been empowered to act also as Joint Supervisors within their respective jurisdictions. The Lieutenant-Governor also finds it expedient to appoint Mr. R. Bushby and Mr. G. Robertson, Engineer and Shipwright-Surveyors at the Port of Calcutta, to be Surveyors of Inland Steam-Vessels at Goalundo, Kushitea, Narainganj, and Khulna.

By the London and North-Western Railway and hard by the Chalk Farm tunnel, stood two Normandy poplars, in a garden belonging to a gentleman named Gill. The trees shielded him from the smoke and deadened the noise of passing trains. The railway company wanted to remove these poplars, for they interfered with their traffic. The gentleman was willing to accommodate the company by lopping off branches that were in their way, while preserving the trees as a screen against the smoke. This would not satisfy the Company, who cut down the trees and deposited £50 in court. Subsequently they raised the compensation to £100. On application of the owner, the Queen's Bench Division assessed the damages at £300.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE demonstrations of unemployed Berlin continued on the 26th and 27th February. The Emperor, in demonstration of his confidence in his people's loyalty, rode through the streets, unattended, to calm the spirit of unrest abroad, and was cheered by the crowds. We wonder whether any claqueurs were about. On the 28th, the city was quiet.

THE Imperialism of Germany is for the moment directed against the Press. There is much discontent in Berlin on account of the prosecution of the Cologne Gazette, for a caustic critique on a speech of the Emperor. The dissatisfaction has been heightened by the seizure by the Police of a number of papers in the office.

M. BOURGEOIS, a Radical, too failing, Senator Boubet, a Republican, has formed the new French Cabinet, with M. de Freycinet, M. Ribot, M. Rouvier, and others.

THERE is a crisis in Greece. M. Delyannis being unable to cope with the existing financial difficulties, the King has dismissed his Ministry, and for the obstinate support of a large majority and their threat to retain their posts, the Chamber has been prorogued prior to dissolution.

THE resolution of the National Miners' Federation for temporary stoppage of work in the collieries to exhaust the present stock, has produced more than its desired effect. Already, coal is selling high in the London market and a number of steamers are delayed in the docks. The London Daily News suspects in the movement an attempt at a combination between masters and men for the formation of a colossal coal ring. The Durham Miners, unconnected with the National Miners' Federation, have determined to go on strike on the 12th against any reduction of wages.

THE Bimetallic League, at a meeting held at Manchester on the 2nd instant, were of opinion that the interests of the Empire demand the establishment of a stable par exchange between gold and silver, and that it was the duty of Government and Parliament to secure this immediately through an agreement with the leading commercial nations.

THE House of Commons rejected by a majority of fifty-five, on its second reading, a Bill introduced by Mr. Kelly to reinstate Irish evicted tenants.

IN opening the proceedings against Mr. Bottomley and Sir Henry Isaacs, in the Bow Street Police Court on the 2nd, the prosecuting counsel declared that the public had lost over a million through the Hansard frauds.

THE late Lord Lytton has left a will enjoining the construction of a history of his Viceroyalty of India from the documents in his family.

BOTH the Government of India and the Secretary of State agree with the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief in India, to place the forces in Burma under a Commander-in-Chief. But Lord Cross, as stated in the House of Commons, is not prepared as yet to propose a change and does not consider piece-meal legislation desirable.

NOTWITHSTANDING the birth of the Indian Property Association, the Cadastral Survey of Behar is to be proceeded with. On the 3rd March, in the House of Commons, the Under-Secretary of State for India informed the House that the Secretary of State for India considers it necessary in the interests of the rayyets.

MR. Venning, Commissioner of the Nagpur Division, proceeded to Chanda, on the borders of the Central Provinces and the Nizam's dominion, away from the railway, to try, among others, two prisoners for murder. One of these stood charged with killing a man with an axe. On the closing of the case, the Judge deferred sentence—to be attacked by the same axe. The prisoner took up the deadly weapon which lay on a table close by, rushed up to the Judge and struck him on the head, inflicting a severe scalp wound. But for the punkah pole against which the raised axe struck, the strike would have been fatal. Mr. Venning fell. A second blow was prevented by the Deputy Commissioner—Colonel Thomas, who rushed up, seized the assailant and disarmed him. The gallant Colonel had in his turn a blow on his back with the flat part of the axe.

LORD Lansdowne returned to Calcutta on Tuesday. He had a right royal reception at Cooch Behar, the Maharaja going into lavish expenditure to entertain his august guest. Sir Charles Elliott had preceded him here from Orissa on the previous Friday.

THE Lieutenant-Governor held a full-dress Durbar at Belvedere yesterday "for the investiture of certain gentlemen, on whom titles have been conferred by His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General of India." There were 24 of these "gentlemen" to receive their titles, namely,—

The Durbar was followed by a Garden Party.

LATER in the evening, Calcutta was entertained at the Town Hall by the Mahomedan Literary Society, to their 28th annual conversazione.

MR. Christopher Nickels, of the Pasewa factory in the Jaunpur district, was more fortunate in his second trial in the Allahabad Sessions Court. In the first, the jury were divided and the presiding Judge—Mr. Justice Straight—not agreeing with the verdict of not guilty of the majority, ordered a second trial. In the present, the jury were unanimously for acquittal and the Chief Justice, against the tenour of his charge to the jury, had no option but to discharge the accused. The case, as put by the Crown, was that the prisoner had several factories in Jaunpur and that he resented the setting up of another at Sohni near to his own by a native of Benares, Jagat Narain, and, taking advantage of the ill-feeling between Jagat Narain and his tenants on account of enhancement suits, brought about a riot with the object of getting the native's factory destroyed. The defence was that there was no reason for the prisoner wishing to destroy the factory. The Chief Justice remarked that "a jury would be well advised if when dealing with questions of fact, they considered the probabilities of every circumstance that was put before them. Was there anything improbable in the prisoner objecting to this new factory? That it would interfere with the prisoner's factories was beyond doubt. The next matter to note was that in October, Jagat Narain had a considerable amount of indigo ready for manufacture, and this would be just the time that an enemy would select to strike a blow." The Chief Justice concluded with the observation that "if the jury were fairly and reasonably satisfied that the prisoner did incite that riot of 3rd October, they must say so and convict him. If they had a fair and honest doubt as reasonable men, they would of course give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt."

The jury deliberated for about twenty minutes and gave their verdict of not guilty.

If an indigo-planter has escaped, a Civilian is in trouble in connection with that case. The Police sub-inspector who reported on the riot, was sentenced by Judge Wheeler to imprisonment. He now himself is on trial. The Government order for an enquiry under Act XXXVII of 1850, we published last week. The investigation commenced at the Board of Revenue Office, Allahabad, Mr. Arthur Strachey defending.

WILD animals transported to the midst of human hives, must pine for the solitude and freedom of the desert of their birth. The very comforts of the menagerie must be irksome to them, enjoyed as they have to be under the impertinent observation of Peeping Toms of the most aggravating kind by thousands per diem.

That fierce light which beats upon a throne, is joy compared to that which beats upon the prisoners in a menagerie from the eyes of the gaping mob. Of course, subjected to novel conditions of life, the poor creatures are liable to strange diseases unknown to them in a state of nature. The Vossische Zeitung writes that "lionesses, tigresses, and female leopards of the Paris menagerie are subject to 'nerves,' and frequently have to be treated with large doses of bromkalium to calm them. The elephant suffers from toothache, and one of its teeth had to be stuffed. The sagacious creature endured the operation of filing and boring with great patience, only rapidly waving its trunk when the pain was violent. When all was over, it showed its gratitude by caressing M. Sauverre with the finger-like extremity of its proboscis. There is also a hippopotamus which suffers from a kind of chilblain, left by last winter's frost, and rendered worse by the present cold weather. The wounded places are rubbed with vaseline, and the enormous creature shows its relief by uttering comfortable grunts."

We hope there is adequate provision in the Calcutta Zoological Gardens and in other public menageries in India, for treating the diseases of the animals.

THERE are 53 large railway bridges in India—that is, the cost of which is not less than Rs. 6,00,000, or the spans not less than 50 feet. The largest number, namely, 12, have been constructed by the North Western Railway Company. Their greatest feat is the Alexandra Bridge over the Chenab, between Wazirabad and Kathala, the length of which is 9,088 ft., yet unsurpassed by any one in India. It was opened on the 22nd of January 1876. Next to this, is the Sutledge Bridge at Ludhiana, constructed also by this company, 5193 ft. long and opened in January, 1870. The third is the Jhelum Bridge, 4875 ft. in length, also their work and opened towards the end of 1876. The fourth is the Soane Bridge of the East Indian Railway Company, the length being 4726 ft. and opened on the 22nd December 1862.

There are 36 important railway tunnels in India, that is measuring more than 660 ft. in length or costing over 1½ lac of rupees. The largest number of tunnels have been opened by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, viz., 13, but though the North Western have done only eleven, yet their Khojak near Shelabagh surpasses all in length, which is 12,862 ft. The second is also their work, the Karez Tunnel near Dirgi, Pishin section, 2034 ft. The third is the Thull Ghat Tunnel No. 2, near Kasara, 1625 ft. of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company. The fourth the Saranda near Gailkern, 1588 ft. is on the Bengal Nagpur Railway.

THE trial of Frank and Rosalie Schneider, husband and wife, on eight distinct charges of murder, outrage and robbery, committed upon three servant girls, between May 26 and July 7, 1891, concluded in Vienna, on January 29. The husband was found guilty on all the charges and the wife of only one murder. The Judge sentenced both to death, providing the execution of the woman first.

The speeches for the defence occupied about twenty minutes each. Each counsel for the defence threw the blame of the crimes on the client of the other. The Emperor is not for capital punishment, and there has been no dangling of lovely woman, or unlovely, from the grim tree, in Vienna, since 1808. In that year, the daughter of a shoe-maker was sent to her last account on the gallows, for brutal murder of her husband. She is described as a fiend, but she was certainly no flight. A woman of rare beauty, she had set her heart upon a soldier, but was compelled to take to husband a rich merchant. The claims of the soul being denied, she threw man-made legitimacy and the blessing of the Church overboard. Like Eloisa, she cried,

Not Cæsar's empress would I deign to prove ;

No, make me mistress to the man I love.

The end of it all was that, within a year of the marriage, she despatched her lord, to be united to her "sodger laddie." At her trial, she could only whine—

I asked no more but a sodger laddie,

MR. Charles J. Rodgers, of the Punjab, who was in Calcutta a couple of years ago to inspect and catalogue the coins in the Indian Museum, is the greatest numismatologist in India. He is an enthusiast in his subject, and a rusty little piece of copper or silver with a half effaced inscription would set him dancing in delight. During the month he was here on his errand at the Museum, he ransacked the bazar, and his magic presence produced the most curious old specimens of old world currency or coinage. His cabinet of coins, the collection of twenty years, has now been purchased by the Punjab Government. It contains many rare specimens not in the British Museum. Such are those of Gondapharres, Abdagases, and Orthagnes. Such are several of the numerous coins of the ancient Kings of Kashmir and Kangra. Such is a valuable coin of the anonymous coiner who is called in his coinage "The Great Saviour." This coin is understood to bear a name on its Pali side. Another coin of equal rarity is a Rupee bearing on one side the name Agilises in Greek and on the other Ages in Pali. The Mitras before Christ, are well represented in silver, the Parthian monarchs in copper, the early Mahomedan kings of Kashmir in gold, silver and copper, the silver being square, the copper round. Mr. Rodgers' collection is usually rich in the symbolic coinage of ancient India—coins, that is, with only symbols inscribed thereon but no names, which are supposed to have been current before the first Greek connection with this land.

IN October last, Halia Mahadin and another, his son, were brought up before Mr. Keshaw Vishnue, first class Magistrate of Panwell, for causing grievous hurt to Vithu Mahadu, whom they got out and beat a blow breaking one of the ribs. The hospital assistant, in his deposition, attributed the fracture of the bone to the blow. The Magistrate, however, was not satisfied that grievous hurt was intended to be caused or was known to be caused as a probable result, and that there was nothing in the case to presume the intentions of the accused. He, therefore, convicted the father and son of the minor offence of hurt and sentenced them each to a fine of Rs. 25, with the alternative of one month's imprisonment. The proceedings of the Magistrate came, last week, in review before Justices Jardine and Telang of the Bombay High Court. That court held that the father had intended to cause the consequence which resulted from his act, that the sentence passed on him was inadequate. But at that distance of time, the Judges refrained from enhancing the punishment.

THE privilege granted by Lord Lansdowne to the Calcutta University graduates, electing two Fellows, has been extended to the Bombay University. But there, they are not satisfied that the M. A.'s, M. D.'s and M. C. E.'s only are to select the Fellows. They want the L. L. B.'s to be included among the privileged. The Bombay Graduates contend that while in Calcutta, the M. A.'s number close upon a thousand, in Bombay their number is not more than a hundred, and that L. L. B.'s are in no way inferior to M. A.'s. Rather, they "may be said to be possessing higher academical training, as they have under the rules of the University to study for two years after taking their B. A. degree, while one can pass his M. A. only in a year after his B. A."

STARVING Succì, the Italian who has been exhibiting his powers of endurance, has at length found it no joke to play with Nature. His last engagement was at the Westminster Aquarium to fast for fifty-two days.

"At half past twelve on January 29—the forty-fourth day—Giovanni Succì brought his attempt to fast for fifty-two days at the Westminster Aquarium to an abrupt termination. During the previous few days he had suffered from violent sickness and constant irritation of the stomach, and after a broken night's rest, the Italian, who appeared very ill and weak, decided to bring his attempt to an end. He found on being weighed that he had lost an additional 18 ounces, which brought up his total waste to 38lb. 8oz. After some little indecision in the matter, Succì sent for Mr. Josiah Ritchie, the managing director of the Aquarium, and announced his intention of stopping. Dr. Trevor was present immediately afterwards, and he agreed that it would be unwise in Succì's critical condition to prolong the experiment. Accordingly some fruit was sent for, and at half-past twelve the fast came to an end, after having lasted 43 days 18 hours 45 minutes."

There was no disgrace in failing under such circumstances. Succì had accomplished wonder enough in fasting for more than forty-three clear days, baffling science. His submission at last to necessity only proves his good faith and negatives the suspicion of trickery, such as even Haridas, the buried Fakèr of Ranjeet Singh, was not above.

MR. Labouchere has been rebuking the thoughtless among his countrymen who have made the most ridiculous demonstrations of loyalty, on the occasion of the death of the Duke of Clarence. Sorrow for the loss he can understand. Sympathy with the Royal Family is proper. But personal loyalty in the connection, is to him an incomprehensible sentiment. In the following passage in Truth, he certainly puts a good face on the matter:—

"A Royal Family is, indeed, an inherent weakness in a Monarchical system. Monarchy would be better without its relations. Of the Duke of Clarence, little was personally known. If he had great talents, he never had an opportunity to show them. Had he come to the Throne, he might have been a good King or a bad one. Nothing could be predicated except by those who personally knew him. I do not say this by way of blame, but rather by way of praise. No evil was known of him, and this in itself is no slight praise in view of the fierce light that beats about a Throne, for it has not been always so with Royal Princes. Here is the epitaph that was written of Frederick, Prince of Wales:—

Here lies Prince Fred,
Who was alive, and is dead;
Had it been his father,
I had much rather;
Had it been his brother,
Sooner than any other;
Had it been his sister,
There's no one would have missed her;
Had it been his whole generation,
Best of all for the nation;
But since it's only Fred,
There's no more to be said."

Just so!

IN the following, Mr. Labouchere shows extraordinary mercy to royalty:—

"No one can for a moment suppose that any human being not arrayed in court plush could have felt any personal loyalty to either George I. or George II., both of whom, without being bad Kings, were about as offensive and objectionable personages as can well be conceived."

"Without being bad Kings"? To our mind, the two Georges were bad enough in all conscience. In the first place, they were foreigners and remained so to the last. It was a humiliation to the British to be ruled over by inveterate Germans, who were not even respectable specimens of their race, which had not yet acquired sufficient polish, whose greatness, intellectual and political, was scarcely yet in the womb. The insular pride of the English was pricked at every point and at every step. Nor did these interlopers care to honour it by an affectation of Anglicism. Their efforts to express themselves in the speech of their insular subjects, were the occasions of perpetual merriment to their Ministers. But they were not ashamed. They would not learn. Nothing were easier, had they but wished to do so. They were far from pure in life and conversation, and had they but elected to go to perdition in English company they would have picked up the colloquial dialect in no time. Unfortunately, in their very vices they remained outlandish. Even as foreigners, they were narrow, being Hanoverians more than Germans. How the descendants of the barons who won the Great Charter, the countrymen of Shakespeare and Bacon, of Cromwell and Blake, the contemporaries of Newton and Marlborough, felt under these poor importations from the royal hive of the Continent, may be imagined! These Hanoverians were not only contemptible as men, low in their lives and surroundings, gross and grossly illiterate, but bad as Kings of England, inasmuch as they subordinated her interests to those of Hanover and other German principalities and powers. If William III. was a foreigner too, with a foreign policy more Dutch than British, he was a gem "for a' that, and a' that."

Mr. Labouchere might have added the third George to the category of the modern English Kings of England who did not advance the cause of loyalty.

"I HAVE the strongest aversion from going to funerals," says Mr. George Augusta Sala in his Echoes of the week in the Englishman. He has seen so many and of the grandest. "I dread them," he writes. "I dream about them afterwards; I can reckon up a lengthy schedule of doctor's bills consequent on colds, coughs, rheumatisms and lumbagoes caught at funerals." He "witnessed the passage of the funeral procession of Napoleon the Great from the Arch de Triomphe to the Invalides." "Since 1840 I have professionally attended the interments of the Duchess of Kent, the Prince Consort, the great Duke of Wellington, Prince Leopold Duke of Albany, the Czar Alexander II., the King of Hanover, Napoleon III., the Prince Imperial, Palmerston, Macaulay, Livingstone, Edwin Landseer, Robert Stephenson and Browning."

It is edifying to see the Prince of journalists remonstrating in all friendly seriousness with the Prince of poetasters and wittlings. Mr. Andrew Lang "has been making a really eloquent speech at the annual dinner of the Edinburgh Burns Club, but who, to my mind, has stumbled into a slip of detestably bad taste, in parodying perhaps the finest lines in one of the most deeply devotional poems in the English language."

"Quoth racy and ready, but slightly too smart, Mr. Lang. If the 'Last Man,' described by Campbell, were a Scotsman (which was likely, owing to the survival of the fittest) he would:—

You darkening universe defy
To quench Burns' immortality
Or shake his faith in Burns.

Thomas Campbell's magnificent lines thus irreverently burlesqued are inscribed, as Mr. Andrew Lang might have remembered, on the poet's monument in Westminster Abbey. There are certain poems, sprightly maker of 'ballades' which, by a common consensus of veneration for true genius, the veriest triflers refrain from making fun of. We do not parody Pope's 'Universal Prayer':—

There is something wrong with the penultimate sentence which cannot be parsed as it is. Either something has been left out or some foreign matter has crept in, to make nonsense of it. As it is, the omission of the words "sprightly maker of 'ballades'" would make sense, and good sense, indeed. Those words evidently refer to Mr. Lang, but in their present position they merely spoil the text.

Mr. Lang has parodied—poorly enough—the concluding lines of the last stanza of "The Last Man" of Campbell. That stanza runs—

Go, Sun, while mercy holds me up
On nature's awful waste,
To drink this last and bitter cup
Of grief that man shall taste—
Go, tell the night that hides thy face,
Thou saw'st the last of Adam's race,
On earth's sepulchral clod,
The dark'ning universe defy
To quench his immortality,
Or shake his trust in God!

We pity the taste which could allow Mr. Lang to mangle such sublime poetry and put it to such execrable use as he has done. We have fallen on strange times. Auguste Comte has presented us the spectacle of a religion without a Godhead. And here is Mr. Andrew Lang exemplifying a heroworship which has no niche for the Hero of heroes—the Creator himself. Great as is the literary flippancy shown by the parodist, this moral offence is far more serious. For, even if the substitution of "Burns" for "his" in the second of the three lines, were mercifully passed over, the final "Burns" must stick in every respectable throat. We wonder whether Mr. Lang is happy in his soul after his leap from "trust in God" to "faith in Burns." We are afraid it may recur to him hereafter as an unpleasant memory.

While thus sympathising with Mr. Sala in his condemnation of making fun out of literature of abiding worth and solemn import, we must in justice say that Mr. Lang has been guilty of no extraordinary conduct. Such parodies are common in European literature. The best and the worst—the most puissant and the most feeble—indulge in them indiscriminately. Nor is there any reservation in favour of any books or pieces. Nothing is too sacred for such profanation. The Bible itself has not been safe from the hand of sacrilege. And so far from punishing the bold hand, society has all the more honored it for its irreverence, wherever that has been sufficiently smart. Apocryphal "Chaldee MS." was the making of Blackwood's Magazine. In this country too we had a similar Chaldee business from the brilliant pen of Henry Torrens, which obtained for its author great praise. When the inspired scribes of the Scriptures are thus mocked, it is too much to expect the Bob Southneys and Tom Campbells to be spared.

MR. SALA quotes the following passage from a letter from Mason to Horace Walpole, dated August 14, 1778:—

"Our poor country, from being once a well-bred gentleman, is now turned a downright blackguard. A gentleman, when he has received an affront, sends his challenge and then fights his duel. A blackguard, under similar circumstances, drives his fist directly at the jowl of his adversary and waives the ceremonial of the challenge."

Mason alludes to the extraordinary departure made at the time by England, of going to war against France without the previous formality, usual among civilised nations, of a declaration to that effect. The occasion being commonly seized of justifying the step taken. Such departures have not been unknown in British wars in the East. They are repugnant to the spirit of Hindu warfare.

HORACE WALPOLE has been painted for the world at large by Macaulay as very near an aristocratic driveller and small wit, eaten up with vanity and suffering from the cacoethes scribendi. Mason was a clerical aspirant after the society of fashion and taste—a worse driveller—a smaller wit—a feeblar litterateur. The popular impression is that no good ever came out of them, or can be drawn from them, the fashionable flaneur and his satellite having wasted their time in frivolous tittle tattle and the smallest of small talk, in mutual unbosomings of their envy, malice and all uncharitableness. That impression is wrong. The portraits, however life-like they stand on canvas, are not accurate, being, like many others from the hand of the same literary Rembrandt, imaginative rather than historical essays—mere studies in colour—in monochrome almost—the shade predominating. The genius of the painter has made his works immortal. But their historical truth or biographical vraisemblance has not gone unchallenged.

So in regard to the great Edinburgh Reviewer's character of the Earl of Oxford. Since the year 1834 when that character appeared, various writers, of more or less ability, in book or periodical, have satisfactorily vindicated the memory of the great epistolary classic. The gravamen of Macaulay's indictment against Walpole was that he was frivolity's fool, a fellow all affectation, without a particle of seriousness in his composition, without a single earnest purpose in his whole life. On this point, Lord Dover, in the biographical sketch prefixed to his edition of the Correspondence of Horace Walpole, published in 1833, anticipated detraction, and gave convincing proof in support of Horace's generosity. He certainly succeeds in reducing the sensational artist's Mephistophiles of frivolity and affectation to a decent-lived human being.

The nobleman's connections have rescued his memory from unjust aspersion. His correspondents of course gain by his clearance. But no special efforts have been made, we believe, in Mason's behalf. Be that as it may, Mr. Sala's single quotation will go far to give him ample respectability.

MR. SALA asks, What would Mason, were he alive, say to the recent 'scrimmage' in the French Chamber of Deputies?

"M. Floquet, President of the Chamber, being once insulted by the late General Boulanger, fought that wind-bag, and with his nimble rapier very nearly pinked him. M. Constans, a Cabinet Minister, being insulted by the ex-Boulangist Deputy, M. Laur, 'drives his fist directly at the jowl of his adversary,' or rather smacks his face resonantly; thus waiving the 'ceremonial of the challenge.' French politeness, where art thou hiding? M. Constans, however, is not the first eminent politician who has 'gone for' an opponent even as the exasperated gambler 'went for' the Heathen Chinee. Long ago, at Washington, I was shown a photograph of the stick with which the pro-slavery legislator, Mr. Preston Brooks, beat the abolitionist, Mr. Charles Sumner. 'From the bumps made on Sumner's head with that stick,' rhetorically observed the proprietor of the photograph, 'grew the tree of the emancipation of the enslaved and outraged African.'"

The Americans are a wonderful people beyond a doubt. If portraiture of pets is as far as other nations have reached, they have gone many steps beyond. They have established, we take it, or are on the way of establishing, a national gallery of portraits of famous broken sticks, soiled gloves, superannuated socks, used up Wellingtons, pensioned Bluchers, and such other important bric-a-brac. From the eloquent remark of the proprietor of the photograph of the club which felled Mr. Sumner, he was an Abolitionist, and for Abolitionists the weapon was a thing of melancholy associations. Why should Abolitionists preserve the portrait of the evil stick and love to show it to strangers? A tough problem, this.

Mr. Sala's gossip wakes up our own remembrances. A far more remarkable stick was that which Colonel Brooks received as a present for his exhibition of Southern chivalry from a most unexpected quarter. When the whole civilized world was shocked at the news that the eloquent lawyer and amiable Abolitionist orator Mr. Charles Sumner, had been, without warning, attacked in the floor of the Senate and cud-gelled on the head to bleeding, and the welkin rung with shouts of execration from all sides on such cowardly brutality, the ladies of South Carolina came to the rescue of their hero. They presented him by subscription with a gold-headed cane bearing the significant inscription—Hit him again. We wonder whether the Brooks family have preserved this historic stick, as an honorable heirloom, or whether any portraits of it have been taken and preserved.

THE warrant, issued at the instance of the editor of the Statesman, by the Chief Magistrate, against Mr. Charrington, with liberty to appear in his Court on the 1st March on a personal recognizance of Rs. 1,000, was duly served at Bombay. But Mr. Charrington chose to leave India by the last mail instead of appearing in Calcutta to answer the charges. The consideration shown by Mr. Maraden has been lost on an undeserving object. The warrant stands over sine die.

THE death of Mr. Henry Curwen, editor and one of the two proprietors of the Times of India, is a loss to the Indian Press. He had been invalided home on Saturday before last and died at sea on the following Monday afternoon. Like the late Mr. Robert Knight of the Statesman, Mr. Curwen has been the victim of overwork. There is a movement in Bombay to perpetuate his memory.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, March 5, 1892.

THE SICK MAN OF EUROPE NOT DYING YET.

THE Sick Man is a synonyme for the Sultan or the Government of Turkey. This has been so for about half a century at least. Not that Turkey has been so long ailing, but that her Christian neighbours have loved to think her so. What right to health has the barbarian Moslem? That is the privilege of the enlightened Giaour. Having declared Turkey ill and in a critical condition, the Christian Powers kept a strict watch over her to see how life gradually ebbed away to nothingness.

If she was not unwell, they did their best to make her so. This was necessary to keep them in countenance. Indeed, it was needed for the satisfaction of their ambition and greed. They had employed their leisure in constructing a new map of Europe and Western Asia, distributing the soil of Turkey between others, and now they could not wait indefinitely. If she was not going to die of ill health and general debility, she stood a good chance of being shot to death by some bold bad neighbours, while the rest looked on with evident relish.

Dr. Brewer refers the origin of the phrase Sick Man to the great Emperor Nicholas, who, in 1844, thus wrote:—

"We have on our hands a sick man, a very sick man. It would be a great misfortune if one of these days he should happen to die before the necessary arrangements are all made.....The man is certainly dying, and we must not allow such an event to take us by surprise.—Nicholas of Russia, to Sir George Seymour, British chargé d'affaires (January 11, 1844)."

That was forty-eight years ago, and in the language of Galileo before the Inquisition, still it moves! Nicholas tried his worst—employed all the vast resources of the Mammoth Empire—to maintain his reputation as a political pathologist, to what purpose is known to everyone. Nicholas has long been in his grave, but Turkey still lives, somehow.

In point of fact, the political myth of the Sick Man is of much remoter creation. The idea of the decadence of the Moslem Power in Europe, has been in vogue from a long time. Such is the obscuring influence of religious diversity that the Christians saw signs of weakness when none existed. Even in Turkey's proudest day, when she had barely ceased to be a conquering Power, when she was still truly formidable, European diplomats and travellers amused themselves, and comforted their fellow Christians, by pretending to discern the symptoms of her approaching collapse. Certainly, before the close of the last century, they had decided that the Mahomedan Byzantine Empire was hastening to its speedy downfall.

These Mussulmans are endowed with extraordinary vitality. Even under the most desperate circumstances, they take a long time to shuffle off the mortal coil. So, Turkey has been continually dying for years.

Man is mortal, and states are but human—subject to the liabilities of the principal. As old William Browne, in one of his Britannia Pastorals, elaborately puts it:—

And as the yeere hath first his jocund spring,
Wherein the leaves, to birds' sweet carolling,
Dance with the winde: then sees the summer's day
Perfect the embriom blossome of each spray:
Next cometh autumn, when the threshed sheafe
Looseth his graine, and every tree his leafe:
Lastly cold winter's rage, with many a storme,
Threats the proud pines which Ida's toppe adorne,
And makes the sappe leave succoutlesse the shoote,
Shrinking to comfort his decaying roote.
Or as a quaint musitian being won,
To run a point of sweet division,
Gets by degrees unto the highest key;
Then, with like order falleth in his play
Into a deeper tone; and lastly, throwes
His period in a diapazon close:
So every humane thing terrestriall,
His utmost height attain'd, bends to his fall.

Drummond, of Hawthornden, more energetically sings in two words or rather in just four lines:—

I know that all beneath the Moon decays,
And what by mortals in this world is brought
In time's great periods shall return to nought;
That fairest states have fatal nights and days.

Fact coincides with theory. History is a melancholy repository of the wrecks of states and nations. As Byron pertinently questions:—

Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, where are they?

Echo answers, Where? All the kingdoms of the earth of the present day, the proudest not excepted, will go the way of the great empires just named, sooner or later. So there will be no particular degradation to the Turks, when their hour arrives. Nor even if they go earlier. The Osmanlees have ruled sufficiently long in Europe for them to pass away with credit.

Since the last disastrous war, in which all was lost save honour and the capital, the Osmanlee credit has been at the lowest. If Turkey was before sick, she now was dying. There were many substantial grounds for such an opinion. Turkey had been defeated in the field and compelled to sign a crushing treaty by an enemy at her gate. She was denuded of her vital possessions and Provinces. She had agreed to pay a fine utterly beyond her resources. And, as a matter of fact, she did not pay; she was in arrears from the outset. Her desperate efforts to pay, only starved her without preserving her credit or satisfying her enemy. Add to these, accounts came from time to time of the want and wretchedness within the Empire, and the oppression in the Provinces. Absolute bankruptcy seemed to stare the poor nation in the face, and general ruin seemed a reserve of the measurable future.

At length, a gleam of hope appears in the horizon. The Vienna Correspondent of the Times lately wrote:—

"The sick man of the East is giving unmistakable signs of convalescence. In other words, the Turk is beginning to pay his debts with punctuality. I hear from Constantinople that for the second time the Porte has paid the full amount of the instalment on the war indemnity due to Russia—that is to say, the sum of £T350,000. The increased regularity with which the Turk is meeting his financial engagements, which originated with Agop Pasha, has been maintained by his successor, Nassif Bey, and the time may not be far off when a Turkish debt will be regarded as no less secure than that of any European Government. The Russian indemnity consists of an annual sum of £T350,000, payable for 92 years. No capital sum was fixed. But Turkey only paid £T100,000 in the first year, £T140,000 in the second year, and £T200,000 in the third year. During the last two years she has not only paid the entire annuity due, but also a considerable sum against arrears. At a moment when the condition of Russian finance can hardly be described as brilliant, M. Vishnegradski will certainly be glad to include in his annual revenue so important an item."

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

Dumraon, March, 1892.

The marriage of the daughter of His Highness the Maharaja of Dumraon with His Highness the Maharaja of Rewa, has been an event in this part of the country. It was celebrated here on the 22nd February with tremendous éclat. The expenses incurred on the occasion have, of course, been enormous. A good deal of it is pure waste, no doubt, but not all. Even the portion least useful has its reproductive qualities. A marriage like this really encourages arts and stimulates trade, giving employment to hundreds of ingenious men and feeding thousands of the artists and the poor and entertaining in the fullest sense a whole tract of country. Above all, it serves as a wholesome break in the dead level of life in the district. The tide of human beings that poured into this town to witness the marriage, was full to overflow. In the afternoon previous to the day of marriage, the chief scene of attraction lay on the railway station platform. Two special trains, one containing the Maharaja of Rewa and his suite and the other containing the Maharaja of Benares and party, were due at the Dumraon station at 4-3 and 5-30. Great was the expectation raised, and people flocked there in large numbers. The station premises and platform were very tastefully decorated all over with crimson cloth fringed with gold, the glare of colour being relieved by patches of evergreens and flowers. The floor of the platform was covered with red broad cloth; and pots of beautiful flowers were introduced along the whole length. By invitation, many European gentlemen, including several officials, assembled there. The native nobility and gentry mustered in force. Among the local officials, we noticed the Joint Magistrate and the District Superintendent of Police of Arrah and also the District Superintendent of the Railway of this division. A detachment of infantry was in attendance, ranged in two rows on the platform, to present arms on arrival of each of the trains, and a battery of artillery was posted at a distance with their men with flaming torches in hand. Three complete bands were in attendance too, including the band of the 2nd Queen's Regiment now located at Dinapore. It is needless to say that the latter composed wholly of Europeans. Thither, precisely at 4-20, His Highness the Maharaja of Dumraon drove in a carriage and four attended by a detachment of body-guards and took his seat on the station platform. The energetic and courteous Dewan Jai Prokash Lal Bahadoor was to be seen everywhere, looking after the minutest details. Punctual to the time fixed, that is at 4-30, the special train of His Highness the Maharaja of Benares was sighted and was greeted with the usual salute. On the train coming to a halt, His Highness was welcomed with due ceremony and brought down to the platform. His noble host cordially embraced him, while the bands struck and continued to discourse music. He was then carried to his place of encampment surrounded by his guards and retinue. An hour after, that was at 5-30, the special train conveying the bridegroom and his suite arrived at the station and received the salute of his rank and the acclamation and blessings of all the people of Dumraon, while three bands from different directions began to play their most inspiring music with a wonderful effect upon the people. With His Highness the Rewa Maharaja was his Political Agent with his family and staff; and about 20 carriages that composed the train were packed with brilliantly dressed people. In the train there was a complete band which was discoursing its music while it slowly moved up to the station platform. The reception over, now formed a procession which once seen makes durable impression upon the imagination. It was a swarm of liveries, uniforms, equipages as brilliant and varied as a picture. Stupendous elephants, beautifully painted and literally loaded with massive golden ornaments and bearing splendid ambatis of various pattern and design; beautifully caparisoned horses; gem-encrusted swords; rich chairs of state made of gold, silver and ivory, inlaid with pearls and gems; and many such items of real eastern luxury dazzling the eyes of the sightseers. A squadron of Rewa Cavalry very smartly dressed and equipped escorted their Maharaja to his residence. All the way leading to it was lined with infantry. All this magnificence seen in the effulgence of the setting sun, made a deep impression and recalled to our mind what we hear of the old days of the Mogul Empire. Indian art has always prospered and will continue to exist only under the patronage of such Houses as these. Its beauty, durability, fineness, artistic quality, superiority of design and variety of patterns are all due to the patronage of an appreciative aristocracy. Surrounded by this grandeur, the Maharaja of Dumraon carried away his son-in-law in a carriage and four amidst the joyous acclamation of his friends and tenants. The next carriage contained the Political Agent and Dewan Jai Prokash Lal. And so on in strict accordance with the code of precedence. All the honoured guests of the Dumraon Maharaja took their seats either in carriages or on elephants as were assigned to them. The crowd of people jostling each other to secure advantageous points of view, was very great, and it required great nerve and exertion on the part of the Police to keep the way sufficiently clear for the passage of the procession.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Reliable Remedies.—In wounds, bruises, sprains, glandular swellings, enlarged veins, neuralgic pains and rheumatism, the application of this soothing Ointment to the affected parts not only gives the greatest ease, but likewise cures the complaint. The Pills much assist in banishing the tendency to rheumatism and similar painful disorders, whilst the Ointment cures the local ailment. The Pills remove the constitutional disturbance and regulate every impaired function of every organ throughout the human body. The cure is neither temporary nor superficial, but permanent and complete, and the disease rarely recurs, so perfect has been the purification performed by these searching yet harmless preparations.

The Dumraon Rajbari where the Maharaja usually resides with his family, is in the centre of the town. The house is in the shape of a castle surrounded by massive walls pierced only by two immense gates and defended by numerous rectangular towers. It covers an area of about a mile in circuit and the wall itself is surrounded by a ditch (now dry) about twenty feet broad and about as deep as it is wide. All the Raj offices, and public and private apartments are within this enclosure. A beautiful temple, the lofty spire of which towers over all other buildings, is to be seen from a great distance. The courts and columned aisles and other minor temples surrounding the big one look as its satellites and thus heighten the splendour of the chief temple. The sudder gate is surmounted by a Nobhut Khana, from which music descends at stated hours during the day and night. Besides this mansion, the Maharaja possesses at Dumraon 3 or 4 houses surrounded by shrubbery and ornamental fruit trees, well furnished and kept in good order. Among them is one called Bara Baug and is on the way from the railway station and almost equidistant from the station precincts and the Rajbari. It is a charming place and is much frequented by the Maharaja's European guests, who when they come here like to reside in that pleasant retreat. This place was fixed for the residence of His Highness the young Maharaja of Rewa, and it was here that he was conveyed with such splendour by his father-in-law. It has an extensive compound where about more than 100 tents were pitched for the accommodation of his suite and people attending him. Thousands of men with numerous animals, such as elephants, camels and horses, belonging to the Maharajas of Rewa and Benares, as well as to Munda (another honoured guest and son-in-law of the Maharaja of Dumraon who had come here previously) arrived here a week before and encamped in different places assigned to them. Besides these personages, many other relations of the Maharaja and local grandees came over here invited and were accommodated in different quarters according to their rank and needs. These men follow in a miniature form the example of the higher chiefs, their retinue and trappings following them. Most of the recognized noblemen and magnates of the two Provinces—Bengal and the North West—were invited, and those who could not attend, had sent their representatives. To accommodate and entertain such a number of people from the highest in rank to the lowest grasscut and also such a number of animals for a number of days, was not a light affair. Thanks to the resources of the Dumraon Raj and the foresight and energy of its Dewan, the commissariat arrangements were complete and exhaustless.

All the European gentlemen both at the headquarters as well as those remaining in the interior were invited by the Maharaja on this occasion, and a great many of them responded to the request, and coming here, enjoyed themselves for a week at the Maharaja's Garden House which goes by the name of Bhojepoor House, about 2 miles from the town and situated on the bank of the Bhojepore Jheel. Bonsard from Calcutta was appointed as their caterer. This House usually so secluded rung on this occasion with merriment and gaiety for days together, while horses ready saddled or harnessed waiting at all hours, champing their bits, and domestics in splendid liveries often flitted across the verandahs and corridors. Every evening during dinner the band of the 2nd Queen's Regiment played.

The day following the arrival of the two special trains mentioned above, was the grandest of the week. It was the day of marriage. From an early hour the whole town and its suburbs were crowded with men. It is difficult to fix the exact number which is variously estimated. The general impression is that it amounted to millions. In the morning, His Highness the Dumraon Maharaja visited the Rewa camp, to enquire after the health and comforts of his son-in-law, his relatives, friends and courtiers. The pomp of the Rewa court is still very great. Certainly, the Rewa people appear to be more racy and showy in their exterior aspect than the people of Behar. Many of their Reises put on Punjabee pugree and the colour of their tunic was saffron. They are conservative to the backbone. They preserve among them in all details of life the dividing spirit of the ancient Hindoo régime. They are all draped professionally, each man's dress proclaiming his calling. The gradations and subordinations of life are strictly kept up. Among such a people, etiquette forms a chief part of their accomplishments and duty. It is not an easy training as one would suppose. A man is required to acquire a certain ease of manner, which joined to a keen perception as to points of etiquette, enables him to go through all receptions in a correct form. It will not do to be equally civil to every one, irrespective of age, caste and rank. It was requisite to pay to each the exact amount of respect and attention that etiquette demands. To deal with such a people in such a way as not to give offence, is no light task, but the Maharaja of Dumraon and his Dewan have succeeded in winning general approbation.

At 4 o'clock P. M. on the 22nd, the marriage procession began to form. It started from the garden House at 5 P. M. Just at the firing of a gun. It extended over a mile and half. There were immense numbers of elephants and horses. Three deep columns of infantry 6 men abreast formed part of the procession.

The procession was a long and gorgeous one.

After the marriage there was a succession of amusements in the shape of dinners, nautches, reviews, durbars and fireworks extending over three days. It was only yesterday that the horizon was cleared. The Maharaja of Rewa and his suite have gone back.

The bridegroom is 15 years and 6 months old—very handsome and sprightly. A ray of intelligence shines about his face. He is said to excel in athletic exercises. The Maharaja of Dumraon has at last attained the acme of his ambition by forming an alliance with this House and securing such a handsome lad for a son-in-law. He, in an open Durbar, expressed his fortune and attributed it solely to the exertion and tact of his able Dewan. Indeed, Dewan Jai Prokash has scored a triumph for his master in securing this prize in hot competition with some of the first class ruling Houses of Rajputana.

MOORSHEDABAD.

Moorshedabad, the 26th February, 1892.

City Moorshedabad was overcast by a sudden gloom caused by the deeply lamented death of Nawab Shahun-Nisa Begum Sahiba, one of the four wedded consorts and the most pet wife of the late but last Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Syed Mansoor Ali Khan Bahadur Faridoon Jah Nusrut Jung. She breathed her last at quarter past 2 P. M., on the 16th ultimo, at the age of 61. The Nawab Sahiba had been suffering from pulmonary consumption (phthisis) for over 17 years and been treated by the best Unani as well as English physicians and though she showed, from time to time, signs of apparent recovery in her health, yet notwithstanding all that medicine could do to her, she succumbed to the fell disease. God grant her soul rest and peace! The generous lady's death has shrouded in gloom the Kila-i-Nizamut, where she resided, with her long train of attendants and followers, male and female. She was in the enjoyment of an annual political pension of over Rs. 37,000 from Government, and possessed a very liberal heart in the scraglio of the late Nazim Faridoon Jah. Her loss is almost of a public calamity, being already felt by the residents of the city in general, over and above her dear and near relatives. It is a serious loss to the community at large. There are few ladies of rank left behind of her public spirit and wide sympathies in Bengal. She had many virtues besides her well known public and private charities. She possessed all the generous and amiable qualities which adorn a lady of high birth and elevated position and which made her name a household word in every family of the city and the district. Strictly pious and devout, she kept up the memory of her august consort till her final end. With a political pension of Rs. 3,000 and odd a month, she maintained a very large establishment of her own. Her generosity and charity were so great, extensive and varied, that it is believed she leaves nothing of the wealth behind her. She always contributed her mite in alleviating the sufferings of the poor and the helpless. She leaves behind her an only son and heir Nawab Wala Qadar Husain Ali Mirza Bahadur, an amiable and intelligent prince.

It is a matter of great regret that the Lalbagh Sub-division will be abolished from the first of April next, and that the Munsiff's Court at Lalbagh will be removed to Jeagunj very soon, to the great disadvantage of the inhabitants of the city.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, 27th February, 1892.

The well-known Brahmo Missionary Baboo Protap Chunder Mozoomdar, has been at Monghyr for the last two days on a missionary tour. At Jamalpur, on the 25th instant, he delivered a lecture in the Mechanics' Institute Hall. He began with drawing notice to a famous incident recorded in the Christian Scriptures. When Jesus Christ was brought before Pontius Pilate, the Governor of Judea asked him what the accusation was against him and, on receiving Christ's reply that the complaint was that he bore witness to the truth, Pilate jestingly demanded "What is truth?" and immediately turned his back and left the room, without waiting for an answer.

The point of the lecture was directed against religious indifference, which seems to be just now greatly on the spread. As the lecturer remarked, there were jesting Pilates all over the world and that the spread of education and Western ideas did not appear to afford a safe-guard against the evil. There were jesting Pilates in all religious classes and creeds and the cause and secret of it all was a desire to please the senses--the advancement of the exterior at the sacrifice and expense of the interior or the inner self, which was allowed to have as it were a vegetable existence, such as a carrot or a turnip. The lecturer, in the course of a touching address in which, however, he did not mince matters and spared none of the wrong-doers of any religious denominations, class or creed, whether Christian, Hindoo, Mahomedan or of any other denomination, referred to the total extinction of Buddhism in India, a religion which at one time dominated the length and breadth of India, and he prophesied that if the spread of education had a tendency to make men irreligious, sooner or later, a time would come when education would be swept away from off the face of the earth and religion assert itself triumphantly. In an impassioned appeal and exhortation to his audience to try and lead a moral, holy and godly life, he warned them against the allurements of the three W's--Wealth, Wine and Woman, by none of which they should allow themselves to be enslaved. Towards the conclusion of his lecture, he related the history of Sakhya Mooni and said that, although he did not advise every man to follow his footsteps and become a religious mendicant and betake himself to the jungles, he would exhort them all to give less attention to the exterior than to the inner self and strive to lead godly lives and not to stifle the instinctive craving and hunger of the heart or soul after God, which at some time or other comes to every man, no matter what his ideas and conceptions of religion may be. He asked each one of his audience to try the effect of prayer and if there is any place in Jamalpur where people meet together to worship god, to go there. The Baboo then asked god's blessings on his audience. There were about 300 people, including several European ladies and gentlemen, who were very well pleased with the lecture and admitted that it was very impressive.

A case of misappropriation of Municipal Fund has recently occurred in the local Municipality. It is alleged that the Moonsee or 2nd clerk is implicated in the matter, against whom a warrant has already been issued.

The dread Influenza has made its appearance both here and at Monghyr. Two cases have proved fatal in one Bengallee and one up-country man at Monghyr and Jamalpur respectively. The other cases are rather of a mild type.

The prices of food grains have considerably risen and shew a tendency to farther rise.

SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT AND THE PURI MUNICIPALITY.

During his recent tour in Orissa, the Lieutenant-Governor visited Puri. After riding round the great temple of Juggannath and being shewn samples of the mahaprasad, or holy food, his Honor went to the Municipal Office to receive the following address:--

"We, the Municipal Commissioners of the town of Puri, beg to approach your Honor with this address of welcome on this your first visit to our town. In a place like Puri, which is one of the important centres of Hinduism, our civic functions are of a trying and intricate character; and however measures of sanitation may commend themselves to our judgment as just and proper, it is extremely difficult to carry them out in view of the religious feelings and sentiments of the people, which frequently constitute an obstruction in the path of sanitary reform. We have not, however, been remiss in the discharge of our trust, as the mortuary statistics of the town will bear out. We regret we have not been able to take up the cleaning of the Setgunga tank for want of funds.

"It is notorious that, owing to the influx of pilgrims all the year round, the conservancy and latrine arrangements swallow up a considerable portion of our revenue. The present contribution from the Lodging House Fund is by far too inadequate to afford sufficient help to the Municipality. The maintenance of the Pilgrim Hospital is a heavy charge upon our resources. The increase of the contribution from Rs. 4,000 to Rs. 6,000, supplemented by a grant of Rs. 2,000 by the District Board, as recommended by the Sanitary Commissioner, is eagerly excepted by us to improve the health of this large town. The drainage work undertaken by our predecessors in office, without having previously obtained a loan from Government, is a further drag on our resources. It is a misfortune that the recent cyclone has affected our income by damaging and destroying municipal and rate-payers' property, and thereby throwing additional burdens on us.

"In conclusion, we humbly thank your Honor for the trouble your Honor has taken in paying us this visit; and we sincerely pray that Providence will vouchsafe to your Honor and your Honor's family long life and prosperity, and render the whole term of your Honor's rule an epoch of continued progress of the people placed under your Honor's care."

Replying to the above, his Honor said:--

"I have to thank you for the address of welcome you have just read, and for the kind terms in which you have greeted me on my arrival in this place. I must, however, confess to a feeling of regret that the terms in which I am about to reply are not of such a kind as one likes to employ on an occasion like the present, when the Municipal Commissioners are assembled to meet their Lieutenant-Governor, when they ordinarily have a report of good work and progress to present, and when it is the natural result of such a meeting that all should afterwards separate with an increased regard for each other. The present, however, is an occasion on which, while wishing to treat you with the utmost courtesy, I should be failing in my duty, both to Government and to yourselves, were I not to explain in what way you have omitted to carry out your duties, and to point out to you your shortcomings. I fully appreciate what you have said as regards the unusual difficulties with which you have to contend, and I admit that it must be often hard to carry out certain works in such a manner as not to offend the religious prejudices or principles of the people whom you represent. It would neither be right for you to offend those prejudices, nor for the Government even to ask you to do so, but there are many matters connected with good administration and sanitation, into which the question of religious prejudice does not in any way enter, and I would invite you to take much more active steps in these matters than you have hitherto been in the habit of doing. In the first place, you put forward the plea of poverty as an excuse for the present state of affairs, and say that, when the Lodging House Fund raises its contribution from Rs. 4,000 to Rs. 6,000 supplemented by a possible grant of Rs. 2,000 from the District Board, you hope to be able to carry out great improvements; but I wish to draw your particular attention to the present amount of income which is already yours, and which you do not even take the trouble to collect. During the three-quarters which have elapsed of the year 1891, the demand on account of latrine-tax, house-tax and land rent amounted to the sum of Rs. 28,000, but you only collected Rs. 14,500, or very little over half the amount due to you. Now, what is the use of your talking of the works you are going to do with an increased grant of Rs. 4,000 from other sources when you do not take the trouble to collect Rs. 13,500 of the funds to which you are already entitled? These remarks refer to the income which you are entitled to collect. But that income ought to be increased. The present assessment of the town was settled in 1888, and in the year 1891 the time came round for a new assessment, when, very correctly, you divided up the town into different portions, and allotted one to every two Commissioners, telling them to draw out lists of houses and to visit and assess them according to their true value. But having done this, you did no more; the work was never carried out, and I am told that up to the present day not one single Commissioner has even given in his record of reassessment.

Regarding the expenditure of the funds you have actually received, I do not feel called on to make very unfavourable remarks on the manner of its distribution. On education, however, I find you spend almost nothing; nothing is done for vaccination, and for registration but very little. Your funds are limited, it is true, and I admit that the conservancy and cleaning of the roads necessitated by the great traffic caused by pilgrimages require an unusually large part of your available means; but it is necessary to point out to you how serious the results of these limitations are. You have hitherto only afforded a little aid to one Middle Vernacular School and one Girls' School, and you have recently promised the Magistrate to open some Primary Schools. What I would urge upon you is, that sufficient opportunities for primary education should be afforded for all boys of a school-going age, to enable them to receive sufficient education to hold their own in competition with the boys of other parts of Bengal. It seems to be a freely admitted fact among you all, that Orissa is very backward in the matter of education, and yet you have hitherto done almost nothing towards affording your boys improved facilities for acquiring education. Personally, I should be very glad to find every office in Orissa filled with Uriya officials, and I am sure that Mr. Toynbee, the Commissioner, agrees with me; but, of course, Government are bound to accept the best candidate they can get. If a Bengali and an Uriya candidate of exactly equal qualifications come forward, there is no doubt but that the latter will be taken; but if the Bengali shows decided superiority, then, of course, Government is bound to accept him. I wish you, therefore, to very seriously consider this question of providing larger means of education.

I have been speaking so far of the amount of money which you have spent; but now I would like just to look into the question whether it is well and judiciously spent. About 48 per cent. of your funds have been laid out on conservancy and road cleaning; but has all that might have been done with this money been actually done? Going through your town yesterday and to-day, I have found that most houses have cesspools which open on and discharge into the street. Such a filthy state of things I have seen in no other town in Bengal, and it is very certain there can be no possible offence to religious principles in altering this. The conservancy arrangements are at present of the poorest and most offensive type, and the cesspools could be easily arranged to discharge their contents into reservoirs at the back of the houses instead of on to the street front. Most of your houses seem to be well and strongly built, standing on well-raised stone plinths, and you have therefore every element for a good drainage system, and yet the present state of things exists. I do not think the cost of these charges ought to fall upon the Municipality, but they ought to be carried out at the expense of the owners of the houses. Then, again, the state of the public burial-ground for paupers has been described as horrible. Your Magistrate, Mr. Allen, very rightly recommended you to build a burning place, and you erected a good chabutra with surrounding walls for cremation; but immediately the Magistrate went away on leave and turned his back, you turned yours also, and permitted the chabutra to fall into disuse and disrepair. Now this sort of conduct is neither creditable to you nor to that system of Local Self-Government which has, perhaps, the reputation of being more flourishing and better appreciated in Bengal than in any other part of India. The next question is that of the four great sacred tanks in the town. Some of them are very fine, but at the same time the water in them must be very unwholesome, and there can be very little doubt but that they are a great source of disease among the large number of pilgrims who come to them. It is very certain that something must be done to cleanse these large sacred tanks. The tank, which is the most sacred of all, called the Setgunga tank, is in the very midst of your houses, and as it is very deep and the water level is very low, it is therefore very foul, indeed; and yet the Municipal Commissioners do not seem even to have thought out any plan for cleaning it. Recently, during a visit to Gya, I came across just such another deep and foul tank surrounded by houses, but immediately it was pointed out to him, the mohant at once promised to have it dewatered and cleaned out, and made no difficulty about the matter. Surely what was possible in Gya must be equally so here. It would be very gratifying, therefore, to hear that some wealthy mohant or other gentleman had come forward and undertaken to do the work. If, however, this should not happen, the Municipality must do it themselves, and if they raise objections to the work, then Government must enforce it. It seems to me that the best and only method of cleansing and keeping the tank clear will be to put in some sort of pucca flooring, and to repair the masonry sides, so as to prevent any drainage entering the tank, and to have the water changed at least once a year.

And now, gentlemen, having drawn your attention to these matters, I must tell you that I have been very seriously considering what steps it will be necessary for the Government to take. The one course open under the present Municipal Act is to issue an order, under Section 64, and if it is not obeyed, then under Sections 65 and 66 to suspend the Municipality; but this would have entailed great discredit on all concerned, and undoubtedly the vernacular papers would have taken up the subject and pointed at Puri the finger of scorn. But another course will very shortly be open, for in an amended Municipal Bill, which is now being considered, there is a proposal that Government should have power to put a Municipality into schedule 2. There are already some Municipalities under this schedule, but by some unfortunate oversight such a rule as is now being proposed was omitted in the original Act. I am anxious specially to draw your attention to this amending Bill, because I see that an agitation is being got up against it, and people are saying that I am aiming a blow at Local Self-Government, and instituting a retrograde measure. This is a complete mistake, and the working of the Municipal law in Puri is a good example of the benefit which my proposed amendment will do. Instead of passing an order which will convey a direct and severe censure, a milder policy will be open. When this amendment has been passed, Government will have the power to order any Municipality to be placed in the second schedule, and will then be able to order the Chairman to be a Government official, and to see that work is properly carried out. It would, however, be pleasanter and more satisfactory if you yourselves were to move in this direction, and ask your present Chairman to resign, and take care to appoint in his place an official who is trained in sanitary matters, and is strong enough to not only give the necessary orders, but to see also that they are efficiently carried out. Such an official will be found in your Civil Surgeon, who is naturally designated as the most suitable Chairman of such a Municipality as this. I have no present intention of putting the power vested in Government under the old Act into force, by suspending the Municipality, but as soon as the new Act has been passed, I mean to appoint an official Chairman; but if you choose to do so, you have the power to forestall my intention in the manner I have just suggested.

Before closing this reply, I wish to refer to another subject. There is sitting in Calcutta at the present time a voluntary Committee to take measures on behalf of the sanitation of Puri, and the town owes a great debt of gratitude to its members, and especially to Babu Jadu Lal Mullick, and Babu Raj Kumar Sarbadhikari the Secretary, for all the trouble they have taken for the improvement of this place. I think, however, the Committee are somewhat mistaken in attributing to the water supply the cause of so much illness and suffering among the pilgrims. There is no dearth of wells containing good water in the town from which the residents obtain their supplies, and from which pilgrims also could get theirs, and if the residents do not suffer from the water, it cannot surely be said that the well water is the cause of disease among the pilgrims. There must, therefore, be some special cause affecting the pilgrims alone, as the Magistrate, Mr. Allen, has very justly remarked, and this cause no doubt is the insanitary habits of the pilgrims, and their custom of drinking the polluted waters of the sacred tanks in which diseased people bathe as freely as any others. No doubt, too, many of the pilgrims arrive from long distances, feeble and exhausted, and therefore more susceptible to disease. Mr. Allen has in a praiseworthy manner been devoting himself to the general welfare of these travellers before even they reach Puri, and has been endeavouring to lessen the hardships of the road by establishing and improving chattras, by erecting hospitals, and appointing health officers and special native doctors at the season the pilgrims are most numerous. The other probable cause of disease remains, and it is my intention to have a proper analysis made of the water in each of these large tanks, and also of the water from three or four of the most used wells. If the well water is found, as we believe, to be good, then the question must be considered as to whether there are sufficient wells, and if not, then more must be constructed. If the tank water is as bad as I conceive, every nerve must be strained to purify it, and keep it clean, and in these combined ways, by looking after the health of the pilgrims on the road to and from Puri, by protecting and increasing the supply of well water, and by turning the tanks from receptacles of liquid sewage to reservoirs of fair wholesome water, I trust we may succeed in lessening the terrible mortality among the unfortunate pilgrims, and effacing the stigma which now attaches to this place.

WONDERFUL MEDICINE.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

ARE universally admitted to be worth A GUINEA A BOX. BENGAL'S NIGHTMARE.

In the beginning when the earth was void,
And Nature bore the pall of endless night,
And on the waters Brahma mov'd alone;
God said, Let there be light: and there was light.

But times are chang'd,—our mortal gods are grown
Severer, grimmer, if not wiser all;
Lord Vilyet said, Let all be black; and all
Was black,—cutchery—counter—durbar hall.

The Lord of heav'n is serv'd by saints in white,
But the old order giveth place to new;
And men may murmur, men may fret and fume,
All must be black—that's English plain for you.

Lucifer's mask! Saturnian badge of woe!
Of old despis'd in India's sun-bright shore!
O negro outcast of all hues divine!
Thou count'st with vulgar triumph to the fore!

But yesterday yon lordly mansion teen'd
With visitors of high and low degree;
The scene, though festal, yet a grave-yard seem'd,
For all were clad in fun'ral drapery.

Each at his neighbour look'd with eyes aghast,
Common the colour,—common was the pain;
Save one old jester who enjoy'd the fun,
All suffer'd from a black-oppressed brain.

Black, black above—below! black, black around!
And not a bit of linen bright was there!
A darkling stream of black flow'd in and out!
Good Heaven! save us from this black despair.

An Apka-wasté with a tail I met—
Perpetual Omedwar for honor,—place:
O horror! with his limbs encas'd in black,
He look'd a very ghost in garb and face!

O Apka-wasté! Apka-wasté! poor
Light-headed loon! what is it ails thee, man?
With tear-drops streaming down his sunken cheeks,
He pointed to his—chogu and chapcân.

O Apka-wasté! Apka-wasté! poor
Light-headed loon! go, burn thy livery!
"Alas! I can't; I wait upon the great,—
Their smiles and spurns are meat and drink to me.

"Yet, sooth to say, I can endure no more
This black, which sore offends my taste and pride;
It haunts my waking thoughts—my nightly dreams:
My only hope now lies in suicide."

I ask'd a patriotic orator,
An editor, and then a saintly Bhai—
What made them wear the regulation suit,
Shocking alike to cultur'd taste and eye?

And the three with one voice made answer quick:
"Place hath its charms,—and birth-day honors too;
'Tis something to have both—but chief a tail,
To lend just weight to all we say and do!

"Yet, sooth to say, we can endure no more
This horrid black, which is Kal Bhairav's own;
It haunts our waking thoughts—our nightly dreams,
And soon, we fear, our callings will be gone!"

Is this a choga black I see before
Me, with the sleeves all dangling tow'rd my hand?
Come, let me wear thee. O Vishnu! Vishnu!
That hideous nightmare maddens all the land!

City of Blacknesses! farewell! farewell!
I go where no sartorial censor dwells:
Who knows but motley yet may be thy wear,
With peak'd cap and little tinkling bells!

RAM SHARMA.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE gathering of all nations at the Chicago Exhibition, next year, will be taken advantage of to hold a Congress of the Creeds.

CAN it be that

"In the Japanese language there is no imperative mood, no form of oath, no form of abuse. The worst name you can call a man is 'fellow,' and when you wish to express great indignation you shout 'There! There!'"

Heavenly people!

THE ladies have been avenged:—

"Prof. Dr. Bishoff of Munich always maintained the mental inferiority of women over against men on the ground of a man's brain being 1,350 grams and that of woman's only 1,250; after his death the postmortem examination elicited the interesting fact that his own brain weighed only 1,245 grams!"

Holloway's Pills are admirably adapted for the cure of diseases incidental to females. At different periods of life women are subject to complaints which require a peculiar medicine, and it is now an indisputable fact that there is none so suitable for such complaints as Holloway's Pills. They are invaluable to females of all ages young or old, married or single. They purify the blood, regulate the secretions, correct all suspended functions, give tone to the stomach, and clear the complexion. The first approach of disordered action should be met with appropriate doses of these Pills; whilst taking them no restriction need be placed over the patient. They contain nothing which can possibly prove injurious to the system. They act by purifying the blood and regulating every organ.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

THE Abyssinian King Theodore's son, who has hitherto been a wild scamp often brought up before the magistracy on charges of assault and battery and other forms of violence, is, at last, on the road to improvement, let us hope. He is now going in for religion. At any rate, he has formed a permanent alliance within the pale of Orthodoxy, having wedded the daughter of an English minister of the Church.

THE most interesting tribute to the memory of the late Pandit Ajoodhianath has been paid by Mr. Justice Knox of Allahabad. He sent a wreath to be placed on the funeral pyre. Such avowal by an Englishman of friendship for an Indian, is rare indeed. It is said that a similar honor was done to Wasudeo Balwant Phadke, the "Dacoit" of the Deccan, by an English lady. It will be remembered how, after a long and arduous trial, Phadke was transported for life and removed to Aden, instead of the Andaman Islands. The occasion of his departure brought a great crowd of people to the Poona railway station to see the convict off. In the midst of the noise and confusion of the affecting leave-taking, an English lady stepped forth and put a wreath round Mr. Phadke's neck and shook hands with him saying, "you are truly born."

NAWAB Abdool Luteef Bahadar has received the following letter :—
"Government House, Portsmouth.

February 12, 1892.

My dear Nawab,

I am desired by H. R. H. the Duke of Connaught to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo offering your condolence to H. R. H. and all the members of the Royal Family in their great grief, for which H. R. H. is deeply grateful.

H. R. H. wishes to offer his best thanks to all the members of the Mahomedan Literary Society, through you, for their kind and loyal expressions of sorrow and condolence.

The loyal feelings of sympathy expressed by all races and classes in India tend to soften the terrible blow.

Believe me, yours truly,
C. ROSDEW BURN, Capt.,
A. D. C. in waiting."

It will be remarked that His Royal Highness does not speak in his individual character but as a representative of his family, and thanks not the Nawab only but all the members of the Mahomedan Literary Society.

THIS is how the Emperor of Germany has offended the Court of England and shocked the respectability of Europe :—

"The Emperor received an intimation that the Duke of Clarence was in a practically hopeless state while he was shooting at Buckeburg. His Majesty, however, proceeded with his sport, and even on the following morning, when he received a telegram from Berlin conveying the news of the Duke's death, he did not return to his capital, but had another day's shooting, and he did not reach Berlin until the afternoon of Friday, the 15th. Then, instead of driving direct to the palace of the Empress Frederick, the Emperor went home, and twenty-four hours elapsed before he visited his mother, while he did not present himself at the British Embassy until Sunday afternoon. Then a Court mourning of only ten days was commanded by the Emperor instead of three weeks, as had been expected. It was observed, moreover, that the flag at the Schloss was not lowered to half-mast, and when his cousin was being buried, the Emperor, instead of attending the memorial service at Berlin, in accordance with his mother's earnest request, was holding an inspection of recruits at Kiel, a function which could perfectly well have been postponed. Lastly, the Emperor, apparently out of pure 'cussedness,' would not allow his brother Prince Henry to come to England to attend the funeral, although his presence at the ceremony was particularly desired by the Empress Frederick and by the Queen and Royal Family, and H. R. H. was himself anxious to attend."

So writes the World. The young gentleman in imperial purple has gratuitously added an ingredient of peculiar bitterness to the cup of sorrow of our sovereign.

THE following from a letter of the London correspondent of the Manchester Courier, is going the round :—

"One very touching exemplification of the extremely affectionate nature of the late Duke of Clarence was his desire to see his old valet, Mr. Fuller. This gentleman had been with him right from boyhood. He went with him on all his travels, and shared all his adventures, and, in fact, was treated by the Duke rather as an intimate friend than as a servant. The Duke was very eager to see his old friend, and when he expressed his desire, Mr. Fuller, who was at St. James's Palace, engaged in the Duke's apartments, was telegraphed for, and immediately hurried to Sandringham. The Duke was unconscious at the time, but in a fitful gleam of returning sensibility, he recognised his old valet, and, only able to articulate very indistinctly, whispered his pleasure, and warmly grasped his hand. Though the official account does not say so, yet Mr. Fuller was allowed to remain in the death-chamber to the last."

That was very good of the dear boy, and it will stand him in good stead in the court to which he has gone—better than many an ostentatious act of goodness. One thing in that account puzzles us. Is Fuller—we beg his pardon, Mr. Fuller, a gentleman? Is the menial service of the Palace performed by gentlemen? There are noble Ladies of the Bedchamber, we read. Are the offices of footmen and valets held by gentle folk?

THE stronger sex is the weaker sex, after all. The writer of "The Old Saloon" in Blackwood, points out that it is men who break down from over work, not women. Thus the collapse of M. de Maupassant is attributed to the number of volumes written by him during the last twelve years. Yet Miss Braddon or Mrs. Oliphant has written more books without any signs of collapse. They go on serenely with a smile piling up volume on volume. This was the case with George Sand too. For strength and endurance the Mussets and Chopins and Flauberts were pigmies before the brilliant and volatile but energetic and ever-active Madame Dudevant.

A WOMAN, named Jane Rowe, of Marazion, in Cornwall, had been for several years troubled with a live lizard in her body. She had been suffering much from violent pains in the stomach, which nothing could remove. Recently, after taking some medicine, she vomited and threw out to her relief and amazement a living lizard from four to five inches long.

INAUDI is a strange calculating human machine. On February 13, in the Sorbonne, at Paris, before an audience of professors and pupils of all the Lycées, he worked out in no time abstruse arithmetical problems. He never faltered and effected multiplications and divisions of sums containing twenty-four figures and extracted square and cube roots with seventeen decimal places. While so quick in arithmetic, he reads and writes but indifferently well, and cannot commit to memory the shortest extract from a literary work.

A CENTENARIAN has just passed away at Brightlingsea, in the person of Thomas Wilshire Summerson. He was born at Colchester on November 20, 1791, and celebrated his one hundredth birthday last November. The death was the result of an accidental fall.

ONE older than Summerson, and of the opposite sex—the oldest woman in Vienna—just dead—Margaret Gieshing, was 117 years of age.

A FRENCH Doctor—Constantin Paul—has a cure for neurasthenia, or that state of the nervous system which deprives the muscles of contractibility. The remedy consists of the subcutaneous injection of a solution of the grey matter of a sheep's brain sterilized and thrown into the blood by means of an Arsonval apparatus. The dose is 5 cubic centimetres. The Doctor made several experiments, and in no case was there a reaction. The first injection made the patients lively and, after a series, the muscular strength returned and the paralysed were able to walk.

THE enquiry, under Act XXXVII of 1850, into the charges against Mr. P. C. Wheeler, C.S., has closed. The Commission intimated its intention of submitting the report to Government as early as possible this week. The public must wait for the result till the Government have considered the report.

THE great American lexicon of the English language, which, under the name of the "Century Dictionary," was begun in 1881, is now complete, in six volumes, the last having just been issued. The great Transatlantic Sanskritist and linguist, Professor Whitney, of Yale University, has been the Editor-in-Chief. It is a gigantic work, consisting of 7,046 large quarto pages, and containing 500,000 definitions of over 215,000 words, 50,000 defined phrases, 300,000 illustrative quotations and 8,000 cuts. It claims to be the greatest American publishing enterprise. Over 750,000 dollars, in cash, has been spent on it, and its total cost, including interest on the money invested, has been $1,000,000. They have already sold 15,000 copies.

THE Sessions Judge of Cuttack sentenced, on admission of guilt, Kadumba Strila, a girl of sixteen or seventeen years of age, to death, for murder of a boy of eight years of age, for the sake of his ornaments. The High Court—Messrs. Justices Norris and Beverley—confirmed the conviction but reduced the sentence to transportation for life. The Judges remarked:—

"We have carefully examined the evidence recorded by the Sessions Judge and by the committing Magistrate, and we are of opinion that it fully bears out the plea of guilty. It only remains for us therefore to consider the question of sentence. We quite agree with the Sessions Judge that the murder of children for the sake of ornaments they may happen to be wearing is one of the worst forms of murder, and in ordinary cases we should have no hesitation in confirming the sentence of death imposed in such cases. In the present case, moreover, we can find no mitigating circumstance whatever so far as regards the offence itself. The accused, though young, seems to have been fully aware of the nature and the consequences of the act she committed. She seems to have taken the child away with her for the purpose of killing him. She killed him in broad daylight, and she proceeded to secrete his body in a tank. At the same time, we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that she is little more than a child herself, and that from the time when she was taxed with the crime she has admitted her guilt, and therefore thrown herself upon the mercy of the Court. We think we may accept this as evidence of genuine sorrow for the crime committed, and we think we may fairly take such sorrow into consideration. In this view we do not think that the end of justice requires the infliction of the extreme penalty of the law, and we accordingly set aside the sentence of death, and in lieu thereof sentence the accused, Kadumba Strila, to transportation for life."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Prince and Princess of Wales with Prince George started on the 9th for Mentone. They all needed change of scene.

In preëssing the Army Estimates in the House of Commons, Mr. Stanhope explained

"That the British Army in India and in the Colonies was in a thoroughly efficient condition, and was the largest force that had been available, since the Peninsular War. He was, he said, willing to consider the advice given in the report of the Wantage Committee, without depleting the Reserve or introducing an extensive pension system. The strength of the Reserve would, he said, reach 80,000 in April, 1893. Referring to the defences at home and abroad, he said that a vast improvement had taken place, and plans had been arranged for the proper defence of London. Mr. Stanhope dwelt on the success of the Lee-Metford rifle and the use of smokeless powder, and referred to the improved barrack accommodation which had lately been provided. He hoped to be able shortly to provide soldiers with free kit."

The Naval expenditure for 1892-93 has been fixed at £14,250,000.

THE Jury have found Mrs. Osborne guilty of perjury, and she has been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment with such labor as her present delicate health would bear. An exemplification of the Bengali proverb, the mother gets the benefit of the child—to be.

MR. Hastings, M. P., has been found guilty and sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

THE Currency Commissions at Vienna and Pesth have declared for a gold standard and against bimetallicism. The Madrid merchants, following their decision, have asked the Spanish Premier for coinage of gold and non-coinage of silver.

DURING the debate on the Indian Councils Bill in the House of Lords, the Premier made a most important statement.

"Lord Salisbury said he would be sorry that it should be believed that Government looked upon such representation as being confined to municipal bodies. He must demur to the idea. They were necessarily the main bodies in India to which this additional representation should be given. Care must be taken lest by the application of occidental machinery there was brought in not the strong and effective elements of Indian society, but the artificial influence of the weakly elements. It would be a great evil if the really strong portion of Indian Society under any system of Government did not retain that share of government to which their natural position among the people traditionally entitled them."

That, we confess, is reassuring. Such a reform in the constitution as this Bill essays, however necessary, is, in the present circumstances of the country, obviously a step forward, if not a leap, in the dark. There is no knowing to a certainty where you may be landed. It is something, therefore, to know from the present repository of power that the Ministry are alive to the situation. In Ireland, in connection with the Local Government Bill introduced last month, the Government are afraid of the minority being swamped in the elections from its operation. In India, there is reason to fear that, in the working of the Indian Councils Bill, the respectability of the country may be ignored. The Government feel this and they will take care to prevent such a calamitous absurdity.

ON the other Indian Bill—the Indian Officers' Bill, Lord Salisbury, speaking to the suggestion of Lord Lorthbrook for exemption of the Viceroy, said that "he thought a considerable amount of difficulty might have been avoided when he was Secretary of State for India and Lord Northbrook Viceroy, and when there were considerable differences of opinion between them, if Lord Northbrook could have come home for consultation."

The Bill has been passed by the Lords.

ON the 18th February, Mr. Balfour introduced the Irish Local Government Bill. He said that the Bill would give to the cess-payers in Irish Counties and Baronies full power to manage their own affairs. The franchise would be the same as in England, but the Irish County Councils would have more extensive functions than the British ones. Mr. Balfour proceeded:—

"There are people who say that popularly elected bodies in Ireland, would be extravagant and corrupt, and would oppress the minority. Government was, therefore, determined to have a minority vote, and also other safeguards. Twenty cess-payers might apply to the Judge of Assize for leave to petition for the removal of a County Council on the ground of wilful and persistent disobedience of the law. If the petition was granted, the Council would be tried before two Election Judges and might be removed, a new Council being appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor."

Here the speaker was greeted by a storm of disapprobation. There were hooting, jeering, laughing from different parts of the House, with cries of "Keep your Bill to yourself" from the Irish members in special. After a brief pause, Mr. Balfour went on and concluded by saying:—

"I do not expect this bill will regenerate Ireland or settle the Irish questions, but after what we have done for England and Scotland it is a right which Irishmen may claim and will bring all classes together. Other measures I have introduced I consider more important, namely, the Crimes Bill, the Light Railway Bill, and the Land Purchase Bill."

THE Irish Bill seems a clever piece of work, which grants as much latitude as any wise ministry would give to the Irish in their present condition and attitude, with a few indispensable safeguards. But the very liberality of Government as it cuts the ground under faction, seems to have exasperated the Opposition. The Bill has been virulently attacked in the House and out of it. Mr. Morley anathematised the proposal as a monstrous imposture, and called upon the Government to commit suicide by instant dissolution. According to Mr. Redmond, the Bill was an insult to Ireland. Mr. McCarthy could only ask the House to "Reject the unclean thing." Sir William Harcourt called it simply rubbish.

IN the press, the Times says that, a few years ago the Irish Local Government Bill would have been regarded as extravagantly liberal and democratic. The Daily Telegraph describes in the Bill only the shadow, not the substance, of Home Rule, while the Daily News says that nothing more extraordinary has ever been submitted to the judgment of the House of Commons, and that not Mr. Balfour's very opponents ever imagined that he would have devised so thoroughly bad and hopeless a measure. Of course, in Ireland the anger is hotter, and the language more extravagant. The well-known Dublin paper, Freeman's Journal, says that the Bill may be briefly and compendiously described as Mr. Balfour's joke.

THE following telegram gives the latest news:—

"News from the Irrawaddy Column says that it left Sadon on the 26th ultimo for Namlikoo. On the Sansi road it attacked a village which was defended by 15 stockades and numerous pitfalls. The position was outflanked and the village burnt in the evening. The enemy's loss was six killed and many wounded; our loss was five men wounded. The stockades were composed of earthworks and circular redoubts, clearly showing Chinese assistance. The Column arrived at Sansi on the frontier on the 28th at an altitude of 9,200 feet, overlooking the source of the Meungkhia, flowing down a valley about a mile long on the Chinese side. It reached Sadon again on the 18th instant. The North-Eastern Column left for Nkraw on the 31d. General Stewart is expected at Sadon on the 9th."

THE Calcutta municipal elections, the second under Act II (B.C.) of 1888, come off on Tuesday next, the 15th instant. There are eighty-four candidates for the fifty Commissioners to be elected. Four of these have chosen two Wards each to ensure their return. Of the 25, 8 Wards, Nos. 5, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 20, 22, are uncontested. In Ward 1, there are as many as eight candidates, in No. 23, six, five in each of the Wards 6, 21, and 24. In four Wards, four, or twice the required number, have come forward for the honor. In the remaining Wards, there is for each one in excess of the legal number. The superfluous number does not in every instance represent bona fide candidature. In some of the Wards, it has been adopted as an electioneering trick, to allow the real candidates more agents at the booths than the rules permit. Of the total number, broadly speaking, 59 are Hindus, 13 Christians and 12 Mahomedans. Most of the retiring Commissioners seek re-election.

The day will not be observed as a public holiday, as at previous elections, but the Lieutenant-Governor has been pleased to direct that all public offices under the Government of Bengal, which are situated within the limits of municipal Calcutta shall, as far as can be arranged without detriment to the public service, be closed at 2 P.M. on that date. The heads of departments have been requested that the necessary steps may be taken to give effect to this order in the case of all offices under them. It is hoped that the heads of those offices which it is thought inexpedient to close on the afternoon in question will make arrangements, so that every assistant under them may be able, if he wishes, to record his vote.

THE confessional is undoubtedly one of the peculiarities of the Romish Church which is specially viewed with angry jealousy and suspicion by opponents. It will startle and pain not a few Christians of other denominations when they learn, as they may now do, on the authority of a Protestant clergyman in a periodical called the Newbury House Magazine, that as many as twelve hundred clergymen of the Church of England hear confessions in private. This must be worse than the sartorial and other frippery of Ritualism. If this is true, we are afraid Protestantism in England is being thoroughly undermined.

We Pagans who go the whole length with the most protesting of Protestants in keeping our sins to ourselves, without surrendering ourselves into the hands of any mortal, have no acquaintance with this remarkable religious institution. The Roman Catholics who follow it, say that the practice of confessing has a most tranquilising and spiritualising effect. We can imagine this possible. But, then, prescribed religious exercises are apt to degenerate into mummeries from which the soul has vanished. That is probably the view of moderate Protestants. Protestant polemics are not content with that, however. They take serious exception to the practice as positively baleful. A single sentence from a well-known Protestant divine, Dr. Cumming, will show in what light it is held by Protestants :—

"Sigouri's work, recommended by Cardinal Wiseman, contains things connected with the confession of sins so horrible, so atrocious, so pestilential, so offensive to every sense of delicacy, and every feeling of religion, that their horribleness is their only and impenetrable shelter. I dare not read them." Cumming's Lectures, p. 55.

THE Native Press in India has been accused of habitually drawing the long bow. But at their best, native journalists are indifferent hands before the artists of the European and American Press. What Hindu, Mahomedan or Parsee is capable of the delightful sea story told in some of the papers to hand by a recent London mail?—

"The whaling ship Star of the East, while seeking its prey off the Falkland Islands sighted a whale three miles off on the starboard quarter. Two boats were manned and eventually the monster was harpooned. He dragged the boat five miles away, and then with great consideration brought it back again. The men in the second boat then threw their harpoon, and after a frightful struggle the whale sank. The harpoon lines were still slack however, and when the men hauled them taut, the whale came again to the surface, lashed about furiously, and eventually upset one of the boats, and two of the men disappeared. Their bodies were sought without avail, and presently the whale—by this time dead—was towed to the ship and hauled aboard, and the men cut away at it with axes and spades to get at the fat. After working all day and part of the night they suspended operations till the next forenoon, and when they got to the stomach of the animal they were spell-bound to detect something moving inside it. It was, of course, one of the missing seamen, James Bartley by name and he was taken out, revived by copious douching with cold water, and after being confined a raving lunatic in the captain's cabin for a fortnight, he regained his senses, and was able to tell his Jonah-like experiences. He remembered, he said, 'the sensation of being lifted into the air by the nose of the whale and of falling into the water. Then there was a fearful rushing sound, which I believe to be the beating of the water by the whale's tail; then I was encompassed by fearful darkness, and felt myself slipping along a smooth passage of some sort that seemed to move and carry me forward. This sensation lasted but an instant, then I felt that I had more room. I felt about me and my hands came in contact with a yielding shiny substance that seemed to shrink from my touch.' It finally dawned upon him that he had been swallowed by the whale, and he was overcome with horror at the situation. He could breathe easily, but the heat was terrible. It was not of a scorching, stifling nature, but it seemed to open the pores of his skin and to draw out his vitality. He became very weak, and grew sick at the stomach. He knew that there was no hope of escape from his strange prison. Death stared him in the face, and he tried to look at it bravely; but the awful quiet, the fearful darkness, the horrible knowledge of his environment, and the terrible heat finally overcame him, and he must have fainted, for the next he remembered was being in the captain's cabin. The marks of his entombment he will carry with him to his dying day, for the action of the gastric juices in the whale's belly 'bleached his face and hands to a deadly whiteness, and the skin was wrinkled giving the man the appearance of having been parboiled.'"

That is an admirable account, betraying true genius, before which the monster-births which the vernacular papers of India deal in are child's play. An Edgar Allan Poe need not be ashamed to own the creation of this modern Jonah. Such is the vraisemblance of the narrative that we shall not be surprised if, in some grave religious circles, it be seriously adopted as a confirmation of Holy Writ. Were it not for the initial physical impracticability of any whale, however naughtily inclined, accomplishing the swallowing feat, the account has every chance of being accepted among the proofs of the recorded miracles.

A CHARACTERISTIC anecdote comes all the way from Morocco. It is one of the amusements of the ladies of the European society of the capital to visit the houses of the principal Moors or Mussulmans. At one of these meetings in the zenana, a beautiful young girl shrieked and fainted at seeing one of the visitors in the act of removing her glove. The young girl thought the Whitewoman was removing the whole skin of her hand. The sight of the operation gave her so much shock that she fell down, and it was some time before she regained consciousness. It would be curious to enquire into the rationale of the phenomenon. It is not to be supposed that the dark-eyed Peri imagined that the Nararene lady intended to commit suicide by flaying herself alive. Is it possible that the ignorant prisoner of the Harem believed the Giaour to be disburdening herself of her thick cuticle in order to ventilate and cool her inner man—her subcutaneous self? It is related of Sydney Smith that in an extraordinarily hot summer, the perspiring British wit talked of doffing his skin and sitting or lounging in his bones. The Europeans in the grilling atmosphere of Morocco might, in the same way, hanker after the enjoyment of an unencumbered anatomy.

NOTWITHSTANDING the molestation of the fanatics of the dominant creed, the little Mahomedan colony in Liverpool is slowly but surely gaining ground. They have already got a neat little mosque, and now contemplate founding a Muslim College, to be under the principalship of Professor Karl Falkner, of the Universities of Basle and Zurich. It is believed that there will be no insuperable difficulty in raising the necessary funds. The world of Islam is vast in numbers and liberal by disposition. Given the required amount of intelligence, and it will readily maintain a worthy centre of influence and action in the heart of Europe. Already a great many Mahomedans in Turkey, India, Syria, Egypt and the British Colonies on the West Coast of Africa, are alive to the advantage of giving their children a good English education, but they are averse from sending them to Europe lest their young hopefuls should be made Giaours of. The College, which of course will adjoin the new mosque, will give just the required facilities for a Mahomedan education in arts and sciences and modern and ancient languages which the paterfamilias of Islam wants, or at least would prefer.—It is also intended to purchase land for a Moslem cemetery.

FOLLOWING upon our article last week on "The Sick Man," we have much pleasure to announce, on the authority of the New Freie Presse, that Turkey has been able to raise the effective strength of her army to a million men, of whom 700,000 would be available for service at any time anywhere. The difficulty now is to arm and equip them properly. Besides the Winchester central-fire carbine, there are three different systems of fire-arms in vogue in the Turkish army. These are

"500,000 Martini-Henry Rifles of an old system, 220,000 Mausers, and an order has been given for 280,000 Mannlichers to the German manufacturer, Loewe. As this difference of systems is naturally calculated to have serious consequences, it has been decided to reconstruct the Martini-Henry after the model of the new Mannlicher, so that there would be 780,000 rifles available for the troops of the line and reserves, while the stock of Mausers would be distributed to the Bashi-Bazuks and other irregular troops."

AMONG the distinguished visitors to Calcutta at the end of the present season, are Admiral Ahmad Ratib Pasha, A.D.C. to the Sultan of Turkey, and the Turkish Consul General of Bombay, who are on a tour throughout India. This is their first visit to the city of Palaces. They were entertained at dinner by Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur, at his residence, on Wednesday. Dinner was followed by nautches to which a very select number of Princes, noblemen and gentlemen of Calcutta were invited. The guests of the evening seemed evidently pleased with the party given in their honor, and admired the nautches which were quite novel to them.

SIR James Lyall has gone out and Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick has come in as Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. The Maharajas of Cashmere and Patiala, the Nawab of Bahawalpore and the Rajas of Jhind, Nabha, Kapurthala, Nahan, Faridkote and Chamba were at Lahore to bid farewell to the old and welcome the new Lieutenant-Governor. The members of the Punjab Commission entertained the retiring chief to a dinner. In replying to the toast of his health, Sir James said that "his time had been a time of quiet internal administration in the Punjab, and his successor, who he trusted would have less frontier troubles, would no doubt be able to do more in many ways than he himself had done, especially if finance continued to improve." Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick is sure to stamp his individuality on the administration.

SIR Charles Elliott is determined to push on the Cadastral Survey in Behar. The prayer that it be postponed on account of the threatened scarcity in Behar, has fallen flat on an unheeding ear. The local Government thinks the argument of scarcity is not valid, considering "that the cost of the traverse survey is all that will be incurred this survey year, and that it will not fall on the land." Besides, "it may be hoped that next season the crops will be good. The field survey will not begin till then."

The present survey is justified on the action of the late Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Stuart Bayley, Behar's own. In 1889, on the recommendation of that Lieutenant-Governor, the survey was postponed on the same grounds as now taken by the Behar people—to procure similar relief. The distant Secretary of State, in his sympathy for the poor people, went so far as to command that the harassing operation—the survey—was not to be commenced until "the people recovered from the loss caused by the scarcity." The pity of it is, however, that the Secretary of State further ordered that "your Government will arrange for the diligent prosecution of the undertaking as soon as the circumstances of the country permit."

The people of Behar now begin to feel the commencement of the specified loss. The shadow of Famine is already on the land. But that is not considered sufficient reason to stay the dear measure that has been determined upon. There is an appeal to the Viceroy who, we doubt not, will fully consider the matter. We trust His Excellency will rise to the height of the occasion and decide the question independently of bureaucratic influence. There is a peculiar heartlessness in forcing this costly fad at this moment.

It is announced that the Maharaja of Pathuriaghata, in discharge of filial obligations to his mother, will invest one lakh of rupees for the relief of poor Hindu widows. It will be a princely gift worthy of a man of the giver's fortune. Every credit ought to be given to the Maharaja. We are afraid his friends are spoiling the effect of the deed by their extravagance. Some of the Bengal papers are loud in their praise of the intended charity, as if no greater is in existence, or a larger or an equal sum was never paid over to Government for a benevolent undertaking. The Maharaja is exceptionally unfortunate in his court journal. The Hindoo Patriot sums up the charity of his life, thus:—

"This is not the only act of charity in which the Maharaja Bahadur has risen above sectarian prejudices. Upwards of one hundred poor men and women are fed at his house every day without the slightest observance of caste distinctions. Not less than four thousand Rupees are paid by him every month in pensions and allowances to deserving men of all classes—to men of broken fortunes, to poor descendants of ancient families, to struggling men of ability and education, and to Professors of Sanskrit learning, the guardians of our ancient lore."

The Maharaja has need to be indifferent to caste, and the Patriot to deal in vague generalities. The journal would have acted a truly friendly part to the Raja if it had spared him the fierce light of public gaze into his private accounts. But what shall we say of the rashness of presenting a Pir Ali Tagore as a Hindu reformer who has risen above sectarian prejudices and who observes at his table no caste distinctions? Such impudence will only cause the truth to be more widely known than ever. We do not know if the hundred and one men and women include the Maharaja's family and connections. Even if they are strangers, the number is a poor one for a wealthy man in this country. Many mooktears and pleaders and Amla—ministerial officers of courts—have been known to feed from fifty to a hundred men daily at their lodgings, besides their charity at their permanent homes. The Patriot's hundred poor must be poor indeed to receive food at a house in which the slightest caste distinctions are not observed. The Maharaja is not only Charity itself but Genius too, greater than both the Napoleons, or even Alexander the Great. The Patriot has made the greatest discovery of the age which is highly patriotic. Know all Bengalis and all Indians that we have in our midst an inchoate founder of an Empire:—

"A well-known European gentleman, whose opinion on the character and worth of our public men is entitled to the highest respect, has often observed to us that Maharaja Sir Jotendra Mohun is a born statesman. The faculty of harmony is so well developed in him that the most discordant elements are controlled and guided by him without the slightest difficulty. He is a real leader, who at other times and in other situations would have founded an empire."

What matter where, if he be still the same,
And what he should be.

MISS Janet Gomes, a lady student in the Dufferin Hospital, charged one Arthur Vanspall, a dispenser of medicine in a druggist's shop in College Street, with using criminal force and abusive language. In her examination, the complainant said that while she was going to her work, the accused came out of a gharry in which he had lain in wait and got hold of her. She ran into the College Square, the accused followed her there, laid hold of her hand, tried to take off her hat and then to pull her into his gharry. In cross-examination, she denied having ever spoken to him, though they were fellow-students in the Campbell Hospital, denied being ever friendly with him or seeking him at his place of business. She protested that she never wrote any letters to the accused. The letters produced, purporting to be from herself and her sister, were not any of them in her handwriting, she said, and she indignantly argued that it was not possible that both sisters would make love to the same young man. Besides, the internal evidence was against the hateful suggestion: the style was not hers. To crown the triumph of innocence, she was never in the habit of writing to young men at all. Of course, she had never encouraged young Vanspall's advances. The Magistrate, Mr. Handley, with a proper sense of the holiness of love, was of opinion that the lovers' quarrel ought not to have been made public, and that it should be settled out of court. It was a very simple matter, and the complainant should not have made so much fuss about it. The accused had grown fond of the girl and had only asked her for a kiss. Although sympathising with him, he advised the young man to apologise for what he had done and to transfer his affections to another and more responsive quarter. He warned him against demonstrations of love in public streets. The apology on magisterial advice satisfied the girl and she withdrew her complaint. The closing advice of the Magistrate to the accused was that he must not speak to the complainant again.

THE contest over the Imperial diamond has closed. The Nizam has paid to Mr. Jacob an additional Rs. 1,49,400 and become the possessor of the diamond, for that sum, plus the 23 lacs previously paid and the costs incurred in the proceedings against Mr. Jacob—both civil and criminal. Just the end that every man had expected of all the noise and waste. The political consequences of the affair are permanent, and they affect not the Nizam only but the whole country. We wonder whether there is sense enough in Hyderabad to perceive them. What a pity there was no statesmanship there to prevent the evil!

BENGAL UNDER THE NEW BROOM.

THERE can be no doubt that Sir Charles Elliott is actuated by the best of motives in issuing the series of sensational orders, which has shaken the administration to its very depths. Such shakes are from time to time needed, but in the present instance it has caused a disturbance to no useful purpose. It is all very good to pass extraordinary orders without reflecting on the consequences. It redounds to the credit for activity of the new ruler. But for lasting credit, such energy should be tempered by sufficient discretion. These orders, according to some of our contemporaries, relate chiefly to trifles. It were more correct to describe them as trifling with great interests. Their subject-matter certainly is not trifles. Our contemporaries perhaps do not know that these orders, regarding so-called trifles, have put a large number of persons to great difficulty, and endless inconvenience and trouble. His Honor would turn his Deputy and other Magistrates into a judicial machinery—in the literal sense—which would daily turn out a given amount of work. His order to dispose of cases without adjourning them for more than three times and to discharge witnesses daily anyhow, or at any hour, virtually converts judicial officers into mechanical engines. If these magistrates for whose guidance this order has been passed, had no other work than their judicial work, there might have been some justification for it. Even in that case it would have been impossible to carry it out always, without defeating the ends of justice and doing great harm to the parties and putting the legal practitioners to great inconvenience. But the shadow of reasonableness disappears when the circumstances are taken into account. There are Deputy-Magistrates who are so much burdened with revenue and miscellaneous work, that they cannot commence their judicial work before the fag end of the day, when they are perfectly exhausted and the parties and the pleaders have become quite tired. Now, what has been the effect of these orders? Men who, after the fag of the whole work-day, are physically and intellectually unfit for judicial or any other serious work, proceed, after sunset, to administer justice, and force the parties and witnesses against their wishes to stay till 8 or 9 and sometimes 10 O'clock at night. In most cases, Pleaders or Mukhtears do not care to stay, and the parties are left to the kind care of the broken-winded, gasping, drooping court and its furious ministerial agency. With great difficulty the evidence is somehow completed, say, at about 8 or 9 P.M. on the 3rd day, and at that hour the poor Deputy, perhaps the subject of some chronic disease or suffering from weak eyes, is obliged, most reluctantly, to fire off his decision. Such decisions cannot be thorough or careful, any more than the examination of witnesses under such circumstances can be complete. Judges have already commenced to find fault with the decisions of the Deputy Magistracy, and men of high reputation as judicial officers in that line are fast losing their credit. In one District, a Deputy actually noted in his judgment that it was 10 o'clock (P.M.) and at that late hour he could not write a complete careful decision. In another too, we hear a similar statement was recorded. High Court Judges themselves acknowledge the need of consulting their Hon'ble colleagues and hearing Barristers for days, and, after all, they reserve their judgment in many cases, in order to meditate and make up their minds and indite their judgments at leisure. The unfortunate Deputy, however, is not now allowed time to consider his decision or to go carefully through the record. His whole attention is directed towards one point, namely, to save his livelihood—a paramount consideration with every man in this world, unless he is a Rishi. He is a judge in name only, being treated as an automaton for disposal of complaints. He is clearly prevented from doing justice either to his own abilities or to the parties who seek it from him. Pressed for time to dispose of his cases, his first consideration is how to get over the difficulty of discharging the witnesses, otherwise he finds suspension of promotion staring him in the face. In this way officers have already suffered, and now the whole Subordinate Executive Service is terror-stricken. The civilians are safe; they know the strength of their position by tradition and by recent experience. Their records are not ordinarily overhauled; their promotion is not stopped,—they are not even censured. Prompt despatch of business is praiseworthy, but not at the expense of efficiency and thoroughness. No Magistrate now cares to extend the scope of his enquiry, because he has no time to do so. If proper and fair independence of action is not allowed to a judge, he is no better than a mere writing machine.

In some quarters, it is talked of and even believed that Native Magistrates are generally weak and pliable, and therefore the legal practitioners, taking advantage of their situation, delay the disposal of cases, by numerous legal methods, including long and unnecessary cross-examination. It is whispered and sometime plainly said, that bullying barristers, howling pleaders and the wretched mukhtears should not be allowed to waste the court's time, that they should be snubbed and controlled by the fiat of the presiding officer. All this is very good talk in the club, but it is not practicable. It is neither the fault of the magistrate nor of the counsel (generally speaking). The law is defective. It is unnecessarily elaborate and withal imperfect. The bar is now a most formidable body and its influence and power unlimited. There is not the slightest doubt of the "Vakeel Raj in India," and when these gentlemen of the long robe come armed with statute and case law books, it is not easy to deter them. They must cross-examine, and they must do it to their satisfaction. The law permits it, and they do it before the Judges of the High Court, although the latter may be internally averse from long cross-examination. If a Judge quarrels with them, he always gets the worst of it and his time is nevertheless wasted. It would take 10 minutes to write the questions and answers, and a Barrister would only argue for half an hour on the relevancy or otherwise of asking a single question and then hand over half a dozen books for the perusal of his worship on the bench, all which he is bound to read as containing decisions of the Hon'ble High Courts. It would be mad to suppose that the District Magistrates could stop counsel who occupies a court in this way. There is scarcely another European Magistrate who would dare to treat barristers and pleaders just as Mr. Phillips did one of the leading barristers at Burdwan. The Chief Presidency Magistrate compelled another luminary the other day to take off his grey coat. Where is the Civilian Magistrate in the country who could screw his courage to the sticking-place for such a feat? Law is now very cheap and law books are available to every one. Vakeels and Barristers by scores crowd even the mofussil stations, and they must try to benefit themselves, irrespective of the views of the Head of Government. It is very easy to dispose of undefended and unrepresented cases in places where men are ignorant, where there is neither public opinion nor press, where the powers of the judge are practically despotic. But it is quite another thing to meet a Woodroffe or a Jackson, a Ghose or a Palit, or any really able pleader, and then stop him from wasting the time of the Court, if the counsel before you is bent upon spinning out his case. Quarrels have sometimes unfortunately occurred between the Bench and the Bar, but always with a very bad effect upon the public weal. In the absence of the harmony which ought to exist between the Bench and the Bar, litigation consumes more time than ever, and justice is a good deal left to chance. Our experience has shewn that no executive order can help a Court in saving its time or curtailing the cross-examination. Barristers and Pleaders are now apt to say—Oh, we know His Honor's order and we respectfully bow to it, but, at the same time, we cannot neglect the interests of our clients. Thus, Government will see how not only are the poor unfortunate Deputies not always responsible for the dilatory proceedings and weakness charged to them, but that circumstances, over which they have little or no control, exist which lead sometime to that undesirable result.

It must, of course, be freely acknowledged that the orders of Government are generally carefully enough worded, and always well-meant, but alas! how are they abused in the working. They are certainly not carried out in the sense and spirit in which they are intended to be executed. Thus, Magistrates are enjoined to correct and guide their Deputies by judicious friendly criticism of their proceedings, and watch the progress of cases in their files. This direction, in most cases, is doing great mischief, in more than one way. Under cover of this order, young and inexperienced magistrates now greatly and unnecessarily interfere with the subordinate magistracy. They make unwarrantable and unjust remarks upon the latter's proceedings and decisions, and do them much harm in mind and reputation. A new arrival, with hardly five or six years' service, is appointed an acting District Magistrate. He is puffed up with a high notion of his vast general knowledge, great ability and special store of information about the country and its people, collected from Hunter's Gazetteer or some such book, or perhaps mere club gossip, although, in point of fact, he may be not only wanting in experience and the necessary information, but wrong-headed into the bargain. Such an officer is allowed to criticise the decisions of Deputy Magistrates who have been 20 years, 25 years and 30 years in the service and have gained reputation as judicial officers. In the first place, the question arises—Is this boy of a Magistrate fit to criticise these judgments? The next consideration is—Is it to be expected that such seasoned Deputy Magistrates will invariably prove so timid and devoid of self-respect and self-confidence as to stand all the abuse poured over their grey heads indiscriminately in the form of extra-judicial remarks? The inevitable result is friction and bitterness in many cases, and the work suffers. In others, an old Deputy retires precipitately in disgust with the reward of a large bag of insults from the service of which he was an ornament for a quarter of a century. Again the work suffers. This is a grave fault in the system of administration which ought to be reformed. The Judges see a good deal more of the work of the subordinate magistrates and also criticise their work, but they never lash away in ignorant fury. Still less do they injure the feelings of their subordinates or insult them. And why not? Because they have experience of judicial work and respect for the independence of a judge. The sooner the judicial and executive branches of the service are separated, the better for the country, for the native officers and for all concerned.

THE FUTURE OF INDIAN INDUSTRIES.*

"INVENTIONS likely to take and pay" is the title of a pamphlet brought out by Mr. H. H. Remfry, the wellknown Attorney of Calcutta. The author has the largest practice as a Patent Solicitor, and, being directly interested in encouraging inventions, he seems to have taken very considerable trouble to study the subject in all its important bearings. He does not take the world by surprise by any invention of his own. But he does even better—puts eligible men in the way of making inventions for themselves. The formulating of a problem is very often quite as difficult as its solution, and the public cannot be too grateful to Mr. Remfry for the service that he has done, by collecting together, in a small compass, a large number of exercises for the votaries of science and ingenious mechanics. To use his own words, he "presents the original seeds from whence spring to thinking minds vast vistas of new thought, that they may be further cultivated, beautified, and enlarged."

* Inventions likely to 'Take' and 'Pay' in India and the East. By Henry H. Remfry, M.S.C.I., F.M.I.P.A., &c., Solicitor and Pleader, High Court, Calcutta, 1892.

We have, in these columns, from time to time, drawn the attention of our go-ahead politicians and plutocrats to the fact that, instead of wasting their energy and resources in clamouring for shadowy legislative privileges, they might serve their country far better by offering small rewards for such inventions as the improvement of our primitive hand-looms and spinning wheels. Cheap weaving and spinning machines, that might be worked as a domestic industry, without any large combination of capital and labor, would be a boon the value of which it is hardly possible to exaggerate. But our men of wealth would not spend a pice for public good, except with the view of gratifying their vanity, and our "patriots" are so apathetic to the real needs of the country, or are so enamoured of the fads of British radicalism--the elective principle and government 'by debating clubs--that they can hardly ever be expected to respond to our suggestion. Mr. Remfry does not say anything in particular with regard to spinning and weaving industries. Nevertheless, his repertory includes a vast variety of subjects, for acquaintance with which we must refer our readers to the original. With regard to the improvements of agricultural implements, our author says :---

"Several descriptions of ploughs, intended to replace the primitive implements handed down from generation to generation of Native cultivators, have been introduced from time to time, but their prices have usually been beyond the means of the needy Indian rayyet, while the implements themselves have generally been too heavy for Indian cattle to drag. Apart from this, the rayyet is perhaps the most conservative mortal in existence; he objects to any improvement, he it ever so palpable, which detracts from the ways and manners of his ancestors. The objection to expense, however, which depends a good deal on the nature of the crops, seems now to have been fairly overcome, for a Calcutta firm is advertising 'Hindustan' ploughs at Rs. 10 and 11 each, and from all accounts they are eminently suitable to the work, requiring the use of only one pair of Indian cattle, while they have the additional (doubtful) recommendation of being 'Stanley's latest discovery,' having been in use in Central Africa for ages!

Among the ploughs recently introduced, those called the 'Kaiser,' the 'Duplex,' and the 'Baldeo' (the last of these being the invention of a Native workman) have proved somewhat successful. The Indian plough of the future, however, must have the qualities of strength and simplicity in construction to render its adoption anything like general; it must be cheap, adapted to the yoke and strength of the cultivator's cattle, easily repaired and sufficiently light to be portable on the shoulders of a Native of ordinary physique. The Norwegian plough meets these requirements more closely than any other we know of, and it remains to be seen whether the ploughs patented here can be improved.

On the subject of implements of husbandry, our readers may profitably consult the lists of agricultural implements, issued yearly by the Government of India, which have been weighed in the balance and not found wanting."

Mr. Remfry seems evidently to know a great deal more of his subject than he has thought fit to communicate to his readers. But the information that he has given is, in almost all cases, full of interest. For instance, he accounts for the deterioration of the silk industry of Bengal thus :---

"All efforts in this direction have shown the impossibility of getting Native spinners to produce, by spinning, anything like an even thread; for they prefer to dab on to the spinning-thread lumps of the ends of (say) six cocoons at a time, in order to complete their task speedily: an inequality of thread is the result of such hasty clumsy procedure. This uneven thread, full of fluff and rough-joins, is, and will continue to be, the bane of Indian silk, until some practical remedy can be introduced."

The principal merit of the pamphlet under notice lies not so much in the information that it gives about the industrial arts, as in the suggestions that it throws out for the improvement of those arts. He is nothing if not practical. Yet a vein of originality runs through the entire performance. As an instance, we cite the following :---

"Another thing which would receive no small share of attention if successfully worked out, would be some method by which the vast energy of the tropical sunshine could be utilised for the benefit of man, as also a plan for the conversion of heat into a 'working engineer.' The idea is such as should commend itself to those who have been gifted above their fellows with a God-like reason. In an age which is almost daily witnessing the triumphs of human ingenuity and engineering skill, it behoves him who is desirous of shining with a brighter light than the great majority of his fellows, to put his best leg forward, and make hay while the sun shines, lest 'while he is coming another steps in before him.'"

This world would be a paradise, if science ever should render it possible to utilize the energy of the sun's heat for tilling the soil and for other agricultural operations. The ideal may or may not be attainable. But the progress that has been already made in science, and notably in its application to human convenience, is sufficient to inspire us with the hope that a time may come when the majority of men will no longer have to suffer from the primeval curse of earning their bread with the sweat of their brow.

TREATMENT OF NATIVE INDIANS.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

Mr. MacNeill moved the addition to the Address of the following paragraph :---

"And we humbly regret that your Majesty's Speech from the Throne contains no proposals for redeeming the pledges so frequently given by various Governments that natives of Great Britain and natives of India should be placed on terms of equality in the matter of appointments in the public service and in facilities in competing for such appointments."

He called the attention of the House to a statement made by Lord Northbrook at Birmingham to the effect that there was one simple test which might be applied to Indian questions--the country should never forget that it was their duty to govern India not for their own profit and advantage, but for the benefit of the people of India. How had this principle been carried out? On one occasion Mr. Bright contended that "India has now become a pasture-ground for smart young English gentlemen." Every emolument worth having in India was given to Englishmen, and the natives were by various simple processes boycotted, and cheated out of everything in their own land. The hon. member further pointed out that Lord Lytton had admitted in private correspondence that the Indian natives had been cheated, and that the noble lord had thrown himself when Viceroy of India more into the arms of the official class than any other Viceroy. The Duke of Argyll had also confessed that in the matter of appointments the natives had not been given a fair chance; that the promises which had been made to them had not been kept. He maintained that this was a very scandalous state of things, and that our government of India in this matter savoured a little too much of hypocrisy. The present Government were treating India as though it was another Ireland, and the result was that the poorest people in the world were saddled with the most expensive government. In conclusion, he begged to move the amendment of which he had given notice. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Curzon, who was received with cheers, said that, the amendment having been curtailed, it was necessary that he should refer only to the statements of the hon. member referring to the Civil Service of India. The hon. member had complained that the pledges given to India of equality of treatment as between natives and Englishmen in appointments to the public service had not been carried out, but that statement was wholly incorrect. The proclamations in which the pledges were made had been endorsed and enforced by various Governments, and the authorities in India had made constant and consistent efforts to carry them out. Since 1867 successive Viceroys had considered the best means of utilising the services of natives in the higher classes of the Civil Service, and those pledges had culminated during the administration of Lord Lytton in 1879 in the creation of a statutory Civil Service, and under this scheme one-fifth of the annual appointments to the Civil Service in India had been reserved for natives, and without the disagreeable penalty, of which the hon. member had severely complained, of the necessity of having to come to England for examination. The hon. member appeared to be ignorant of recent events in India, for matters to which he referred had become or were becoming accomplished facts. The public service in India at the present time was undergoing a process of complete reorganisation, and the hon. member had never so much as referred to the Public Service Commission, which was appointed in India a few years ago, and was composed of representative and influential men. It consisted of fifteen members, was under the presidency of Sir Charles Turner, late Chief Justice of Madras, and contained five Civil servants, one representative of non-official Europeans, one representative of the Eurasians, one Uncovenanted Civil servant, and six representative native gentlemen. This Commission, so constituted, conducted its investigations all over India, and its report was presented to the House in 1888, and two years later a Blue Book was also laid on the table, which showed the steps that had been taken to carry out the policy of the Commission. That was a point the hon. member had entirely ignored. (Hear, hear.) The Commission proposed that for the conduct of the higher branches of the executive and judicial work throughout India there should continue to be, as at present, two distinct services, and those services would be reorganised and rechristened. The first of these would be the existing Covenanted Civil Service, which the Commission had proposed to call the Imperial Service, recruited by competition in England, and open without distinction of race to all natural-born subjects of her Majesty. The second of the two services would be called the Provincial Service, and would be recruited in each province of India separately, and would hold the higher appointments of the existing Uncovenanted Service, together with a certain number of appointments now ordinarily reserved by law or practice to the Covenanted Civil Service, which would be transferred to the Provincial Service. Under the new scheme of organisation one-third of the sessions judgeships and one-sixth of the collectors' offices, and also other posts, would be confined to natives of India. The object of the proposals which had been made was to open up to the natives of India a greater number of appointments, and the result would be not only that many more native gentlemen would obtain positions of distinction in the English service, but that there would be two branches of the service, one recruited in England and the other in India, both being subject to regulations as to status and pay which would apply equally to the European and native members of the service. Those who thought that hardship was caused by the system of holding examinations for the Civil Service in England should bear in mind that the question was inquired into by the Public Service Commission, which included native gentlemen of great position, and that the Commission unanimously decided against the system of simultaneous examinations in India. They reported that "an open competition in India for the Covenanted Civil Service would operate with inequality, excluding altogether some important classes of the community while giving undue advantage to others. The question is simply one as to the qualifications required and the arrangements under which officers possessing such qualifications can best be secured. The object of the Government of India in recruiting in England a limited staff of officers, who, after a training in India, might be intrusted with the more important executive and judicial charges, was (inter alia) to secure an administration conducted so far as possible on principles and by methods in harmony with modern civilisation." The native members of the Commission, while they did not altogether share in the apprehension expressed by their colleagues as to the probable results of simultaneous examinations in India and England, stated that the scheme which they recommended as well as their colleagues was "in their opinion well calculated to secure the end they had in view, and at the same time was not open to the objections urged against simultaneous examinations." Objection having been raised to the limit of age for the natives of India coming to England for examination, that limit had been raised from twenty-one to twenty-three. From the speech of the hon. member opposite one might infer that the natives of India bore a small and disproportionate part in the administration of the country. This view was quite contrary to the facts. In the Uncovenanted Civil Service in 1890, in the superior ranks of the executive and judicial branches (excluding the so-called special departments), there were 2,588 officers, of whom 2,449 were natives of India, and only thirty-five Europeans or Eurasians not domiciled in India at the time of appointment. It would be a great mistake if the House were to entertain the belief that these officers were engaged in humble or unimportant official business. It was with them that the great mass of the people were ordinarily brought into contact, and upon them devolved the duty of deciding a large proportion of the disputes whether connected with revenue, magisterial, or civil matters, which arose between man and man in ordinary life and did not, as a general rule, come before officers belonging to the Covenanted grades. Nearly the whole of the civil judicial business throughout India, including a large portion of that in the Appellate Courts, was transacted by natives. Native judges had jurisdiction in all classes of civil suits over Europeans and natives alike, without distinction of nationality. The duties of the executive branch of the native service were hardly less responsible and important. Since 1874, notwithstanding constant demands for improvement in the strength of the Covenanted Service, the number of English members had been reduced by more than 22 per cent, and would soon be reduced by 12 per cent. more. Under the rules laid down by Lord Lytton's Government there was one statutory civilian for every five members of the Covenanted Service. He thought that these facts would show that the Government had adhered to the proclamation of the reign of William IV. If the hon. member instead of making speeches in that House would go to India and inquire into the facts, he doubted very much whether he would make the allegations against the Government of India which they sometimes heard in that House. Thirty years ago, when the Crown had taken over the Government of India, not a single native had been a member of any legislative council; now there were four in the Governor General's Council, five in Madras, five in Bombay, four in Bengal, and two in the North-West Provinces. There were now six native judges of the High Court; three at Calcutta, one at Madras, one in Bombay, and one in the North-West Provinces. Colleges for the encouragement of engineering had been established, and every effort made to attract natives, and natives only, to that important branch of the public service. (Hear, hear.) In addition to the number of native members of Council, it would be his privilege before long to introduce a Bill dealing with the reorganisation and extension of these councils by which the number of native members would be considerably increased. He hoped that he had put considerations before the House which would lead them to believe that the Government of India had a strong and convincing case in this matter, and he hoped that the hon. member would not think it necessary to press his amendment. (Hear, hear.)

Sir R. Temple said that, though he sympathised with everything that could be done for the advancement of the natives of India, it was necessary to remember that the natives of India, though they might be equal to us in intellect, and equal, of course, before the law and in courts of justice, were not equal to us in courage and prowess in the battlefield, or in administrative energy and capacity in field and government. (Hear, hear.) No legislation could ever make them equal to us in that respect, and in the case of the condition of a country like India they must have Englishmen in the front to manage the great transport arrangements in time of war and relief operations in the seasons of danger from famine—(hear, hear)—and in the great administrative departments, and the natives knew this as well as we did. (Hear, hear.)

The amendment having been withdrawn, the debate was adjourned on the motion of Mr. Sexton.

The other orders were disposed of, and the House adjourned at five minutes past twelve o'clock.

TIBET AND THE EARLY BENGAL PANDITS.

[A Lecture read on March 5, by Baboo Sarat Chunder Das, C.I.E., at the Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science, the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, C.I.E., presiding.]

The account that I have given you of the Missionary activity of the Indian Buddhists, being gathered from incidental notices of holy men, contained in the dynastic histories of China, cannot fail to be meagre. The names of such scholars have been preserved in the State records as had attracted the notice of those sovereigns of China, who had favoured Buddhism. In fact, very little is known of the vast body of Indian Buddhists who in their peculiarly quiet ways worked for the diffusion of the Buddhist creed among the teeming millions of China. The Chinese have been a civilized nation from the very early times. Compared with the antiquity of their civilization, that of Babylon, Egypt, and Greece falls into insignificance. The early religion of the Chinese with the great Heaven as their father and the Earth as their mother, was of a theistic character, for it enjoined on the Emperor alone the duty of worshipping the great God, whose majesty no ordinary mortal should approach, except the heaven-appointed Ruler of the celestial Empire.

Two eminent sages appeared in China six hundred years before the birth of Christ who built their religion upon it. To speak in the language of Dr. Edkins :—"Khungfu-tse (Confucius) found a religion already existing in China with a very practical system of morals, which first and last has always given it its practical character."

He founded on this religion his own, which continues to be the religion of the literati at the present day. He had three thousand disciples at the beginning to aid him in promulgating his ethical creed in which there was nothing ascetical nor spiritual. The questions to which it replied were :—How shall I do my duty to my neighbour? How shall I best discharge the duty of a virtuous citizen? It attempted no reply to the higher questions :—How am I connected with the spiritual world beyond what I see? What is the destiny of immaterial nature? How can I rise above the dominion of the passions and of the senses?

These thoughtful questions remained unanswered for a long time. It was reserved for the religion of Buddha after six hundred years to reply to these inquiries. The Buddhist missionaries, ever alive to the commands of the immortal sage, in the middle of the first century, A. D., proceeded to work in the Far East to the Buddhist Propaganda. Buddha's last words were written in letters of gold, on a lamant as it were, to last for upwards of twelve centuries without being deteriorated in the least way. They were handed down from generation to generation till the 13th century A. D., when all Asia became converted to Buddhism. They were delivered in the following words :—

"Bhikshus, I am delivered from all fetters, human and divine. Go ye now, O Bhikshus, and wander for the gain of the many, for the welfare of many, out of compassion for the world, for the good for the gain and for the welfare of gods and men. There are beings whose mental eyes are covered by scarcely any dust, but if the doctrine is not preached to them, they cannot attain salvation. Go then through every country, convert those not yet converted; throughout the world that lies burnt up with sorrow, teach everywhere; go, therefore, each one travelling by himself filled with compassion, go, rescue and receive, Mahavagga, Vinaya Pitakam."

Contemporary with Confucius was Loau-tsoo—the founder of Taoism, the second religion of China, who meditated in a philosophic mood upon the more profound necessities and capacities of the human soul. But his religion, in course of time, degenerated into priestcraft. Like Tantricism, it is at the present day no better than what is understood by the term fetishism or demon worship.

These two religions operated in China for upwards of six centuries before Buddhism entered the land of Han. Their followers had strenuously exerted themselves to thwart the attempts of the early missionaries of India to propagate Buddhism in China. We are told by Christian missionary writers that thirteen years before the Indian Brahmins, Matanga and Subharana, reached China, the first missionaries of Christendom had crossed the Ægean Sea, and entered Europe. Instead of being received, however, with the smiles of those in power and enjoying imperial hospitality, they were publicly whipped and imprisoned by the Magistrate of a Roman Colony, and ignominiously dismissed. It is true that the first Indian missionaries visited China at the invitation of the great Han Emperor, Ming-thi, but it was not until the followers of Confucius and Laou-tsoo had exhausted their weapons on them, that they were admitted into the imperial favour. The missionary activity of the early Christians of Rome and Greece in many respects resembled that of the Indian Buddhists, in consequence of which they were successful in their labours to Christianize en masse all the nations of Europe.

The first century of the Christian era was, indeed, the age of missionary enterprise. It was then that the Indian missionaries started on their distant and perilous journey to the Far East. Once introduced, Christianity continued as a living religion in Europe. Under its influence all the nations there steadily advanced in civilization and science. In India the case was otherwise. Both Hinduism and Buddhism split into different independent sects, and finally languished, in spite of the efforts of Nagarjuna and others to reconcile the tenets of the one to those of the other. This state of religious difference lasted in India for about a thousand years, till the Mussulmans turned their victorious arms to the conquest of this ill-fated country. When the religious zeal and energies of the peoples of Western and North-western India became paralyzed, if not altogether extinct, the superior intellect of the people of the province of Bengal shone prominently in the domain of philosophy and religion. The Pandits of Bengal became the spiritual teachers of the Buddhist world. The sovereign rulers of Eastern India, Tibet, Ceylon and Suvarna bhumi (the capital of which was Sudharma Nagar) vied with each other in their devotion to them.

In the first quarter of the seventh century, A. D., Buddhism was introduced in Tibet from Nepal by the Nepalese Princess (daughter of King Amshu Varma), who was married to King Strongtsan gampo and also from China by Princess Kon-jo (the daughter of Emperor Thai-tsung), who was married to the same Tibetan King. Under the auspices of these two Princesses, Buddhism penetrated Tibet. They also converted the King to Buddhism, who had already received information regarding the civilization and sciences of the Indians and the Chinese from his emissaries and messengers, who had visited those countries. (I extract here an account of his endeavours to introduce the art of writing in Tibet, from the early records of Tibet.)

The King of Tibet established in his dominion the laws based on the ten commandments of Buddha, sent embassies to foreign countries and received envoys from the neighbouring States, who brought presents with them. He exhorted his subjects to follow the religion of Buddha. By his exertions the prosperity of the country of Himavat increased. Till then there existed no written language in Tibet. The King keenly felt its want, especially when it was found that his court had no means to reply to the letters of the foreign monarchs. His people were ignorant of the arts and sciences of the Indians and the Chinese. In acknowledging the presents and letters of the Kings of Nepal, Khotan, and India, he had to rely on the verbal communications of his own envoys. With a view to remove this want and to acquire the enlightenment that his neighbours possessed, he sent seven of his young intelligent officers to India to study the art of reading and writing.

In obedience to his commands they proceeded to the Indian frontier, but before crossing the Himalayas they began to lose heart. The fear of the three kinds of demons, viz., evil spirits, deadly ferals, and wild animals, including poisonous snakes that abound there, prevailed and they retraced their steps towards home. Thereafter, Thonmi, the son of Anu, a brave, talented minister of the King, undertook to visit India for the purpose of studying the Indian languages. The King furnished him with a large quantity of gold, to enable him to make presents to the Indian Princes and professors of Sanskrit learning. He travelled southward to India, and hearing the fame of a Brahman named Lipidatta for proficiency in the art of writing, he went to him. Making profound salutation to the learned Indian he addressed him thus :—

"Oh, thou incarnate sage of the divine race, who art full of mercy and who on account of thy moral merits art born as a Brahman, vouchsafe unto this humble stranger a little of thy attention. By the dint of the virtues of thy former life thou hast now become talented and marvellously accomplished in Agama Sastras and the art of writing. I am a minister of the King of Himavat, the border country of Arya Bhumi. My King, the sovereign ruler of Tibet, ascended the throne of his ancestors at the age of 13, and having satisfied his people with the doctrine of Buddha, has promulgated the laws based on the ten commandments within his dominions. In my country there is no written language, none of my countrymen can read or write. The King has, therefore, sent me to this country with costly presents to wait upon Indian professors for acquiring a knowledge of the art of writing."

"May I therefore approach thee with the humble prayer of being granted a knowledge of the words and letters of Sanskrit, the language of the gods?" So saying he prostrated himself before the learned Brahman and begged for his gracious acceptance of a little present of gold. Lipidatta received the gold and said in reply :— "Hear me, oh minister Thon mi, you are the son of blessed parents. You are minister of King who rules in Himavat. You are intelligent and talented; and meditate upon the two great noble truths. I shall certainly teach you the art of writing and reading and the various sciences as well as versification and other sciences of a wonderful nature." So saying, he conducted him to his house which was built of precious stones, and began to give him lessons in writing. Thon-mi applied himself assiduously to the study of Sanskrit, and soon made a remarkable progress. His intellect developed and the lamp of knowledge being lighted he learned the sections of Nagari and Gatha character. He also learned the Ranja and the Wartula character of Magadha. Having finished his education under Lipidatta he proceeded to the great monastery of Sri Nalanda, and having placed himself under the tuition of Acharya Devavid-simha, he studied the sacred literature of the Hindus and Buddhists.

While Thon-mi Sambhota was studying at Nalanda the great Chinese pilgrim-traveller, Hiouen Tshang, visited the monastery. The splendour and usefulness of that institution founded in the first century B. C. by Saraha, the tutor and spiritual guide of Nagarjuna, were still undiminished. In the words of Hiouen Tshang "the Sangharamas of India are counted by myriads, but the one at Nalanda is the most remarkable for grandeur and height. The priests belonging to the convent or strangers residing therein always reach to the number of ten thousand, who all study the Mahayana, and also the works belonging to the Eighteen Sections, and not only so, but even ordinary works, such as the Vedas and other books, the Hetuvidya, Sabdavidya, and Chikitsavidya, the works on Atharveda, the Sankhya; besides these they thoroughly investigate miscellaneous works." "Life of Hiouen Tshang."

In the beginning of the eighth century, A. D., two eminent Pandits of Bengal visited Tibet at the invitation of King Thisrong-deu-tsan, and formally introduced the religion of Buddha, which from that time became the established State religion of Tibet. Shanta Rakshita, a native of Gaur, was the high priest of the Monastery of Nalanda at the time the Tibetans came to invite him. He was received by the Tibetan King with all the honours due to his high position as the spiritual teacher of the King of Magadha. The Tibetans gave him the name of Acharya Bodhisattva.

King Thisrong-deu-tsan, than whom a more enlightened and powerful monarch did not appear in Tibet, appointed him as the high priest of Tibet, and under his direction, for the first time, introduced the system of Buddhist monachism, which is now known as Lamaism in Tibet. While Shanta Rakshita attended to the moral and disciplinary part of the church, his eminent coadjutor, the sage Padma Sambhava, a native of Udyana, took charge of the Tatrik part of the Buddhist Church. At this time a Chinese missionary in the person of Hwashong Mahayana visited Tibet to preach Buddhism. His doctrines being to a great extent at variance with those of Shanta Rakshita and Padma Sambhava, a great controversy arose between the Indian and the Chinese Schools. The Hwashong was found to be more than a match for the Indian Acharyas in religious metaphysical discussions. The Indian Pandits induced the King to send for the great Buddhist philosopher named Kamala Sila, whose fame had already spread far and wide.

Accordingly, Kamala Sila visited Tibet, and in the presence of the assembled court came out victorious over the Chinese Sage and won the laurels. Thisrong-deu-tsan placed him at the head of the metaphysical branch of the Buddhist Church and ordered the vanquished Hwashong to leave the country. In the ninth century many learned Pandits from Bengal were invited to Tibet by King Ralpachan and employed by him in the work of translating the Sanskrit works into Tibetan. The names of Silendra Bodhi, Ratnendra Rashita, Manjusri Virma, Surendra Misra and others occur largely in the two Buddhist cyclopædias called Kahgyur and Tangyur, which consist of 330 volumes. We have no narratives of their journey to Tibet except incidental mention that many among them came from Gaur.

The real history of Tibet, or rather of the grand hierarchy of the Lamas began in 1026, A. D., when the Vrihaspati cycle of sixty years was introduced in Tibet by Pandit Somanath from Kashmir. According to some of the eminent historians of Tibet this system of chronology originated at the famous Buddhist monastery of Sri Dhanya Katak, the city of accumulated paddy, which has been identified with modern Katak. Vrihaspati cycle is still current in Southern India. During the ninth and tenth centuries it prevailed in Kashmir and Khoten.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

In Memoriam.

ALBERT VICTOR

DUKE OF CLARENCE AND AVONDALE.

Born January 8, 1864, Died January 14, 1892.

I.

Dead ! And no warrior soul outworn,
Aweary of the strife,
But he, alas ! we have to mourn,
A neophyte of Life :
Youngest of England's ancient Line,
Hope of a people's heart ; your promised King, and mine.

II.

Now change the purple for the pall !
The bridal for the bier !
He, the beloved, besought, of all,
Lies mute, ungazing, here,
Dust unto dust, the young, the proud :—

III.

A coffin for his crown, his majesty a shroud !
Yet weep not only for the dead :
Mighty and mean must die ;
The loftiest, like the lowliest head
Peasant and Prince alike live but in fee from Fate.

IV.

But Love, the boon of lord and clown,
Love had he made his own.
Love jewelled beyond any crown,
Loftier than any throne :
Had found a maiden fond and fair,
Who trembling on his heart, wept her glad weakness there.

V.

Now muffled be the marriage bell !
The nuptial wreath be rent !
Palace and tower must toll the knell
Of his dark tenement.
The flowers we twined to blush and bloom
Around the bridal bed, must pale about his tomb.

VI.

Alas for her ! the graced, the good,
For ever doomed to wear
The mockery of widowhood
About her maiden hair.
Scarce had she time to reach and clasp
The gifts of Love, but they were ashes in her grasp.

VII.

Glory of pomp, and glow of power,
'Tis nothing to forego :
Grandeur is but a doubtful dower,
Rank oft but radiant woe.
But to lose Love just seen, just known,
To mangle, Two-in-One and then to mourn—alone !

VIII.

O ! if she could exchange her lot
And now were free to choose,
With one who in some whitewashed cot
Over her baby coos,
And tend the humblest heart that burns,
To whose awaiting smile the cherished one returns !

IX.

We weep with her. We weep with you,
No less, loved, widowed Queen,
Who nurse a loss for ever new,
A wound for ever green.
Your brow august is crowned with care,
So take her to your breast, hush her anguish there !

X.

And you, Sir, who for long, long years
Have stood beside the Throne,
And now would stem a Mother's tears
Forgetful of your own.
For you we mourn, we mourn for her.
All of us at your side, by his sad sepulchre.

ALFRED AUSTIN.

—The Times.

TO THE MOURNERS.

The bridal garland falls upon the bier,
The shadow of a crown, that o'er him hung,
Has vanish'd in the shadow cast by Death.
So princely, tender, truthful, reverent pure—
Mourn ! That a world-wide Empire mourns with you.
That all the Thrones are clouded, by your loss
Were slender solace. Yet be comforted ;
For if this earth be ruled by Perfect Love,
Then after his brief range of blameless days,
The toll of funeral in an Angel ear,
Sounds happier than the merriest marriage bell.
The face of Death is toward the Sun of Life,
His shadow darkens earth ; his truer name
Is "Onward," no discordance in the roll
And march of that Eternal Harmony,
Where to the world's beat time tho' faintly heard,
Until the Great Hereafter. Mourn in hope !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE municipal elections are over. Police arrangements were made at several polling stations to suppress any disturbance if it broke out. Special precautions were taken at Ward No. I. which displayed unusual interest. The greatest enthusiasm was visible in Wards Nos. I. and II. In the first, Baboo Matilal Ghose, of the Amritabazar Patrika, was not successful against Baboos Pashupati Nath Bose and Bhupendranath Bose. Every attempt was made to keep out Baboo Ghose. At the last moment, an application was made to the High Court by Baboo Pashupati Nath Bose to strike out Ghose's name from the list of candidates. Mr. Justice Trevelyan characterized the attempt as an electioneering dodge and refused it. The particulars will be found in another column. The dodge, however, succeeded. At the close of the poll at No. I., there was a sort of demonstration against the defeated candidate and his supporters. The failed candidate was conveyed home under police protection. His supporters too had their share of hisses delivered at the gates of their houses by an elated crowd swelled, it is said, by officers of the Corporation.

The town Corporation of Calcutta consists of 75 members or Commissioners as they are called. Of these, Government appoints 15, the Chamber of Commerce elects 4, the Trades Association 4, the Port Commissioners 2, while the electors among the rate payers of 25 Wards of the town elect 50 representatives.

Among the retiring Commissioners who sought re-election, six were not accepted, namely,

- Ward 2. Mr. N. N. Ghose.
 " 4. Babu Sarat Chunder Mitter.
 " 6. Babu Umakant Sen.
 " 11. Dr. Mahendralal Sircar.
 " 21. Mr. W. Swinhoe.
 " 23. Babu Shama Churn Bose.

The non-return of Dr. Sircar and Messrs. Ghose and Swinhoe is a distinct loss to the Corporation. The natural law of survival of the fittest has clearly been belied in these cases. This indeed, we are afraid, is the rule in popular elections.

There were no contests, or the superfluous candidates had retired before the commencement of the poll, in Wards 5, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 22.

The return, subject to revision by the Chairman, shews that 38 old Commissioners presented themselves for re-election, of whom 32 have succeeded, namely,

- Ward 2. Babu Chandilal Singh.
 " 3. " Kallynath Mitter.
 Coomar Shusil Krishna.
 " 4. Babu Nolin Behary Sircar.
 " 5. Kumar Dinender Narain Roy.
 Babu Lal Behari Bysack.

 " 10. Babu Rash Behary Das.
 " 12. " Nobin Chand Borah.
 " 13. Moulvi Fazlor Rahman.
 " 14. Khan Bahadar Ahmad.

 " 15. Khan Bahadr Serajul Islam.
 " 16. Moulvi Aga Mahomed Musa.
 " 17. Mr. J. Ghosal,
 " G. T. Doucett.
 " 18. " J. G. Aparcar,
 " W. Corkhill.
 " 19. Babu Amritlal Ghose.
 " 20. Moulvi Abdul Jawad.
 " 21. Babu Kanti Chunder Banerjee.
 " 22. " Preonath Mullick.
 Pandit Prannath Saraswati.
 " 24. Kumar Satyabadi Ghosal.
 " 25. Babu Monilal Banerjee.
 " Akhil Chunder Mookerjee.

The new comers are :—

- Ward 1. Babu Pashupati Nath Bose.
 " Bhupendra Nath Bose.
 " 2. Mr. U. K. Dutt.
 " 4. Babu Ram Charan Mitter.
 " 6. " Radha Churn Pal.
 " 10. " Soorender Nath Das.
 " 11. " Devprasad Sarvadhicari.
 " Ashootosh Dey.
 " 12. Mr. R. McGuire.
 " 13. Babu Mohini Mohun Chatterjee.

Of these eighteen, ten represent law, three medicine, one trade, and the remainder land and other interests.

NOTHING in God's universe is good for nothing, unless it be some miserable men. We learn that a Parsi at Bombay has sent over a consignment of 250 crows to Zanzibar to assist, as he says, in carrying out sanitary reforms. He should follow up with a shipment of vultures, who are well-trying reformers. There are many men who have all the nastiness and the nuisance breeding capacity, without the detergescence of these nightmen of Nature.

MRS. Mary M. Stuart, who during her lifetime had expended fifty lacs of Rupees in charity, has left by her will to the institutions of sorts of New York, charitable, educational, and religious, the fabulous sum of a crore of Rupees. A genuine sister of charity though not up to founding an empire, perhaps, under any circumstances.

MANY parts of Asia are now badly suffering from the small-pox epidemic, specially Japan and Cabul. In the latter, the disease is most virulent among the children.

THE Financial Statement for 1892-93 was published yesterday as a Gazette of India Extraordinary. The official summary of it is as follows :—

"The Accounts of 1890-91 have closed with a surplus of Rx. 3,688,000. It is explained that this large surplus is mainly due to the speculative rise in Exchange which took place in that year, and to other causes of temporary operation.

In the Revised Estimate for 1891-92 the Revenue is estimated at Rx. 88,586,000 and the Expenditure at Rx. 88,666,000, showing a deficit of Rx. 80,000. It is fully anticipated that the improvement on the Revised Estimate which usually occurs will more than cover this deficit and that the Accounts of the year will close with a surplus.

During the year 1891-92 there has been a very great increase in net Revenue from Railways, a considerable improvement in the Opium Account, and satisfactory increases of Revenue under all important heads except that of Land Revenue.

The improvement has, however, been swallowed up by increased Military Expenditure, by the fall in the rate of exchange, and by falling off of Land Revenue owing to scarcity in portions of the country.

In the Budget Estimate for 1892-93 the Revenue is estimated at Rx. 88,368,000 and the Expenditure at Rx. 88,221,000, yielding a surplus of Rx. 147,000. The most striking feature of the Budget is the fall in the Rate of Exchange from Rs. 54d. in the Budget of 1891-92 to Rs. 47d. in the Budget of 1892-93—a fall which adds Rx. 1,708,000 to the Expenditure of the Government of India. This increase of Expenditure has been met by the resumption of Rx. 466,000 from Local Governments at the periodical revision of the Provincial Contracts, by increase of Revenue from Railways, and by increased receipts under the Principal Heads of Revenue, as well as by an improvement in the Interest Account in India, owing mainly to Capital Expenditure on Railways and Canals having been met from the large surpluses of recent years. The net Opium Revenue is taken in the Budget at Rx. 5,400,000.

The Estimates of 1892-93 provide Rx. 4,035,000 for Capital Expenditure not charged to Revenue, as well as Rx. 1,012,000 under the Famine Grant for the Construction of Railways and Canals and Rx. 118,000 under head 37—Construction of Railways.

It is not expected that it will be necessary to raise a loan in India this year, though no pledge is given.

It is announced under the usual reserve that the Secretary of State will probably sell bills for £17,000,000 in the coming year, and will raise a loan of £1,800,000 for discharge of Railway Debentures and for advances to Railway Companies.

The present scarcity is stated to be a cause of anxiety, but actual famine is not anticipated unless there should be a failure of the periodical rains in the affected tracts. The meteorological conditions at present afford no indication of the likelihood of such a failure.

Apart from the possibility of the occurrence of serious famine, Sir David Barbour considers that there is no ground for special anxiety regarding the coming year.

He adds, however, that the Currency question appears to be approaching the critical stage, and that it is impossible to tell what a few years may bring forth."

MR. Justice Birdwood succeeds Sir Raymond West as judicial member of the Bombay Legislative Council.

COLONEL Henderson makes over charge as General Superintendent, Thagi and Dacoity Department, on March 21, to Dr. Lethbridge, and takes over charge, on April 15, as Resident at Mysore.

As desired by Mrs. Quinton, the N.-W. P. Quinton Memorial Committee have decided that the fund subscribed by the friends of the late Mr. Quinton be applied to the establishment of an additional ward in the Dufferin Hospital at Lucknow, to be called the "Quinton Memorial Ward."

THE blood of General Azimuddin of Rampore still cries for blood. Seven men, including the two brothers who were arrested before and after an enquiry set free, are under arrest for the late murder. Mr. R. G. Hardy, Collector of Jhansi, has been deputed for the second enquiry. Messrs. T. Conlan and W. M. Colvin, of the Allahabad bar, will represent the Rampore state, while Mr. H. Vansittart and Mr. Ross Alston defend the accused.

RAJA Jung Bahadoor Khan, C.I.E., the munificent Talookdar of Nanpara, in Oudh, who had before subscribed Rs. 10,000 to the Endowment Fund of the Lady Dufferin Hospital, has now given to the same charity Rs. 20,000. The money has already been paid to the District Magistrate, Mr. H. W. Gibson, Deputy Commissioner of Bahraich.

WE heartily commend the Rangoon Times for its earnestness in behalf of the truly dumb millions. There is no mincing of matters with our contemporary. The Editor goes straight to the point. Here is a paragraph in the Rangoon Times :—

"We would call the attention of the S. P. C. A. to the state of a bay pony which is being driven in a trap by a petition-writer named Sunjeeveraido. The animal is very lame on the near fore, the shoulder being apparently sprained."

The Central Provinces and Berar News, quoting that, says that it would like to follow suit, but that no S. P. C. A. is at Nagpur. What a pity! Nay, what a shame! A large town, the capital of a great and growing Province, which has no institution for protecting God's weaker and dependent creatures from unnecessary harm and frivolous cruelty and injustice, has no legitimate claim to civilization.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

EUROPE suffers from winter still. A Reuter of the 14th speaks of most severe weather prevailing throughout England and the Continent. The snowstorms have been, and continue to be, very heavy, and the frosts terrific. Railway traffic is impeded and many trains snowed up in various parts.

THERE is again a sensation in England over a fashionable delinquent of the feminine gender. Mrs. Osborne had scarcely been lodged in jail when another member of "Society"—this time a genuine Upper Ten-wallah, or should we not rather say, wallah?—a "horsey" lady and well-known sporting character—was caught tilpping. Mrs. Montague, wife of Lord Robert Montague's son, is under trial for causing the death of her daughter Helen, aged three years. The poor thing was shut up for punishment in a dark room where it died. Of course, the defence pleaded accident. The prisoner has been committed on a charge of manslaughter, and is now at large by deposit of bail for £700.

THE prospects of Home Rule seem brightening up. A Gladstonian, Mr. Dalziel, has been elected for the Kirkcaldy District vacated by the death of Sir George Campbell, by a majority of 1,036 votes, against Mr. Cox, Liberal-Unionist. But, of course, one swallow does not make summer.

LORD Rosebery has been appointed Chairman pro tem of the London County Council.

AT Manchester, on the 11th, Sergeant Holden, formerly of the Royal Engineers, was brought up charged with selling to France certain plans giving details of the Malta defences. The Magistrate refused bail, and the prisoner has been remanded to prison.

MR. William Tayler, wellknown as the dismissed Commissioner of Patna, has died after all.

THE week began with miners to the number of four hundred thousand on strike in England, necessitating the stoppage of many manufacturing for want of coal, and sending it up in London ten shillings a ton over the average price. Many steamers are lying idle in the northern ports. The London and North-Western Railway Company have stopped their engine works at Crewe, while the North-Eastern Company have reduced the hands at their workshops. The measures taken by the Railway Companies have thrown 1,400 men out of employ. On the 15th, one hundred passenger trains were to be withdrawn.

The Miners' Federation were thus forced to reconsider their original resolution. They were scarcely prepared for these reprisals. On the 17th, they came to the conclusion to resume work on Monday next, but not to work more than five days in the week. The end of the week may see the close of the strike. The price of coal has already declined four shillings a ton.

AT Paris, there is quite a scare in the wealthy quarters owing to the increase of outrages by the Anarchists. A house in the Boulevard St. German was wrecked by a bomb on the 12th. On March 14, they exploded a dynamite bomb in the barracks of the Republican Guard, causing great damage to property but hurting nobody. The Government has had recourse to extraordinary measures. The military posts have been reinforced, and the Police have orders to arrest anybody possessing arms, explosives, or seditious documents. A Bill has been introduced in the Chamber of Deputies prescribing death for any person found guilty of causing unlawful explosion of dynamite.

IN Belgium, an explosion from fire damp has entombed one hundred and twenty miners at the Anderlues coal pit, near Mons. Sixteen were rescued in a dying condition.

PROFESSOR Freeman, the historian, is dead. He was a learned man of somewhat extreme views. He hated the Turks like a Crusader. In diction he had turned an ultra-Saxonist.

TOWARDS the end of last week, the Emperor William was suffering from a severe cold, being confined to bed since Thursday. He is now much better and making fair progress towards recovery.

THE flighty young Emperor of Germany has managed to complete his breach with the Liberals, if not his entire people. At the annual banquet of the Bradenburg Diet, he made a remarkable speech denouncing the Opposition in no measured terms. With considerable warmth he noticed the growing habit of grumbling—the tendency to find fault with every measure and movement of Government, with the certain result of disturbing the public tranquility and rendering the people unhappy. He did not quote Virgil for anything that we know, but he spoke in the sense of the famous lines—

O! fortunatos nimium, sua si bona norint,
Agricolas l. quibus ispa procul discordibus armis,
Fundit humo facilem victum justissima tellus.

Under the evil teaching of irresponsible demagogues, the people were prevented from enjoying the advantages of their security and steady prosperity. Such was the drift of the imperial complaint. His Majesty thought that the masses did not understand the mysteries of public affairs and had better not concern themselves with political problems. The Emperor concluded: "I am helped by a firm conviction that the Ruler of all will not now leave me in the lurch. He has given Himself such endless trouble with our house that we can assume that he has not done it for nothing. Brandenburg, we are called to greatness! To those glorious days I will lead you! Do not let grumblers and the party speeches of discontented persons darken your future." It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of that deliverance. It is a historic manifesto. Naturally, the speech has caused a profound and indeed painful impression throughout Germany. That well-known authority the Berlin correspondent of the Times says: "The speech is the chief topic of conversation in all classes of society. It is felt that the gauntlet has been thrown down, and that the struggle between the Government and the Opposition will now be fought out to the bitter end. The Education Bill, the Bill repressing drunkenness, and other measures which provoked public protest will now be forced through the Legislature at all costs. Should the Education Bill be refused by the Upper House, a crisis will be reached, which may afford an opportunity for Prince Bismarck's reappearance. Should he oppose the Bill in the Upper House, he will occupy the position of leader of the German nation."

THE Government having taken women labourers under its protection, and relieved them of one hour's work, the mill owners of Ahmedabad are changing the sex of their proletariat, depending more and more upon working men rather than working women, inasmuch as the former work for twelve hours as heretofore, while the latter cannot, under the Act, be worked more than eleven. Already, we learn from Native Opinion, hundreds of factory women have thus been discharged and males taken in in their places.

THE Malabar Marriage Commission has presented its report. To the great question whether the peculiar marriage customs in the Malabar country were founded on or connected with religion, the unanimous answer of the members is in the negative. Accordingly, they advise legislation. Towards this end, the Nair member, Mr. C. Sankaran Nair, laid before his colleagues certain suggestions which were accepted by them all with the exception of the President. These have been formulated in a Bill, which will probably be introduced in the legislature. The President thinks that the legislature should attempt nothing beyond recognising the existing forms of union. These forms are so numerous that the other members regard the President's proposition impracticable.

PERCHED high up in the great chain of mountains which separates Southern from High or main Asia, where it ceases to be the Hindu Kush and takes the name of the Himalayas, is Chilas. It is one of the frontiers of Cashmere to which it is understood to pay an almost nominal allegiance. And now that slender tie between the two has been cut. The place could scarcely support a costly establishment, and the people could not brook the presence of a lot of foreigners, little men dressed in brief authority, among them and, what was far more intolerable, over them. Chilas paid a little tribute in token of submission, but this was quietly collected and remitted by the people themselves, and not, as we take it, exacted by a foreign agency. The only overt indication of not necessarily subjection but connection at all was the maintenance in Chilas of an intelligencer from the Durbar—a correspondent. Call him Resident if you will, but this was his real position. Of course, being there, not the least of his duties is to remind the natives of their obligation in regard to the tribute and to see to its transmission. Whether this officer was wanting in tact, or whatever be the cause, the Chilasees have kicked him out. And there is a talk of sending out a small expedition to chastise these "cheeky" mountaineers of Chilas.

THE troubles of Baboo Mahendranath Chatterjee, the Plender of Mhow in Central India, and proprietor and editor of the defunct Eastern Herald, sentenced to nine months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,500 for defamation of the European Secretary of the Maharaja Holkar, but set free by the Viceroy, are not yet ended.

He is not allowed to practise in the Courts subordinate to the Central India Agency. The Baboo has appealed to the Viceroy against this injustice of his Agent in Central India. We understand that the Baboo's release from jail was unconditional. He has suffered much for any folly he may have committed. He cannot revive his journal. The Agent might have some justification in not allowing it, but to drive him from his profession is to punish him for attempting honest labor for livelihood and, after his late disaster, is withal vindictive cruelty.

THE Behar Herald of March 12 writes:—

"His Royal Highness, Prince Damrong of Siam, was at Gya, the other day for the purpose of a pilgrimage to Budh Gya. He was accompanied by Mr. Grierson, who explained to him all the important inscriptions on the walls, the exact position of the sacred tree, and the site which may be taken as the place of Nirvana. The Mohant of Budh Gya made suitable arrangements for the reception of the Prince and presented him with an address of welcome. The Mohant is, we believe, a Shivate Syannassi and cannot officiate in any way in the Temple. He is the owner, because it is situated within his zemindari, just as much as he can be said to be the owner of a mosque, or a temple situated within its cubit. It may be that to it, the late Mohant, owed the distinction that he enjoyed above all the Mohants in the district, of Gya, and the present man considers it as a 'precious diadem' of which 'he is justly proud,' but in our opinion, it would be much better if he were to accede to the temple being made over to its legitimate owners and worshipers. It is a huge misnomer that this Mohant is known as the 'Mohant of Budh Gya.'"

Just so! And while the learned Indian Buddhist, Dharmaraj Bhikshu, is practically denied access to the temple! This pilgrim is now in quest of justice from the Lieutenant-Governor.

THE season closes in Calcutta on Wednesday, March 23, with the Garden Party at Government House. The Viceroy leaves the winter capital on the 28th following, reaching Simla on the 21st April, taking in his way Bombay, Pachmar and Khanki. At the Western capital, Lord Lansdowne will open the Tansa water works.

THE Central Provinces and Berar News and Railway Gazette, we regret to notice, labours under the same failing as the People's Friend, namely, an unfortunate habit of what the wise call "conveying" other people's goods. In a sub-leader, in our issue of the 27th February, we adverted to the literary phenomenon of the Madras journalist using the best part of one of our issues—often to the very words—for the best part of one of his, without acknowledgment. It is the same in the Central Provinces, only not on so big a scale. Nor does the Nagpur journalist give himself any unnecessary trouble in tinkering the cribbed article to make it look somewhat like a home production. The Central Provinces and Berar News and Railway Gazette of the 11th March simply coolly transfers, without the slightest acknowledgment, two of our original paragraphs—Notes—of the 20th February into its editorial columns.

POETRY does not apparently thrive among the British in the Central Provinces. There is no lack of good scenery to stimulate the fancy. At any rate, there is abundance of materials for satire. But this is all the use made of the opportunity by the Nagpur Juvenal!

"Chillies and salt he knows how to buy
And when making payment, he'll tell a big lie;
And even the cook, though a poor old man
He'll rob of an anna, whenever he can.

With the ladies he thinks, it is his rightful due
To help himself to kisses a few;
Like the Turk in his harem, he does a queer grin
While his servants they curse, and say God help him."

—to quote the last two stanzas of a piece in the local print.

Both thought and expression are beyond praise. The writer beats hollow "the Turk in his harem, in doing a queer grin"—in the "pottery" business. Edmond Burke, in translating, while a boy of sixteen, a famous passage in classical literature, rhymed ease with days. It was, of course, due to his Irish pronunciation. But here we have, we fear, a more serious case—one evidently of congenital deformity. There is something wrong in the auricular nerve which perceives a sameness between "grin" and "him." Yes, it is a question of ears, after all. What is the length of these appendages of these poetical Britishers?

IN native households in India, the resident physicians (of European medicine) are not confined to jalap and bark, but are utilised in more practical and profitable work. This is specially the case in the Native States. Ranjeet Singh employed Dr. Honigbeiger in making brandy and spirits for his own consumption and gunpowder for his army. We are not surprised to find, therefore, that Dr. Gray, the present Physician to the Cabul Durbar, had been to Europe not to perfect himself in the art of healing and saving men, but to seek more efficient instruments for killing. He has now brought out a consignment of magazine rifles. Whatever may be thought of the propriety of such a mission for a son of Æsculapius, there can be no doubt about the Ameer's appreciation of his doctor and the European practice of medicine. Not problems regarding sanitation or the specific action of drugs, nor even the quest of the philosopher's stone or the elixir of lasting juvenescence, are the Ameer's care. For other things absorb him—thoughts like the following—

What rhubarb, senna, or what purgative drug,
Would scour these English hence?

Abdur Rahman is an Afghan after all. He is thankful for what he gets from England, but he probably suspects that it is the refuse of the Indian arsenals that is turned into a presentation quadruped for his acceptance. And he may be excused for thinking that, if he would be really strong, he must acquire his arms according to his own choice. With arms received from the British gratis, he could never meet the British—or the Russians either.

Hope is constant, if not very strong, on the social and religious question. At any rate, since the Consent Bill controversy when it not only set up as the Hindoo Pope—sure exponent of the sastras—but also sounded the depths of the ignorance of its neighbours, we have to approach our contemporary on those subjects with caution. Total ignorance may, however, be allowed to ask true scholarship just one question. In taking up the cudgels in behalf of Mr. R. C. Dutt's school History of India, Hope passes a strong and sweeping condemnation on all the recognised writers as historians of ancient Hindu India, Dutt included. From Hunter the Editor thus passes to Dutt:—

"In Mr. Dutt's book also there are a few chapters devoted to this very subject. These chapters are, however, generally based upon informations received second-hand. At best these chapters never show on the part of their writer more than a dabbling in the ancient works from which they are said to be derived. For a true Sanskrit scholar, who has carefully read the Vedas, the Puranas and the Sanhitas, would regard it highly foolish and ridiculous to say that the Vedas are only a few thousand years old, or that the four Vedas were produced at four distant periods, or that the Mahavarata was written before the Ramayana, or that the incidents of the Ramayana were historically of later occurrence than those of the Mahavarata.

Yet these things are deliberately passed off as historical facts and no better arguments are given in their support than bold assumptions and imaginary theories. The Ramayana and Mahavarat are looked upon as mythologies dealing with fables of the imagination, though they give a far more faithful account of the ancient Hindus and their manners and customs than these so-called histories which are filled more with figments spun out of the imagination of the writers and facts tinged with their individual prejudices."

[We have reproduced our contemporary with the peculiarities of the text, not knowing what is the writer's originality and what the printer's lapse.]

Such is the criticism of the Hindu Revival. We confess we do not sympathise with it. We are not of those who hold, Our country, right or wrong. And our maxim is, Plato is great but Truth is greater. But we are getting impertinent. So we will ask our question and be done.

What are "the Vedas, the Puranas and the Sanhitas" in particular of "the true Sanskrit [Sanskrit?] scholar?"

INDIAN ECONOMISTS AND THE VALUE OF THEIR NOSTRUMS.

THE report of the first Conference of the Poona Industrial Association is out. It is a neat little volume containing the full text of the addresses delivered, the papers read, and the resolutions passed at the three meetings held at the capital of the Peshwas in August last. The object for which the Association has been organised, cannot but have the sympathy of every well-wisher of India. But as to the efficacy of the means proposed to be employed, there seems to us to be room for considerable difference of opinion. We gave expression to our views on the subject at the time when the Conference met. And in the report now before us we see nothing to alter our opinion. On the contrary, it serves only to deepen our conviction that the Industrial parliament, inaugurated by our Poona friends, may involve quite as needless a waste of energy and resource, and in the end prove quite as abortive, as the political movement organised at the suggestion, and under the guidance, of Mr. Hume. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur Mahadeb Govind Ranade's paper on the reorganisation of real credit in India, and Dr. Dhanokoti Rajoo's paper on Indian iron and steel, deserve serious attention. Mr. Nutt's paper urging on the Government of India to buy its stores from local manufacturers in all cases where there is no difference of quality or price, is also to the point. But we cannot appreciate the value of most of the other remedies prescribed by the Association for bringing about the industrial amelioration of India. We must confess that we have no faith whatever in exhibitions, technical schools and industrial surveys which the Conference recommends by its resolutions. As to exhibitions, the mover of the resolution on the subject himself says:—

"The experience of the Calcutta Exhibitions of 1883-84 is not very encouraging on the point. The anticipations of its promoters have not been realised and the display, though held under the most favourable auspices, has left no impress on the industrial life of the country."

Exhibitions are certainly useful in Europe and America, where the people are making vast and rapid strides in the improvement of the industrial arts. But an exhibition in India is only a solemn mockery—nay, a cruel insult. If our infant industries be represented as hanging by the neck on the gibbet of British mercantile selfishness misnamed "Free Trade," and if Manchester be represented as sucking the life-blood of its victims, that would be a fitting exhibition for India. In the present state of things, the economical condition of the country could be adequately represented, only if it were possible to bring together, in all their wretchedness, the millions of weavers who have been thrown out of employment by the import of Manchester piece-goods. It would be a ghastly spectacle of human misery. Yet it would represent the economical ruin of the country in a far more life-like manner than the pomp and pageantry of a Joubert's farce.

In countries where everything is being done to improve the industrial arts, it is useful at times to take a bird's eye view of what has been achieved, and also to hold a comparison with the products and capabilities of other parts of the world. But of what use is an exhibition in India? To a man who is well-housed, well-fed and well-clothed, a change of scenery or climate may bring about some improvement in health. But what can the sight of a sanitarium do to the victim of penury and starvation? To deny him a handful of rice while urging him to spend the last pice he may have to catch a glimpse of celestial Darjeeling or Simla, is only cruel mockery, of which there can be no justification whatever.

With regard to technical schools and industrial surveys, our views are well known to our readers, and we need not repeat here what we have before said on the subject. With such statistics as we do already possess, indeed without the need of any statistics, we all know what our most important economical wants are. It would not matter much if leather or soap or candles or painter's stores or even paper continued to be imported from foreign countries for some time to come. The total value of all these items, falls short of even a tenth part of the amount that represents the value of cotton piecegoods imported from Manchester. What we want most urgently, are cotton mills and iron foundries. These industries do not require for their further expansion either neatly tabulated statistics, or operatives trained in chemistry, algebra and portrait painting. They require only a little of that protection to which, during their infancy, they are entitled, according to the highest authorities of the economical science, but which our Government has denied to them for the sake of Manchester. If our rulers had not made cotton piecegoods duty free, the indigenous mills would have flourished; more mills would have been set up; there would have been no necessity whatever for the hated income tax; and the rupee would not have been depreciated to the extent that it now is.

Speaking of the depreciated rupee, we cannot do without referring to the paper on the "Rupee and Foreign Trade," read at the Conference by Mr. David Gostling, F. R. I. B. A. E. G. H. His account of the causes of low exchange, is accurate enough. He says:—

"The Indian Government having to pay in London fourteen millions sterling yearly,—I believe their indebtedness during the current year has increased to sixteen millions,—sell their drafts on India, when the rupee is worth 15 1/2 for Rs. 21,000,000, &c., they agree to pay in India this value of Rupees on demand to the bankers and merchants who purchase their drafts in London. The Government pay this amount out of their land revenue and other sources of income in India. The money is paid at the Government Reserve Treasuries in Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. Thus at that rate of exchange, £14,000,000 in London exchange for Rs. 21,000,000 in India. But the balance of trade in favour of India, including the amount paid for the above Government drafts, varies from Rs. 24,000,000 to Rs. 30,000,000. This variation is due partly to bad or good harvests in India and partly to bad or good trade prices in England. It has been established that, during seasons of unusually bad trade in England, when prices have fallen to their lowest point, when English manufacturers and merchants are not able to sell their goods, and are obliged, at any sacrifice, to get advances from the banks and keep trade going, to accomplish this they ship their goods on consignment to India, and take their chance of selling at any price on arrival. In such circumstances the Indian Banks in London having purchased drafts payable in India secured as to repayment by these goods, and the total value of these goods being thus larger than usual, they require less silver and a less value of Government drafts to make up their balance of remittance. They are thus in the commanding position to be able to say to the holders of silver, we require no silver this week unless you make us a concession; and they give the same answer to the India Office. If silver is weakly held they purchase silver, if Indian drafts they purchase the latter; neither party can afford to be left in the cold, and thus both silver and India drafts go down in price."

To understand the above, it is necessary to bear in mind that, in the normal state of things, the exports and imports of a country must be of equal value. The exports represent the price paid for the imports, and, necessarily, there must be equality in their value, unless affected by other circumstances. As a matter of fact, the exports of India exceed her imports every year by nearly 30 crores of rupees. The price of the excess of India's exports, is paid by the English merchants either by importing silver to India, or by buying the bills on the Indian treasuries which are sold by the Secretary of State. It was the demonitization of silver by Germany that first brought about the fall in the price of silver. But the evil, if it is such, is materially aggravated by the competition of the Secretary of State, who sells more than 200 millions of silver rupees in the Indian treasuries for their equivalent in gold paid to him in London. The adoption of the bimetallic principle by America and by all the European nations, might restore silver to its former footing. But the history of the American silver legislation shows, that no one nation, however great, can do much single-handed. On the other hand, the day seems to be yet very far in the distance, when there will be unanimity among all the great nations of the world, as to making the coinage of silver free. Mr. Gostling suggests that the Government of India should impose restrictions on the coinage of silver, as the United States and the continental nations of Europe have done, since its demonitization by Germany. A far better plan would be to impose a duty on silver bullion imported into India. While silver is allowed to be imported duty free, the imposition of restrictions on its coinage in the Government mints, would only make the temptation for illicit coining irresistible to the Sonar and the Bania. By the regulation of currency suggested by Mr. Gostling, Government might derive some benefit from the unearned increment that would take place in the value of the rupee. A duty on silver would secure to the public exchequer not only that invisible benefit, but also a visible revenue. The only objection to the measure is, that it would, in the long run, only aggravate the evil by lowering still further the price of silver in the European markets.

Then are there no remedies for low exchange? We think there are, and, some of them being entirely in the hands of our rulers, we wonder much that our Anglo-Indian friends never insist upon their application. We see no reason why they should fear Manchester as Her Majesty's ministers do. The rupee being the standard coin of India, her demand for it is limited only by her means to buy it. At the present time, the balance of trade being about 30 crores, and the Home charges about 20 crores, India imports on an average about ten crores in silver. Should the Home charges be diminished, or if there should be an increase in the balance of trade, then the demand for silver would obviously increase to a corresponding extent. If only cotton piece-goods, ironware and salt ceased to be imported, then the balance of trade would be wide enough to absorb all the silver in the European markets, within a few years. The two remedies for low exchange which are absolutely in the power of our rulers, are:—

1. Diminution of Home charges.
2. Imposition of an import duty on cotton piece-goods and ironware.

If our Anglo-Indian friends choose to accept the depreciated rupee and the Income tax, in spite of these obvious preventives, they have only themselves to blame.

SELF-DESTRUCTION OF HINDU WOMEN.

WITHIN the last few years and especially within the last one year, the number of suicides among Hindoo women in and about Calcutta has been alarmingly great. It is a matter of no less regret than surprise, that such a growing calamity has not up to this time engaged the serious attention of the thoughtful in that community, nor attracted the notice of the press. Beyond recording an isolated case now and then or commenting upon the merits of an incident of more than common pathos, it does not seem that this important subject has received that attention from the public and the press which it deserves. We think it is high time that public attention should be directed towards it, and it is with this object alone that we have taken up pen. We do not profess to be able to deal with the subject satisfactorily, as all the materials required to do justice to it are not in our possession. We shall only make certain observations based upon individual experience and not upon any vital statistics or analysis of all recorded cases. We shall deal with it from a general and commonsense point of view.

Even a cursory looking over the Calcutta daily papers of the last few months, ought to enable one to realize the truth of what we have stated. But this is not all the information on this unfortunate subject. If the daily Police reports of Calcutta and the suburbs are examined, it would appear that all cases of suicide are not reported by the press, but only the important and sensational ones, leaving out dozens. If these Police reports of the last 6 years are compared with some of the previous years, it will clearly appear to what extent, in number, in importance, and in melancholy significance, these cases have increased. In former days, self-destruction was rare and mostly confined among the lower classes. Now we find a sufficiently large number among the middle and educated classes and sometimes among the higher classes too.

Generally, there appear to be three effective ways by which life is destroyed: (1) opium or other poisoning, (2) hanging, and (3) drowning in tanks or excavations adjoining the house or in the neighbourhood. Let us see who are the victims of such painful and rash acts. One would fain think that most of them are widows, whose lives are presumably unhappy for more than one reason in the Hindoo household. But no, this surmise seems incorrect. Most of the victims are young married women, whose lives might be presumed happy and who are in their prime of life, full of hope and tender and cherished ambitions of their own kind. The question then arises, Why do they destroy themselves? What makes them so unhappy as to be sick of their precious lives? What are the vital causes which lead, not to say force, them to self-destruction? What has made their relation with their husbands and their female relations so intolerable?

These are the few principal causes of suicide which we have chiefly noticed: (1) the ill-treatment which the wife receives from the notorious mother-in-law and the no less formidable nanud—the husband's elder sister; (2) husband's ill-treatment of her and want of sympathy with her, for various reasons, viz., evil habits of drunkenness, and debauchery, which make her life bitter and a burden to her. In some cases, young, inexperienced, and impulsive husbands are prompted by their mothers and sisters to ill-treat their wives, and whenever there is any quarrel or disagreement between the wife and her mother-in-law and nanuds, the husband generally sides with his mother and sister and chastises and ill-treats his young and helpless wife. Sometimes, these unfortunate girls are cruelly and brutally thrashed by their husbands, either at the instigation of their mother-in-law or the sisters-in-law, or at her remonstrating against the conduct of the husband. They are subject to many other mental and physical tortures, which it is difficult to describe in detail. For months and years, these unfortunate creatures bear their miseries and sorrow with heroic silence, like dumb animals, until their lives become truly embittered, when, hopeless of any redress, and straining their eyes in vain for the faintest silver lining in the prospect before them, they are driven to seek for "the golden key of the chamber of eternal happiness." When the relation between the husband and the wife or between her and his female relations becomes strained and unpleasant, then all her communications are cut off from her parents or relations, or at least attempts are made in that direction with more or less success. The knowledge of this fact intensifies her wounded feeling and raises it to the highest pitch of desperation and hopelessness, resulting, in most cases, in her self-destruction, accompanied not unfrequently as it is with a train of misfortune, disgrace, trouble and shame for the families of her husband and of her father.

The reasons which we have adduced above, are not mere conjectures. They are founded on positive evidence and reliable information. Apart from the evidence collected by the Police or given before the coroner or the Magistrate, we have had the painful duty of reading several letters written by some unfortunate wives before committing suicide. More really pathetic and heart-rending correspondence we had never occasion to read before. In those letters also the above reasons were ascribed by those who had destroyed themselves.

It is admitted by all that a great revolution is going on in the social existence of the Hindus. Their habits, manners, social rules, ways of living, household influences and the whole household atmosphere, are all fast changing. This is regarded as a direct result of the influence of Western education and Western civilization, which are confessedly not without their peculiar attendant evils. Female education in whatever form it might be given, must be held accountable, to some extent, for the changes which are visible in the habits, thoughts, ideas, and principles of Hindu women in Bengal. Each schoolboy is a reformer in his own little family circle, and each educated lady a champion of female emancipation, protector of the rights of her sex and supporter of the Great National Congress.

Have these changes or influences anything to do, either directly or indirectly, with the lamentable increase in painful and startling suicides among the Hindu womankind? Has English education, which is claimed as a great blessing to our youngmen, made them worse husbands? Or, have the influences above described, including female education, ground self-respect of Hindu women into a keener edge than it had before? Have the ladies become more susceptible to those wrongs which they bore without murmur before? It is very difficult for anyone to assert and demonstrate any particular link between these influences or circumstances and the prevalence of self-murder, but there cannot, we believe, be much doubt that they have in one way or the other to account a great deal for this unhappy state of things.

Apart from the tyranny of the mother-in-law throughout the world, she holds in India a more impregnable position and exercises a more unquestioned authority. Here the dowagers are despots, pure and simple. They are still the strongholds of Hindu orthodoxy in all its rigidity. Their notions of the duties and rights of a wife are quite distinct from those of the Western world or those at present held by their sons and grandsons and daughters and daughters-in-law, who are receiving English education in some form or other. The education provided for the Hindu boys and girls is devoid of any religious element, and is not inappropriately called ungodly. They are all therefore quite free from any religious or moral restraints, the greatest safeguards for human society against all sorts of evils. Most of the Hindu girls now receive a sort of half-cooked, indigestible education, and hence their ideas of freedom and happiness quite unknown to their mothers and grandmothers. They have commenced to see their rights and privileges from a different point of view. How, then, are they to be expected to harmoniously, happily and quietly live, and get on, with their old-fashioned mothers-in-law and sisters-in-law? Our young men also desire to see their wives more anglicised, externally as well as internally. They not only indoctrinate them with foreign thought, but also supply them with outlandish things, openly or secretly, against the wishes of their own mothers and sisters and grandmothers. The young wife has, therefore, the difficult task of pleasing two sets of men, whose views and ideas are quite antagonistic to one another on most points, not to speak of her own new desires and thoughts. This may be one of the causes of the frequent disagreement and rupture between the daughters-in-law and the mothers-in-law of the present day. In those cases in which the standard of education of the husband is very high, and he unfortunately desires to see his wife a perfect English lady, of a type of which he has only some theoretical conception rather than knowledge, and the wife falls far short of his ideal of an accomplished wife, he feels disappointed and fails to appreciate the normal good qualities of a Hindu wife—qualities unparalleled in the history of the outside world—her sincere devotion to her husband whom she regards as an avtar, a god, her respectful submission to all her elders, her vast sympathies for every relation, and her self-sacrifice for the comforts of others, her docility in acquiring the duties of her station, her meekness under suffering, her value as a nurse and a comforter. Thus depreciated at home, he perhaps seeks his happiness elsewhere, and thus makes the life of the wife miserable.

Among Mahomedans, Jews and Christians, such misunderstanding is rare. This advantage, we believe, they owe to their early religious instruction and education, and among the two former also to their conservative rules for the guidance of their women folk and, above all, perhaps, to the absence of that female education which is so much talked of nowadays. It is an old saying "little knowledge is a dangerous thing," and it is quite applicable to the case of Hindu women or that education without religion is worse than ignorance—from an Indian point of view. It is not uncommon to see distressed Mahomedans saying when much dissatisfied with their lot and sick of their life, Oh! I would have committed suicide had I not been prevented by my religion. This shows the strong check which religious instructions place on ones wild passions.

It comes to this that the Hindu wife has no independent existence in the household of her husband where her mother-in-law rules supreme. Her own education or the husband's anglicised habits and ideas cannot give her that position which her Mahomedan or Christian sisters attain after she is installed on the glorious guddee of matrimony. Under such circumstances, it appears necessary that the Hindus should first improve their homes and turn the present queens of their household into constitutional sovereigns, before aspiring to educate and civilize their wives, as the two contradictory elements cannot be expected to remain at peace.

In most cases, in pleasing her husband the young Hindu wife unwittingly and unconsciously displeases her mother-in-law, and when the latter gives vent to her displeasure, which she usually does under some other excuse, the inexperienced husband, not knowing the real cause or sympathising with his wrong-headed and vindictive mother, takes his wife to task.

The fact that most of these cases occur in or about Calcutta, clearly goes to show that they must very probably be due to some of the causes stated above. Calcutta is now the centre of Western education and civilization for the Hindus, where their influences are most acted upon, and are more strongly felt by their objects than in any other part of the country. In the interior, such cases are very few and far between and of no particular consequence. The social phenomenon in question certainly does not occur in any of the several important towns and stations where we have lived for years and had ample opportunities for observation and enquiry.

The ease with which the Hindu ladies of good families get opportunities of committing suicide, does not speak in favor of the control and supervision which Hindu gentlemen exercise over their households. It clearly points to great laxity of supervision. Surely, it must be very difficult for a female member to get opium with such ease in a well-regulated family or to hang herself. Alas, how few must be the well-regulated households! Free intercourse with outsiders, perfectly irresponsible position of female attendants, employment of young boys as servants and allowing them access to the inner apartments—all these help to bring opium or other destructive poisons within the easy reach of the ladies. In many families may be seen grown up up-country Hindu male servants moving in the female apartments with more freedom than an Aya has in an English household. These men are not like the polished servants of respectable Mahomedan or European gentlemen, but mere coolies, with (in some cases) rags tied round their waist. This last remark refers to the educated middle classes chiefly.

A well-regulated and properly supervised house is free from many such dangers, or at least protected to a great extent. The freedom which the half-educated and semi-civilized Hindus now generally wish to give to their women, is neither fish nor fowl. It is based on no principle and, in fact, has no meaning. It, therefore, gives rise to many dangers and troubles, and must involve them in the future in great difficulties which they cannot foresee in their zeal of new converts to foreign ideas, thoughts and habits, but which they must feel most keenly. In our opinion, it is undermining the good old Hindu society. Foreign habits and thoughts must be adopted with very great care and by degrees, if at all. We believe this mischief of opium-poisoning may be much minimized, if not entirely stopped, if Government take some action in the matter as not to make it easily accessible to those who are not entitled to have or possess it.

Our opinions, conjectures, and observations must, we are afraid, be full of errors and subject to correction by those who are better informed and have given more attention to the subject. But we may, in conclusion, be permitted to say this much that we have placed at least some materials before the public, however incomplete, for discussion. We hope the press will take up the subject in earnest.

A HINDOO WIDOW'S INHERITANCE.

The question as to whether a Hindoo widow, by marrying a second husband who was not a Hindoo (she herself having changed her religion prior to contracting the second marriage), forfeited her right, title and interest in her first husband's estate in favour of the next heir, was referred to the Full Bench for opinion by Justices Wilson, Prinsep, and Pigot, who were disagreed on the point. The following written judgment was delivered at the High Court on Saturday by a full Bench composed of the Chief Justice, and Justices Wilson, Pigot, Ghose and Prinsep.

Sir Comer Petheram, C. J.—The question submitted for the opinion of this Bench, as stated by Mr. Justice Wilson, is as follows: "In this case a Hindoo widow inherited the property of her husband, taking therein the estate of a Hindoo widow. She afterwards married a second husband, not a Hindoo, in the form provided by Act III of 1872, having first made a declaration, as required by Section 10 of the Act, that she was not a Hindoo. The question is, whether, by that marriage, she forfeited her interest in her first husband's estate in favour of the next heir?" I think that the decision, reported at page 206 of the third Weekly Reporter, is wrong, and I agree with the learned Judges who referred the question—that it must be answered in the affirmative. It is, I think, concluded by section 2 of the Hindoo Widows' Marriage Act XV of 1856, and I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on the other points, which have been mentioned in argument, and which are discussed in the judgment of the Judges who constituted the referring Bench.

The first two sections of the Act are as follow:—

"I. No marriage contracted between Hindoos shall be invalid, and the issue of no such marriage shall be illegitimate, by reason of the woman having been previously married or betrothed to another person who was dead at the time of such marriage, any custom and any interpretation of Hindoo law to the contrary notwithstanding.

"II. All rights and interests which any widow may have in her deceased husband's property by way of maintenance, or by inheritance to her husband or to his lineal successors, or by virtue of any will or testamentary disposition conferring upon her, without express permission to re-marry, only a limited interest in such property, with no power of alienating the same, shall, upon her re-marriage, cease and determine as if she had then died; and the next heirs of her deceased husband, or other persons entitled to the property on her death, shall thereupon succeed to the same."

Section I. no doubt relates to marriages between Hindoos, but Section II. includes all widows who are within the scope of the Act, that is to say, all persons who being Hindoos become widows, and it must follow from this that if any such widow re-marries, she is deprived by the section of the estate which she inherited from her Hindoo husband. The words are clear:—"All rights which any widow may have in her deceased husband's property by inheritance to her husband." The estate which a Hindoo widow takes upon her husband's death in his property is an estate which she takes by inheritance to him, and such estate is expressly determined by the section.

My answer to the question is, that by marriage the widow forfeited her estate in her first husband's property, in favour of the next heir.

Wilson, J.—I agree. I think it is unnecessary to say more, as I expressed my views in making the reference.

Pigot, J.—I agree.

Ghose, J.—I agree in the answer which the Chief Justice has given to the question referred.

Prinsep, J.—The inclination of my opinion has been always against the view expressed by my two learned colleagues, who joined with me in referring this case to a Full Bench, and I still have doubts, which the further argument has failed entirely to remove.

Act XV of 1856 is entitled an Act to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindoo widows, and it provides for such marriages according to the rites and ceremonies current amongst Hindoos. The widow in the case before us ceased to be a Hindoo by a public declaration abjuring that religion, and her re-marriage was under Act III of 1872, entitled an Act to provide a form of marriage in certain cases. That Act was passed by the Legislature expressly for cases of this description. If the widow had merely renounced the Hindoo religion, admittedly she would not have ceased to hold her deceased husband's estate. She could not, after her conversion to another religion, confer on him what are known in Hindoo law as spiritual benefits; but it is said she would still be regarded as a part of her husband's body, and as such in possession of his worldly properties. It has been contended that her title is only during her widowhood, durante viduata, in consequence of the principle under which she is recognised as proprietress after her husband's death. It is difficult to understand how that legal fiction can be maintained if, after her husband's death, the widow were to become a Mahomedan or a Christian. The statute however (Act XXI. of 1850) has provided that a change of religion shall not operate as a forfeiture, and according to the opinions, in which I am unable to agree, a re-marriage not as a Hindoo would have that effect. We have also the anomaly that, although she may change her religion and cease to be a Hindoo, so long as she remains a widow, she continues as a Hindoo to hold her husband's estate; that she does not forfeit this by leading a notoriously unchaste life (see Moniram Kalitani vs. Kaly Kalitani, I. L. R., 5, Cal., 776), but that if she remarries she forfeits because she ceases to be a widow, and because the conditions under which she retained her husband's estate as part of his body no longer exist. I have the misfortune of being unable to agree that Section 2, Act XV of 1856, is of general application to all Hindoo widows re-marrying, for I read it as being limited only to the cases provided for by that Act, viz., Hindoo widows re-marrying as Hindoos under Hindoo law, as provided by that Act. Having still these doubts regarding the views expressed by my learned colleagues, I regret to be unable to concur in the judgment delivered.

THE CALCUTTA MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

THE JOINT HINDU FAMILY AS VOTER AND CANDIDATE.

At the High Court on Tuesday, March 14, Mr. Hill applied to Mr. Justice Trevelyan for a rule calling upon Mr. Lee, the Chairman of the Corporation of Calcutta, and Babu Mutty Lal Ghose, a candidate for election in Ward No. 1, to show cause why the name of the latter should not be removed from the list of candidates published under Act II. of 1888. The objection taken to the candidate was that he was not qualified to be elected as a candidate as he was qualified to vote not in his own right but only on behalf of a Hindu joint family of which he was a member. It was stated that he did not pay any rate.

Trevelyan, J.—You have come to me on the 14th to prevent an election taking place on the 15th.

Mr. Hill explained how his client had not been able to apply before, that this was the earliest opportunity he had had of moving the Court. He also pointed out that if a rule nisi was granted, that would not in any way interfere with the holding of the election or the candidature of Babu M. L. Ghose.

Trevelyan, J.—To me it looks like an electioneering dodge to prevent this man getting any votes. I do not like issuing a rule at this time.

Mr. Hill.—The rule will not prevent votes being recorded for him. We contend that his candidature is an electioneering dodge for splitting votes by putting up an ineligible candidate. Section 14 lays down that any person qualified to vote under any of the preceding sections shall, subject to certain other provisions of the Act, be qualified to be elected a Commissioner. Section 8 provides who are qualified to vote, and the following sections lay down in which wards such persons are entitled to vote, and to how many votes they are entitled. He cannot vote under any provision of Section 8 other than sub-section (c), and he cannot vote under that sub-section because he has not paid on his sole account and in his own name the requisite amount for rates and taxes.

Trevelyan, J.—According to you no member of a joint family can vote.

Mr. Hill criticised the wording of the Act.

Trevelyan, J.—One has heard a good many complaints of the old Act of 1871, but under this Act we seem to be worse of than before.

Mr. Hill.—It is certainly drawn with an utter disregard of consistency of language. Under Act IV of 1876—

Trevelyan, J.—One Bengal Act at a time is enough.

Mr. Hill.—The Court can interfere in a case of this kind. On the 30th of September, 1882, Mr. Justice Norris granted a rule to show cause why certain votes should not be struck out, and not counted.

Trevelyan, J.—I may have power under the Act, but I dislike interfering where powers have been given to another person.

Mr. Hill.—The Courts at home decided a question as to the construction of a section of the County Councils Act when they decided that the word 'person' did not include a woman.

Trevelyan, J.—That probably was under a writ of quo warranto or some similar writ, but in this country all those writs have been swept away, and only the section of the Specific Relief Act is left.

Mr. Hill submitted that that section gave the Court the necessary power to act in this case.

Trevelyan, J.—If he is qualified to be a voter he is qualified to be a candidate, and the Chairman, as he has power to do, has decided that he is qualified to vote.

Mr. Hill.—The Chairman has published a list which shows he is not a voter.

Trevelyan, J.—I cannot see how I can give a rule on the candidate. That is quite clear. I doubt whether under the Act Mr. Lee has power to do anything beyond publishing a list of candidates.

After some further discussion the following order was made: On the undertaking of the applicant to serve this rule by 2 p.m. this day and to serve with it a copy of his petition, let a rule issue calling on Mr. Lee, Chairman of the Corporation of Calcutta, to show cause this day at 3-30 p.m. why the name of Babu Mutty Lall Ghose should not be removed from the list of candidates published under the provisions of Act II of 1888.

At the time fixed Mr. Pugh and Mr. Garth appeared on behalf of the Chairman to show cause against the rule, while Mr. Hill appeared in support of the rule.

Mr. Pugh.—The candidate should be represented.

Mr. Hill.—I am instructed that Babu Kallynath Mitter, who is present, is the candidate's attorney, and can accept service for him.

Trevelyan, J.—He does not hold any public office, and so I do not see my way to ordering service on him.

Mr. Hill.—In Dr. Rajendralala Mitra's case, Norris, J., ordered service on the candidate.

Mr. Pugh.—It is too late for such an application to be made.

Trevelyan, J.—The applicant has satisfied me, subject to what you may say, that he could not have moved before to-day.

Mr. Pugh.—Under Section 31 of the Act the Chairman has to see whether certain requirements have been complied with, and if they have been, as is admittedly the case here, he has no choice, but to accept an applicant's name.

Trevelyan, J.—Who then is to enquire into the eligibility of a candidate?

Mr. Pugh.—No one under the Act.

Trevelyan, J.—Then anyone who likes can come forward, even though ineligible.

Mr. Pugh.—He would be liable to have his election declared void by this Court.

Trevelyan, J.—Under what section?

Mr. Pugh.—Under no section, but under the general provisions of the law.

Trevelyan, J.—There is something in the applicant's contention that in such a case ineligible candidates might be put up to split votes.

Mr. Pugh.—The election in such a case could be set aside as void. What remedy would they have at home?

Trevelyan, J.—A writ of quo warranto.

Mr. Pugh.—Here they have Section 45 of the Specific Relief Act instead. The Chairman has done everything he is empowered to do under Section 31 of the Act and can do no more. Supposing your Lordship did make this rule absolute, what result would it have?

Trevelyan, J.—In that case the polling officers would not take any votes for him. I cannot see how under this Act any persons can become elected. It is not set out in the Act or the Rules.

Mr. Pugh.—It is left to people's common sense.

Trevelyan, J.—The nearest approach to it is Rule 18. So far as I can make out from the sections there is nothing whatever to prevent anyone who pleases to come forward for election. Probably after election he could be sued, but there is nothing to prevent his candidature.

Mr. Pugh.—It can hardly be said to be clearly incumbent on the Chairman to do what is prescribed neither by the Act nor by the Rules. All that he can do is to see that the particular conditions specified in Section 31 have been complied with. I am placed in an awkward position in this case by the short notice given of this rule.

Trevelyan, J.—If you can tell me what the Act or Rules mean about this, I will give you as long time as you like. It would be a most valuable discovery.

Mr. Pugh.—I do not know that I should be able to do that, but I should be surer of my facts than I am now.

Trevelyan, J.—Is there any provision in the Act for void elections? Who is to determine if they are void?

Mr. Pugh.—This Court.

Trevelyan, J.—Why this Court?

Mr. Pugh.—Under Section 45 of the Specific Relief Act. There is no connection between Section 31 and Section 14, and the Chairman cannot interfere in the matter.

Trevelyan, J.—This is the first time in this country that I have seen an official professing to have lesser powers than are imputed to him.

Mr. Pugh.—It would be a good thing if it were commoner. I do not know of a single English case where this question as to the eligibility of a candidate has been decided before the election. It would be a serious drawback to standing for election if a candidate were liable to have serious charges of the nature specified in Section 32 brought against him in Court before the election. Mutty Lall Ghose was down on the list of voters. He is living alone in the house the other members living elsewhere.

Trevelyan, J.—He is undoubtedly entitled to vote, but that is not the difficulty. Mr. Hill's point was that he could not be a Commissioner because the section giving members of a Hindu joint family leave to vote is a succeeding section to Section 14, which lays down that any person qualified to vote under any of the preceding sections is eligible as a candidate.

Mr. Pugh.—I submit that the Court would be very slow to put a construction on the Act which would debar such a large class of persons from becoming candidates. It is true it is Section 24 which provides the mode in which the names of persons authorised to vote for Hindu joint families are to be registered, but that does not disqualify all those persons from becoming candidates. No rule should issue against Mr. Lee, for he has performed his duties under Section 31, and no other duty is placed on him. In fact, no other powers are given him in this matter. If the facts are to be gone into I am instructed that Babu M. L. Ghose is the sole occupier of this house. The rule should be discharged.

Mr. Hill.—My learned friend's argument goes to show that a Hindu joint family could sit as a Commissioner, but not the person authorised to vote on its behalf. He does not, however, contend that such a family might be put on the list of candidates. The Chairman is not a mere polling officer, and it is his duty to see that persons are not put before the public as candidates for election who are not eligible for election, and the Court can compel him to perform this duty. In re the election of Dr. Rajendralala Mitra, reported in the Englishman of the 30th of September, 1882, Mr. Bonnerjee moved for a rule to strike the name of Dr. R. L. Mitra out of the published list of candidates on the ground that he was ineligible. Thus such an application was made even under the old Act. Mr. Justice Norris granted a rule made returnable on the morrow, and ordered it to be served on the Chairman, Mr. Harrison, and Dr. Mitra. On the day fixed Mr. Harrison was unrepresented but Mr. H. Bell showed cause on behalf of the candidate. This report is instructive as showing how the same arguments against this kind of application are repeated time after time, for my learned friend's arguments had all been anticipated in this case. After hearing Mr. Bonnerjee in support of the rule Mr. Justice Norris held that though the member of the joint family by whom the taxes on the property were paid was Dr. Mitra, he was not qualified to become a candidate, and made the rule absolute, as it might prejudice the position of the other candidates if he was allowed to go to the poll, and as the applicant had no other remedy, an injury is done to the person who has the franchise by the introduction of an ineligible candidate. If we waited till after the election, the mischief would be done. The rule should be made absolute.

Mr. Pugh.—Dr. Mitra's case was decided under a different Act.

Trevelyan, J.—This is an application made under Section 45 of the Specific Relief Act. I granted a rule this morning. There are two possible defects in that rule. It is doubtful whether it should not have been addressed to the Commissioners and not to Mr. Lee. Another objection might be taken which I do not, however, think it necessary to take into consideration. It might, moreover, lead to delay, and in this case I must decide the question in issue at once. The point is this: This man Mutty Lall Ghose is on the revised list of voters for the municipal election to be held to-morrow for himself and other co-sharers. He is not on that list separately. The Calcutta Municipality Act has, I think, been attacked sufficiently during the hearing, and I feel I ought to deal kindly with it and not attack it any more. The persons who are qualified to be elected are to be found in Section 14, which says that any person qualified to vote under any of the preceding sections shall, subject to certain other provisions of the Act, be qualified to be elected a Commissioner for any ward in Calcutta. The right of a Hindu joint family to appoint one of their members or another person to vote for them is conferred by a section, Section 24, which does not precede Section 14, and accordingly Mr. Hill objects to a person so qualified to vote standing for election. I do not think it would be safe for me to lay down on such very short consideration an absolute rule like this which might have a great effect upon the exercise of the franchise in this city. Under Section 45 of the Specific Relief Act I cannot make an order requiring an act to be done or forbore by any person holding a public office or by any Corporation or inferior Court of Judicature unless such doing or forbearing is clearly incumbent on such person or Court in his or its public character or on such Corporation in its corporate character, and I think all the persons engaged in this case failed to find a duty clearly incumbent on Mr. Lee to exercise any judicial discretion or judicial action in the matter. Mr. Lee has, it is true, written a letter, which was an act of civility, but I must see whether it was clearly incumbent on Mr. Lee to exercise any judicial discretion. Under Section 31 there is a statutory obligation on him to publish a list of all persons who are candidates for election. If he had refused to insert Mutty Lall Ghose's name he might have come to this Court, and it might have been held incumbent on Mr. Lee to enter his name, but so far as I can find from this Act there is no provision in it giving the Chairman any power more than any other Commissioner to exclude his name from the published list of candidates. That being so, without prejudice to any question which may arise after the election, I must dismiss the rule with costs.

In scrofulous and scorbutic affections they are especially serviceable. Scourvy and eruptions, which had resisted all other modes of treatment and gradually become worse from year to year, have been completely cured by Holloway's cooling Ointment and purifying Pills, which root out the disease from the blood itself and leave the constitution free from every morbid taint. In the nursery Holloway's Ointment should be ever at hand; it will give ease in sprains, contusions, burns, scalds, and infantile eruptions, and may always safely be applied by any ordinary attendant.

SONGS IN THE NIGHT.

THE TEMPLE IN DARKNESS.

DARKNESS broods upon the temple,
Glooms along the lonely aisles,
Fills up all the orient window,
Whence, like little children's wiles,
Shadows—purple, azure, golden—
Broke upon the floor in smiles.

From the great heart of the organ
Bursts no voice of chant or psalm ;
All the air, by music-pulses
- Stirred no more, floats deathly calm ;
And no precious incense rising,
Falls, like good men's prayers, in balm.

Not a sound of living footstep
Echoes on the marble floor ;
Not a sigh of stranger passing
Pierces through the closed door.
Quenched the light upon the altar :
Where the priest stood, none stands more.

Lord, why hast thou left thy temple
Scoined of man, disowned by thee ?
Rather let thy right hand crush it,
None its desolation see !
List—"He who the temple builded Doth his will there. Let it be !"

A LIGHT IN THE TEMPLE.

Lo, a light within the temple !
Whence it cometh no man knows ;
Barred the doors : the night-black windows
Stand apart in solemn rows.
All without seems gloom eternal,
Yet the glimmer comes and goes—

As if silent-footed angels
Through the dim aisles wandered fair,
Only seen amid the darkness
By the glory in their hair.
Till at the forsaken altar
They all met, and praised God there !

*Now the light grows !—fuller, clearer !
Hark, the organ 'gins to sound,
Faint, like broken spirit crying
Unto Heaven from the ground ;
While the chorus of the angels
Mingles everywhere around !

Lo, the altar shines all radiant,
Though no mortal priest there stands,
And no earthly congregation
Worships with uplifted hands :
Yet they gather, slow and saint-like,
In innumerable bands !

And the chant celestial rises
Where the human prayers have ceased :
No tear-sacrifice is offered,
For all anguish is appeased.
Through its night of desolation,
To his temple comes—the Priest !

HAPPY ALONE.

I AM only happy when alone ;
Then I can think of thee,
And hear no harsh discordant tone
To break my reverie.
They tell me that my heart is cold—
Unsocial, too, and strange ;
- But could they see its inmost fold,
How soon their thoughts would change !

Now thou art absent, every hour
Seems doubled with Despair,
Whose stern supremacy of power
Crushes the bright and fair.
I weary of the shortest day,
Am grateful when 't is flown,
For when night comes, I steal away
To think of thee alone.

I look upon the starry skies,
'And worship each small gem ;
Because, I think, perhaps thine eyes
Are gazing, too, on them.
And then I wonder if thy love
Be constant as my own,
And if, whilst viewing them above,
Thou think'st of me alone.

I mix not with the joyous throng,
Where glad hearts aptly meet ;
- I never sing thy fav'rite song—
The one you call so sweet—
I keep it, cherish it, for thee ;
I call that song my own,
And never is it sung by me
Save when I am alone.

My thoughts, all tending to one source,
Are habited in gloom ;
Apparent joy I cannot force—
I never could assume.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

To think of thee, morn, noon, and night,
My heart is ever prone,
And all I ask to feel delight
Is but to be alone.

Oh ! when wilt thou return again
To change the hue of things ?
Time seems to move alone in pain
On dark and sombre wings.
Oh ! when wilt thou return to cheer
The heart that's all thine own,
That it may be less sad and drear—
Less happy when alone ?

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Ameer after all is not coming to India.

THE Poona Sessions Court has sentenced, under the Age of Consent Act, one Rangoba Atmaram, aged 40, to three months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 300. The jury had found him guilty.

MR. W. S. Gantz, of Madras, as Secretary to the local Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, recommended to the local Government the introduction of a system for painless destruction of dogs, and asked for a grant for construction and maintenance in Madras of the Lethal Chamber invented by Dr. W. B. Richardson, of London. The Government have replied intimating their inability to make any special grant at present.

THE Morning Post, of the 19th March, has this sensational paragraph:—

"We hear that Mr. A. O. Hume's parting shot at the Government of India takes the form of an incendiary 'private and confidential' letter addressed to the Standing Congress committee. In it the English are held up to execration, and it is affirmed that the time will come when their throats will be cut like sheep. It is altogether a peculiarly offensive and outrageous epistle, and the authorities will certainly fail in their duty if they do not arrest the writer for sedition. There is plenty of time, as Mr. Hume does not sail from Bombay till next week."

MR. P. Ramachendra Rao, Acting Sub-Collector of the Madura District, is accused of accepting presents in connection with jummabandi. Mr. Gibson, Member of the Board of Revenue, as Special Commissioner, is enquiring into the charges.

AT Quetta, a man named Futteh Din ran amok, killing four men of the 7th Bombay Lancers and wounding three others. He was arrested and was to be tried before a court-martial on the 15th March.

THE Government of India, it is said, refuse to sanction the revised mining and prospecting rules of the Madras Government, apprehending that they will foster unprincipled speculation.

THE public sitting of the Land Indebtedness Commission closed at Poona on the 15th, with the examination of the Hon'ble Rao Bahadar Ranade, Special Judge under the Relief Act.

It is reported from Hyderabad that in the Diamond case, Mr. Jacob received no extra sum beyond the 23 lacs already paid, and that the costs of the Nizam in the litigation amount to one and three-quarter lac.

THE Telegraph department oppose the proposed Madras Electric Tramway, as it is feared induction will result from the proximity of the Company's wires to the telegraph wires. To our unsophisticated imagination, the letting loose of so much electricity—currents of great force—about, has a highly sinister aspect. It will not—cannot—come to good.

THE Commission on Mr. P. C. Wheeler, the Judge of Jaunpur, have found against him. The Lieutenant-Governor agreeing with the finding, Mr. Wheeler has been suspended from active employ. The report of the Commission and the recommendation of the Local Government have gone up to the Government of India.

TWO men in a bullock-cart drove up to the house of a mahajan at Jubbulpore at night, forcibly entered the house and brought out an iron safe which they put in the cart, and drove off. Stopped on the way by the police, they gave a cock and bull story of their being bound for the railway station with goods. Instead, however, of going that way, they went to a piece of water, where they proceeded to open the box. By the time they had cut through the top lid, they were surprised and fled. They were, however, soon after traced and seized. They have since got each three years' rigorous imprisonment.

THE Viceroy leaves Calcutta next Monday at 11-45 A.M. (Calcutta Time) for Simla, via Bombay, Pachmarhi, and Khanki. He will be accompanied by Lady Lansdowne to Bombay, whence she sails for England on April 2, accompanied by Captain Viscount Valletort, A.-D.-C. to the Viceroy. Colonel Lord William Beresford, Military Secretary to the Viceroy, leaves Bombay the same day for England, Captain the Hon'ble C. Harbord, A.-D.-C., acting as Military Secretary. Colonel Ardagh has already gone on leave, having left Calcutta on Thursday. During his absence, Mr. J. P. Hewett acts as Private Secretary to the Viceroy. Of late, we see Simla does not agree with the Viceroys and their Private Secretaries, any more than the Vice-queens.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, accompanied by the Revenue Secretary and the Private Secretary, starts on a short tour in the Bhagalpur division on the evening of the same 28th March, returning to Calcutta on April 9.

It is notified in the Calcutta Gazette, that the rules of February 4, 1884, regarding the levy of excise duty on spirits manufactured or produced after the European method in Portuguese India, when imported by sea into any port within the territories administered by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, are cancelled.

SIR Charles Elliott has decided the rival claims of the two subdivisions of Chuadanga and Meherpur, in Nadia, to survival in favor of the fittest. From April next, the jurisdiction of Chuadanga, with the exception of thana Jibannagar, will be amalgamated with that of the Meherpur sub-division. Meherpur will be the headquarters of the new Sub-division, thana Jibannagar being transferred to the Sadar subdivision of the district.

FROM April 1, the Registrar of Calcutta will have an assistant in the shape of a Sub-Registrar of Calcutta, and in the person of the present Special Sub-Registrar of Alipore—Baboo Behari Lal Chandra. The Convert's place at Alipore will be filled by a Rajaling—Kumar Ramendralala Mitra, B.L., eldest son of the lamented Bengali savant, Dr. Rajendralala Mitra.

THE Indian Spectator notices the publication of a handsome edition of good Gujrati poetry by a Parsee, the late Jamshedji Nasserwanji Petit, collected and edited with a life of the Poet and a critical estimate of his work, by his friend, J. P. Mistri, M.A. As the editor in chief of the Indian Spectator is himself a true poet, not only in English but, above all, in Gujrati, our contemporary's praise of the book and of the Poet may be accepted with confidence. When will the Mahomedans of Bengal produce their Bengali Poets ?

A CORRESPONDENT, under date March 17, points out:—

"In yesterday's Calcutta Gazette, Baboo Saroda Prosad Sircar and Surut Chunder Das (two unfortunate Deputy Magistrates whose cause you were so strongly advocating) have got promotion, and about a dozen and half promotions have again been stopped including Rai Bahadur Juggadanando Mookerjee's son, Baboo Kumada's, who is at Bardwan. In the sixth grade, about 7 or 8 eight have been superseded, Mr. W. H. Thomson overtopping 7 Deputy Collectors who were above him. Mr. Donald Sunder, on deputation as Settlement Officer, Jalpaiguri Duars, too gets a lift over some of his seniors. The explanation is that the Lieutenant-Governor was pleased with his economy while on inspection at Jalpaiguri. This seems to be a dangerous way of rewarding Eurasian and European (if any) Deputy Collectors and Magistrates. In the sixth grade, all Deputy Magistrates whose promotion has been stopped, seem to be stationed in one of the unfortunate districts visited by the Lieutenant-Governor last year."

THE Midnapur College has been affiliated to the Calcutta University in ~~Law~~ up to the B. L. Standard.

ACT XXI of 1865 (to define and amend the law relating to intestate succession among the Parsis) has been extended to the whole of Upper Burma, exclusive of the Shan States.

THE Queen has been pleased to direct Letters Patent to be passed under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, granting the dignity of a Baron of the said United Kingdom unto General Sir Frederick Sleigh Roberts, Bart., G.C.B., G.C.I.E., V.C., Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces in India, and the heirs male of his body lawfully begotten, by the name, style, and title of Baron Roberts of Kandahar, in Afghanistan, and of the city of Waterford. From Baron Plassey to Baron Kandahar completes the cycle of British Empire in India.

GERMANY seems to be the true land of Rakshases. No wonder, we hear of so many giants in the folklore and mythology of the Fatherland. There are not only giants of the male sex, but there are also those of the female sex. There is no lack of tall people who measure 5ft. 7in. to 6ft. 7in., but it is men or women above that height that are considered to have attained the dignity of true giantism. The latest show of Berlin is the giantess Rosita, whose height is more than 8ft. with a weight of 350 pounds. Her birthplace is Vienna, and she was born on March 25, 1865, so that she has just completed her 27th year. Her parents are tradesmen living near Vienna, who are of normal size, but their daughter makes a good income by showing herself.

WHY was the elder Baron Rothschild's bank like one of Stowe's Training Schools? Because the walls of the bank were placarded with maxims like the following:—

1. Carefully examine every detail of your business.
2. Be prompt in everything.
3. Take time to consider, and then decide quickly.
4. Dare to go forward.
5. Bear troubles patiently.
6. Be brave in the struggle of life.
7. Maintain your integrity as a sacred thing.
8. Never tell business lies.
9. Make no useless acquaintances.
10. Never try to appear something more than you are.
11. Pay your debts promptly.
12. Learn how to risk your money at the right moment.
13. Shun strong liquor.
14. Employ your time well.
15. Do not reckon upon chance.
16. Be polite to every body.
17. Never be discouraged.
18. Then work hard and you will be certain to succeed!

IT is stated that the personal estate of the late amiable Leader of the House of Commons, Mr. W. H. Smith, has been sworn at £1,776,042. The executors are Mr. William Lethbridge, of Courtlands, Devon, barrister-at-law (his late partner), his brother-in-law, Sir Juland Danvers, of 103, Lexham Gardens, K.C.S.I., the Right Honorable George Cubitt, M. P., and the Honorable William Frederick Danvers Smith, Mr. Smith's only son, upon whom and his first and other sons in tail male Mr. Smith entails the mansion house of Greenlands, and all his real estate in Buckinghamshire, Suffolk, Devonshire, and elsewhere, subject to the use and enjoyment by his wife, now Lady Hambleden, of Greenlands, during her widowhood. The testator bequeaths to his son, when twenty-five years of age, his house in Grosvenor Place (but subject also to Lady Hambleden's use and enjoyment during her widowhood) and the plate, pictures, objects of art, articles of vertu, furniture, and household effects and outdoor effects at Greenlands and in Grosvenor Place, excepting his presentation plate and other presentations and certain chattels and pictures, which are to devolve as heirlooms with the settled real estate. Among the reserved articles are the portraits of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury, by Sir J. E. Millais; of the late Lord Iddesleigh, by the late Mr. Edwin Long; of Lord Cross, by Professor Herkomer; and of Lord John Manners now Duke of Rutland, by Mr. Oulss.

Between real and personal property, Mr. Smith must have been worth more than two millions or about three crores of Rupees.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Education Bill has produced a crisis in Germany. It was hotly opposed and passionately persisted in. The Emperor advised those who saw any occasion for disagreement with any Government measure, like true patriots, to leave the Fatherland. This Bradenbug manifesto was followed by sterner opposition to the Bill; by a prosecution, on a charge of lèse majesté, against the Cologne Gazette, for years the recognized organ of the German Foreign Office, for an article headed "A Fresh Move," in which the writer lamented the "melting away gradually during the past few years" of "the splendid inheritance bequeathed to his grandson by the great and good Emperor William I"; by the confiscation of the Berlin Neueste Nachrichten of Feb. 29, for reproducing an article in a London paper containing some caustic remarks on the Emperor's attitude. It seems though that the youthful Emperor relents the attitude taken by him. A Berlin telegram of the 18th says that the Emperor William that day deprecated in Council the forcing of the Education Bill with the support only of the Clericals. This was a surprise to the Government supporters of the Bill. Count Zedlitz Trützschler, the Prussian Minister of Instruction and Worship, has since resigned. General Caprivi too has ceased to be the Prussian Premier, though he still continues as Imperial Chancellor and Prussian Foreign Minister. The Bill is in serious peril, and will probably be abandoned.

THE Emperor has appointed Count Von Eulenburg of his Household at once Grand-Marshal of the Court and Household and Grand-Master of Ceremonies, as Prussian Premier. We hope this gentleman is something more than a mere court favourite.

THE Emperor is not yet recovered from his illness. He remains in the country abstaining from all business.

GERMANY is abetting the Russian persecution of the Jews, by closing her eastern frontier against their exodus from the Czar's dominions.

HER MAJESTY has left for Hyeres.

IT was reported from the Cape that a force of six thousand negroes had threatened to attack Quillimane. To resist the advance, the Portuguese armed the natives there and despatched from Mozambique a gunboat with hundred soldiers. A British warship H. M. S. Albatross has been ordered there for the protection of British subjects.

THE British expedition to Timbo, in Senegambia—the stronghold of the unruly and raiding Chieftain Carimoo—has met with a repulse, Captain Robinson, of the Royal Engineers, being killed, Major Brown severely wounded, and Major Moore, Captain Campbell and twenty of the Police slightly wounded. A fresh attack will be made with the aid of friendly tribes. Such is the report of Sir J. Hay, the British Governor of West Africa.

LORD Salisbury having refused to renew the modus vivendi in the Behring Sea, President Harrison threatens force for protection of the rights of the United States against poachers.

THE Manchester Police Court has committed Sergeant Holden for trial at the sessions, on a charge of selling to the French Government plans of the Malta defences. It was stated at the enquiry by the Magistrate that, through this Sergeant, France was in possession of every detail of the Malta defences.

MR. Hastings, M. P., sentenced to five years' penal servitude for fraud, has been expelled from the House of Commons.

LORD Dufferin has taken charge of the English Embassy in Paris. He was received on the 21st by the French President, when speeches of the most cordial nature were exchanged.

ON the motion of Mr. Thomas Butt, the House of Commons has rejected, by a majority of 112, the Bill, supported by Mr. Chamberlain, for limiting a day's labour in the mines to eight hours.

ON March 22, Mr. Blaud introduced in the American Congress his Silver Bill, for free coinage of the metal. Senators Williams and Harter opposed it, the former proposing a Monetary Conference instead. The debate continued till the 24th, when a motion to shelve the Bill was rejected by the casting vote of the Speaker. The next day, at midnight, after a most disorderly sitting, the House of Representatives adjourned without voting the Bill.

IN Paris, the Police arrested an Anarchist who was seeking service in a nobleman's house. Letters of cypher were found on his person proving his intention to poison the household. They have come upon a large anarchist bomb manufactory.

THE Viceregal Legislative Council held its last sitting of the present Calcutta session yesterday. The Hon'ble Sir Philip Hutchins presented a further report of the Select Committee on the Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the Madras Court of Small Causes. Remarking on the speech of the presenter, the Hon'ble Mr. Chentsal Rao, of Madras, assured the Council that "the Native public, whose requirements the Bill is chiefly calculated to satisfy, will be anxiously looking forward to the early passing of the Bill, and will heartily welcome it as a real boon conferred on them."

The two measures—the Court of Wards' Bill and the Bill for the Regulation of the Bengal Military Police—in charge of the Hon'ble Sir John Ware Edgar, were considered and passed. Both of them received the same day the assent of the Governor-General and are published in to-day's Gazette of India as Acts IV and V of 1892, being respectively, An Act to amend the Bengal Court of Wards Act, 1879, and An Act for the Regulation of the Bengal Military Police.

The Bill to amend the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, was postponed to the next Simla session.

The Hon'ble Dr. Rashbehary Ghose obtained leave and introduced a measure for a simpler and speedier closing of partition proceedings—a Bill to amend the Law relating to Partition. The Statement of Objects and Reasons runs thus :—

"The present statutory law on the subject of partition, apart from various local laws dealing with the partition of land paying revenue to Government, is contained in sections 265 and 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 265 simply enacts that the partition or separation of a revenue-paying estate shall be made only by the Collector, and need not therefore be noticed further, as the present Bill leaves untouched all local laws dealing with the partition of such property. Section 396 lays down the procedure which should be adopted in the partition of lands not paying revenue to Government. That section, however, only authorizes the Court to divide the property, and in some exceptional cases where an equal division is not practicable to award a money compensation for the purpose of equalizing the value of the shares. But as the law now stands the Court must give a share to each of the parties and cannot direct a sale and division of the proceeds in any case whatever. Instances, however, occasionally occur where there are insuperable practical difficulties in the way of making an equal division, and in such cases the Court is either powerless to give effect to its decree, or is driven to all kinds of shifts and expedients in order to do so. Such difficulties are by no means of very rare occurrence, although in many cases where the parties are properly advised they generally agree to some mutual arrangement, and thus relieve the Court from embarrassment.

2. It is proposed in the present Bill to supply this defect in the law by giving the Court, under proper safeguards, a discretionary authority to direct a sale where a partition cannot reasonably be made and a sale would, in the opinion of the Court, be more beneficial for the parties. But, having regard to the strong attachment of the people of this country to their landed possessions, it is proposed to make the consent of parties interested at least to the extent of a moiety in the property a condition precedent to the exercise by the Court of this new power. In order at the same time to prevent any oppressive exercise of this privilege, it is proposed to give such of the shareholders as do not desire a sale the right to buy the others out at a valuation to be determined by the Court. The power, moreover, which it is proposed to give to the Court will be a discretionary one to be exercised on a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. It should be added that, where the Court is obliged to direct a sale, a right of pre-emption is given by the Bill to the parties similar to that conferred on shareholders by section 310 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

3. It is also proposed in the Bill to give the Court the power of compelling a stranger, who has acquired by purchase a share in a family dwelling-house when he seeks for a partition, to sell his share to the members of the family who are the owners of the rest of the house at a valuation to be determined by the Court. This provision is only an extension of the privilege given to such shareholders by section 44, paragraph 2, of the Transfer of Property Act, and is an application of a well known rule which obtains among Muhammadans everywhere and by custom also among Hindus in some parts of the country.

4. The other sections of the Bill only deal with matters of procedure and do not call for any detailed notice."

The Doctor has not moved in the matter too early. He will confer a lasting benefit on his countrymen, if he can pass a law which will save them from the ruin of excessively expensive partition proceedings. It is too late perhaps to stop partition of joint property, but the easiest and simplest means must be found for such division of ancestral property.

LIFE in British Beluchistan, especially in mid winter, is like life on board ship on a long voyage. In that dry barren land, as at sea, people are denied the advantage of that vegetable diet which is so needful for healthy sustenance. The Bombay troops confined there, have been too much restricted to animal food of the kind issued to sailors on board. No wonder, they suffer from the nasty sea disease, scurvy. To prevent this, the General of the Division proposes to issue rations of wholesome food to his men, whether soldiers or camp followers, who now receive money payments for their diet and purchase their own supplies. The subject is before the Government of India. There is on the face of it nothing objectionable in the recommendation of the local military authorities; in fact, it is a matter of course. But, before according their sanction to the proposal, it would be as well to enquire what the men most deeply concerned have to say to it. For anything that we, or even the Government, know to the contrary, the proposed departure may have its peculiar inconveniences to the native troops. Perhaps, it were better to exhaust other means of melioration before introducing a change from pecuniary rations to rations in kind. The first step to take under the circumstances that suggests itself to us, is to appeal to the intelligence of the men. They should be taught the primary laws of health in connection with diet. A simple statement of the physiology of eating and drinking and of the origin of scurvy and its simple cure and a list of wholesome dietary, should be circulated among them in their vernacular. Before ordering the change, Government should make sure of their capacity to make it beneficial. What are they going to do? what food to issue? what are their resources for a constant supply? It is easy to talk of fresh vegetables as a preventive against, as well as cure for, scorbutic complaints, but it is not so easy to supply them to an army in such a country as Beluchistan. Are they going to draw their supplies from the local market, or to bring them up from a distance by rail? Without pretending to special knowledge, these inquiries seem to us on reflection as necessary ones. Perhaps, after all, Government will be driven to recourse to the juice of lemons to preserve the troops from scurvy. If it should come to that, why not at once, without any more ado, teach the men the virtues of this acid and of similar acid fruits and insist upon their consumption of these in proper quantities to guard against the evils of a too exclusively animal diet. If this is done, no change will probably be needed.

THE last subject of the Indian Planters' Gazette Portrait gallery, is Mr. William Jackson, the wellknown patentee of tea machinery. He was born in Aberdeenshire, in Scotland, in Lord Kintore's estate of Kenthall, in 1849. His father held a farm under that nobleman. He however died when Willie Jackson was six years of age. The boy was brought up in the iron-engineering line, being at first introduced to the workshop of George Murray & Co., at Banff, on probation, and afterwards was apprenticed to the wellknown Hall Russell & Co., of Aberdeen. After completing his term with them, he, at the invitation of his elder brother John, who was manager of the Scottish Assam Tea Co., came out to India, for the purpose of doing business in Calcutta. Finding no opening here, he went to Assam to assist his brother in the tea industry. There he brought his engineering knowledge to account, by inventing a machine for rolling the leaf on tables better, with saving of time and labour. This succeeded so well that he took out a patent and reverted to his original profession, confining himself to the improvement and supply of tea machinery—a new thing in engineering. It was, specially at the outset, uphill work. He could not get the iron-founders in Great Britain to make his machines—they were so navel. The conservatism of the British extends even to business in the veriest details. The English and Scotch engineers would not take Mr. Jackson's orders, saying they had never heard of such a thing as tea machinery. With patience and perseverance, however, he overcame indifference, and induced a great firm to undertake his invention. And one piece of good luck led to another. In fine, he succeeded at last. The brothers Jackson gave up service and entered into partnership on their own account to supply tea machinery. They had the finest prospect before them. But now a new difficulty arose. Mr. William Jackson was drawn into the courts to maintain his rights as an inventor against Mr. Kinmond. And the business was wrecked on this long and arduous litigation. The partnership was dissolved. John went to try his fortune in America, and William was driven to begin life anew in India. He again succeeded. The first introducer of machinery in tea manufacture, he went on improving on his methods, until he invented the most useful and economical tea manufacturing machines. His patents are in use not only in Assam among his old friends, but in all the tea districts of India and of Ceylon.

The Planters' Gazette gives a characteristic story of Mr. Jackson's griffinhood. When he first went to Assam, he reached by steam-packet Kookleamook. Thence he had to make his journey by a dug-out canoe. He started after 4 in the afternoon, and was poled for two hours through a shallow lake, till he came to a halt at an extensive mud bank which was much stirred by buffaloes wallowing there.

"Here an elephant was waiting him which was brought alongside the boat and caused to kneel down in the mud for Mr. J. to mount.

On attempting to do this, however, the monster beast trumpeted so loudly, that Mr. Jackson made a bounding leap, and landed himself headlong in the mud and water as far from the beast and boat as he could, out of which mess he was lifted by the coolies and put on the kattie, and in this state reached Mazengah about 10 P.M., little or none the worse of the fright he had got."

We are relieved to hear that Sir Edwin Arnold has recovered his health. *He has left New York for the West and the East—which is only the farthest West—for he intends to come to India. The unenlightened among our countrymen, and these unfortunately include our Pandits and Moulvis, who still stick to the Ptolemaic astronomy and believe that the earth is a flat fixture, may well be invited to reflect on the fact that this British Bard is coming from the West—England—by the West. Sir Edwin is accompanied by several gentlemen as far as California. Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the iron millionaire of Pittsburg, is of the company.

THESE Whitemen are equal to any enterprise—in their own belief at any rate. It is said that Sir Edwin is coming out on an important mission in Asia. This is nothing less than to effect a reconciliation between the different scattered and conflicting forms of Buddhism now current, specially between the Northern and Southern Schools.

EVEN in England at this fag end of the Nineteenth Century, the fear of kidnapping still haunts the popular imagination. Or else, we should not see it so frequently suggested by way of accounting for persons non est. Just now, there is a case in point. The manager of a bank in Somersetshire has disappeared under mysterious circumstances. Mr. Lidderdale—such is his name—had courted a lady and finally agreed to marry her. The union was to be effected at Ilminster and the day too was fixed, when Mr. L. left Somerset with £1,000 in notes in his pocket. It was supposed he had gone to London to make purchases and arrangements for his approaching wedding. At any rate, the lady had no suspicions and she pushed on the arrangements for the marriage. As the appointed day neared and no news of Mr. L. arrived, friends and she, above all, grew anxious. Still she cherished a romantic expectation that, after all, he would keep his word and turn up in due time to make her his own before the altar. Poor lady, she was doomed to disappointment. She felt like "Mariana in the moated grange," and sighed.

She only said, "My life is dreary,

He cometh not," she said ;

She said, "I am weary, weary ;

I would that I were dead !"

As there was no known cause for his suicide, the theory of kidnapping was early started. Latterly, however, appeared a short, too short paragraph announcing the sudden death of Mr. Lidderdale from a yatching accident. No particulars were given, the Police were employed to fill in the outline, and, above all, to verify the news. But the Police failed to trace the person who communicated the news of Mr. Lidderdale's dying on a yatch voyage.

By the latest accounts, Mr. Lidderdale's whereabouts have been discovered by his people. There is now no doubt that his absence is voluntary.

ONE story brings to mind another. The disappearance of the banker of Somerset, Mr. Lidderdale, on the eve of his marriage, reminds "The Chiel" of the Licensed Victuallers' Gazette of the analogous disappearance, many years ago, of the Rev. Benjamin Speke, brother of the famous discoverer of the source of the Nile. He writes :—

"The eccentric clergyman was engaged to be married, but suddenly disappeared in the most mysterious manner. He was last seen in Warwick-street, Pimlico, and somewhere in the neighbourhood his hat was found. As the reverend gentleman had not up to that time shown any remarkable symptoms of eccentricity, and as there was no known cause why he should wish to efface himself from society, his friends rushed to the conclusion that he had met with foul play. The public, too, was of the same opinion, and the most sensational rumours were afloat. Amongst other suggestions I remember was one to the effect that the victim had been decoyed into a butcher's shop, where there was a movable swinging block—a la Sweeney Todd—beneath which ran the main sewer, into which the body of the murdered man could be dropped. It was seriously urged that this was a probable solution of the mystery. As day after day passed without any news of the missing man—although a very large reward was offered for any information as to his fate or his whereabouts—public excitement increased to an extraordinary pitch, and even the most sober-minded people began to think that an atrocious crime had been committed. And what, after all, was the solution of the mystery? Why, the Reverend Mr. Speke was discovered somewhere in Cronwall, if I remember rightly, wandering about disguised as a waggoner. He had gone a little 'off his chump,' it appeared, at the prospect of marriage, and, rather than face his bride at the altar, had bolted, and tried to hide himself. This was, indeed, 'a lame and impotent conclusion' to a sensational romance. There was a clever epigram written at the time on the event, which is worth quoting. It will be remembered that Captain Speke, the explorer, met with a tragic death; he either accidentally or purposely shot himself (it was never I think, quite decided whether or not he committed suicide). The epigram ran thus :—

"The Brothers Speke have made a stir,
And Fate round both has hovered ;
One dies—the great discoverer ;
One lives—the great discovered."

SIR Edward Braddon, the Tasmanian Agent-General, who has been writing up Australia against her detractors, says that when he sat in the Colonial Assembly, the Speaker, Dr. Butler, an old man, used occasionally to fall asleep during debates. One day, when the slumber of the Chair was audible to the whole House, Mr. (now Sir Edward) Braddon arose, and commenced his speech addressing the Chair as "Mr. Sleeper !" The whole House burst out into loud laughter, awaking the old gentleman, who, without inquiry or ado, proceeded with business, as if nothing had occurred.

OUR readers will remember the great eruption of Krakatoa in 1883 which was noticed at the time in Reis and Rayyet. The authentic particulars which have stood the sifting of many and long inquiries, throw into the shade all volcanic eruptions on record from the beginning of the Christian era. The first great event was the famous eruption of Vesuvius, in A. D. 79, so graphically described by the younger Pliny in a letter to Cornelius Tacitus in which the writer's uncle the great Naturalist lost his life, and Herculaneum and Pompeii with several smaller towns on the hill slope were buried under pumice stones and ashes. We leap over seventeen centuries without any cataclysm of similar magnitude and come to 1783, when from Hecla and Skaptar Jokull, contiguous mountains in Iceland, lava streams flowed to the Ocean about 50 miles distant. The third in order was the outburst of Galunggung, in 1822, which devastated a considerable area of land in Java. But none of all these natural events can compare with the disaster of Krakatoa. It happened on August 23, 1883, at about 10 A.M. This little island was situated in the straits of Sunda between Sumatra and Java. There were no premonitions beyond subterranean rumblings, which indeed are common enough in a volcanic region. On a Sunday morning, there suddenly rose an ascending column of dust which spread to a distance of about 80 miles, accompanied with vivid play of lightnings around it. This awful darkness stretched to a circle with a diameter of about 400 miles, while comparative dimness was present to a distance of three times as great. Under the weight of this dust, falling like snow, branches of rees gave way, and even at Batavia, 100 miles apart, it fell to the depth of several inches. The explosions were even heard in India 1,800 miles away. The Barograph recorded a sudden and distinct depression at about that hour, even in Calcutta. The sound was a continuous roaring as of cannons, and finally the whole island was blown to pieces. The sea was in a ferment. Waves over 100 feet high rolled over shores 30 miles apart, sweeping away everything before them, and blocks of stones 50 tons in weight were carried two miles inland. On the Sumatra side, the waves carried a large vessel three miles inward. The waves travelled everywhere, visibly even to the Cape of Good Hope and thence to the Atlantic. The atmospheric waves went on more forcibly, at the rate of 700 miles per hour. The dust was carried fully twenty miles and the finest disturbed the whole body of atmosphere. The beautiful reddish purple at sunrise and sunset remained nearly six months after the eruption. About 35,000 lives vanished within a few hours from the face of the earth.

To the anxiety of friends, the delight of foes, and the amusement of the world at large, the Hindoo Patriot has taken a sudden and right Hanuman—Anglice colossal monkey—jump. The anxiety is for the safety of the neck, if not the life, of the high jumper. But the hardy, not to say foolhardy, tumbler is above all fear—of God or man. So, from Monday, March 21, 1892,—volume XXXIX, number 12—without previous, or proper present, intimation, the Patriot leapt from weekly to daily publication. Not only was there no notice of intention, there is no notice yet of accomplishment. Even in the article "Ourselves" at the beginning of Monday's issue, in which these Patriotic go-heads argue that weekly journalism is now an anachronism, there is no announcement that they had from that day taken to diurnal. There is no formal business notice to the same effect either. The whole thing has all the appearance of a journalistic coup d'état of a Cabal of prentice hands, consisting of an editor, a sub, a couple of devils, and an advertisement touter. Nor is there any visible difference to warn the public of the revolution. There is neither material improvement nor moral. The paper retains its wonted form. The same spirit of ignorance rules the body as hitherto. There is a change in the rate of subscription only—an enhancement equalling the rates of the Indian Mirror. As might be expected under all these circumstances, the daily Patriot commences with a blunder of Patriotic proportions. "Thirty-seven years have passed since the late Babu Harish Chandra Mukharji established the Hindoo Patriot,"—thus opens the new Hindoo Patriot. But HURRI Chunder Mookerjee did not establish the Hindoo Patriot, as everybody knows except the ambitious men who have brought his famous organ down to a daily nuisance.

What the great and lamented Hurris Chunder Mookerjee, during the very Mutinies when every hour was eventful, or during the subsequent Indigo Crisis of which he was the centre, did not dream of,—what Mookerjee the Little still living, with the resources of the late Kali Prasuano Singh at command, would not commit himself to,—what neither Kristodas Pal himself at the height of his journal's success did not dare,—that Sar Sarbanand has done. Truly—to use an expressive Benglicism—truly, is there magic in that bone, unless it is another illustration of the Poet's remark, Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

The Indian Mirror, with more urbanity than candour, greets its new rival with Patriotic good wishes. We, more suburban, not to say rural, can only say in the quaint language of old Bishop Hall,

Forth, ye fine wits, and rush into the presse,
And for the cloyed world your works addresse.

MRS. Van Tassell—the fair aeronaut—is dead. She gave her last performance at Dacca. Rising to a height of 6200 feet, she took to her parachute, and, while yet 30 feet from the ground, got entangled in a tree. Unluckily, it was a tall casuarina rather difficult of either ascent or descent. She could not come down without assistance, while the poor natives attracted to the neighbourhood were not sure that the effort of any one of them to climb up and bring her down safe on his back would be appreciated. So she lay suspended in the air. While in this state, first a knife, then a dao—to cut herself away from her entanglement—and a rope—for her to descend by—were sent up. Poor girl, she was far too exhausted, and perhaps flurried too, to make any use of these. The next device was to hoist up a bamboo by way of an apology for a ladder. It was not, however, strong enough for her weight, and she fell to the ground with her face downwards. She was removed in a state of unconsciousness, and died the next day.

The Bengal Times supplies some interesting particulars of the deceased. What is more satisfactory still, our contemporary is able to give her a good character. Knowing as we do the editor's bias—a thoroughly honourable one—against the whitemen and especially the whitewomen who for money disport themselves as the gaping-stock of the natives of this country, his certificate is peculiarly creditable to the fair recipient. Born at Cincinnati, in Ohio, she was 24 years of age when she died. She was of respectable parentage, her father being an architect by profession, in which capacity he is employed in the Chicago Exhibition. Her mother died long ago. She leaves no family. A gymnast but no acrobat, she, at the age of twenty, took with rare enthusiasm to professional ballooning. Within the four years of her career, she ascended 300 times including 4 parachute descents, in the last of which she received her unlucky quietus. Notwithstanding her calling, she was not a frivolous woman but rather of a grave Presbyterian.

What a destiny was this of this daughter of America, perchance a descendant of one of the Pilgrim Fathers, to mingle her dust with the soil of the City of Jehangir in East Bengal!

We sympathise with the poor husband who must now ply his profession alone, without his fair partner and helpmeet in every sense. Mr. Van Tassell is a famous expert, who has the distinction of having been the instructor of Professor P. S. Baldwin. He has announced his intention of crossing the Indian Continent from Calcutta to Bombay by air.

TODAY the Faculty of Arts of the Calcutta University elected Mr. C. H. Tawney, Baboo Ashutosh Mookerjee, Mr. C. E. Buckland, Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, and Mr. A. M. Bose as their next representatives for the Syndicate, the governing body of the University. Principal Tawney, as he succeeds Sir Alfred Croft in the Directorate of Public Instruction, was also elected to succeed him as President of the Faculty.

THE expiring Calcutta Corporation meet for the last time on Thursday next, to pass the Budget for the next official year. The Chairman has notified the results of the elections. They are the same as announced in the papers on the 16th March. The objections recorded were not pressed as they could not, even if allowed, return any of the defeated candidates. The Government nomination of Commissioners is not yet.

THERE has been as much canvassing for the fifteen Government appointments as for the fifty by election of the general body of rate payers. Yesterday, Mr. Risley called for the papers sent up by the municipal Chairman but his office repeatedly reported their non-receipt. The Bengal Secretary in charge of the municipal department seemed to know better, and was not satisfied with the office denial. We are not aware whether the papers have since been sent up, or have found their way to Mr. Risley.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE DRAFT BENGAL MUNICIPALITIES BILL.

THE time for tinkering at legislation for country town municipalities in Bengal, has once more arrived. The Bengal Municipal Act III (B. C.) of 1884 is about to be amended. A Draft Bill has been prepared and is in circulation for the opinions of officials and of Municipal Commissioners. The Bill is characterised in some quarters as a retrograde measure. We are not sure that it deserves all the hard things which have been said of it. It is, however, a departure from the principles of the existing law. Indeed, the Bill aims at dealing a blow to what is grandiloquently called local self-government. Some of the changes in the direction proposed, notably in regard to the franchise, are loudly called for. We have ourselves been, it is true, considerably disillusioned of the thing. Painful, indeed, are some of the scandals for which the scheme is held responsible, till in Anglo-Indian society it has become a bye-word of reproach. It is nicknamed "lokil sluff." Admitting the failures, we are not sure, however, that the derision is a just one. We hold that the responsibility for the failures has not been fairly distributed. It is not alone the people who are to blame. The democratic legislation in Bengal has its responsibility too.

There was considerable enthusiasm in this Province in giving effect to Lord Ripon's scheme. In fact, the Bengal Council seemed suddenly possessed with a revolutionary zeal to outdo the rest of the country. It seemed to be a race for democracy. The Council was warned not to make the franchise too low. The warnings came from the most intelligent and experienced men. They were treated with contempt, and the franchise was fixed at Rs. 3 in the Act, while the Government, in the exercise of their executive functions, framed Rules under the Act reducing it further to Re. 1-8. This had naturally the effect of swamping the polling stations with the veriest canaille, while people more capable of exercising the privilege kept aloof from the farce. To complete, as it were, the exclusion of more respectable electors, the Rules insisted upon oral voting. The Government have now awakened to the error then committed in regard to the franchise, and another period will probably elapse and another Draft Bill will probably be necessary before other flaws in the Act of 1884 are discovered.

The Government admission that the franchise is too low, must be taken in extenuation of the people's responsibility for actual miscarriages. If you don't give a good tool to work with, you cannot blame the workman as bad. The Re. 1-8 franchise is truly answerable in the main for the ill repute of self-government in Bengal, Behar and Orissa. We will show as we proceed that this was not the only blunder committed in the legislation of 1884. But, so far, it is the only one admitted by Government.

The admission is made in the clearest terms in the Government circular letter of the 17th January last covering and explaining the objects of the Draft Bill. Mr. Secretary Risley writes:—

"In the course of discussions that have taken place as to the best means of improving the drainage and watersupply of Bengal towns, circumstances have come to the Lieutenant-Governor's notice which lead him to think that the present opportunity may properly be taken to restrict the municipal franchise by raising the amount qualifying for a vote in clauses (1) and (2) of section 15 from three rupees to five rupees. The Lieutenant-Governor is informed that many of the most experienced and most sensible Municipal Commissioners, men who take a real interest in the practical working of the law, consider that the franchise in mofussil Municipalities has been fixed too low, and that this, besides deterring respectable men from voting at elections, has caused the votes of those who are in favour of sanitary improvement to be swamped by the votes of a mob who care for nothing but reduction of taxation. It is notorious that in many cases where elections are contested, one or both candidates will go to the poll on a promise to reduce municipal taxation either throughout the town or in the particular ward for which the election has been held. Promises of this sort obviously have the worst effect on municipal administration. They demoralise the voters and reduce the municipal income in an insidious manner which leads to great irregularity of incidence. For, instead of the assessment list being systematically revised, or the rate on the annual value of holdings (section 85) uniformly reduced—both measures which would attract public notice and excite criticism—the assessment on individuals is reduced in an arbitrary manner and according to their importunity, in the wards where incoming Commissioners have promised to procure reductions. Thus the municipal income is unduly reduced; the powers of the Commissioners to carry out necessary improvements are restricted; elections are liable to be decided by the readiness of candidates to accept dishonourable pledges; and municipal taxes come to be unequally assessed in different wards of the same town. In dealing with section 15, the opportunity has been taken to remove a doubt that has arisen whether the term 'rates' includes fees for cleansing latrines levied under part IX, and fees for cart registration under section 143. In the Election Rules 4 and 5 of 30th June 1886, these so called 'fees' are treated as rates, and it seems desirable to clear up any doubt that may exist on the point."

The proposal to raise the franchise is good, but it must be pitched higher still to secure the end in view, if a decidedly better class of men to serve on the municipal Commission were to be had. In the mofussil municipalities, there must be a distinctly higher franchise for candidates for election than that for electors. Government may as well turn their thought towards devising an educational or positional qualification for candidates, to prevent low class people, or those who can by no means be called gentlemen, from aspiring for office. There are other proposals in the Draft Bill which are good and necessary.

The chief complaint against the Draft Bill is in respect of the attempt made therein to replace non-official Chairmen by officials. This, it is contended, is contrary to the entire policy and the repeated professions of Government on the subject. That is of the agitator's staple. On such a subject it has no force. It is easily answered by allegation of necessity. The crises which have occurred, or been threatened, in several corporations, may well be deemed sufficient justification for even this lamentable departure. The Government defend the proposal as follows:—

"The law, as it stands now, empowers the Government to appoint the Chairman of every Municipality mentioned in the second schedule of the Act, and to remove the name of any Municipality from the schedule, but not to add the name of a Municipality to the second schedule. Sir Charles Elliott is of opinion that this anomaly should be removed, and that power should be taken to include a Municipality in that schedule should necessity arise. It is quite conceivable that in some cases, owing to the existence of embittered party-feelings and feuds, serious administrative danger will be incurred if the Government has no voice in the appointment of the Chairmen of many of the large Municipalities not included in schedule II. The power which it is proposed to take would of course only be exercised in cases of real necessity; but Sir Charles Elliott has seen enough of municipal administration in Bengal to be satisfied that such cases may readily arise, and that it is essential that Government should have the legal authority necessary to deal with them in a direct and effective manner."

That is not to be drowned by trumpety meetings and dictated resolutions, passed by packed majorities of schoolboys and unschooled old boys.

Sir Charles Elliott has elsewhere said that it was an oversight that the proposed provision was not incorporated in the Act of 1884. Whether the Government should have the power of including as well as removing a municipality from the Schedule is another question, but it is certain the Schedule was settled after great deliberation, and the power of electing their own Chairmen was conferred upon the unscheduled Municipalities absolutely. The party-feelings and feuds are indeed undeniable, but they may be traced to the franchise. The anomalous position of the Chairman under the law, is also answerable for those results, which may be expected to disappear on a thoughtful amendment of the law.

Sir Charles Elliott has, indeed, fully explained the meaning of the measure in his reply to the address of the Puri municipality. He is unwilling to take the extreme step of superseding a municipality for its lapses. He only takes power to change the head. The Bill raises several questions which cannot be disposed of in a single newspaper article. We will conclude the present one by remarking that the Government is anxious to explain beforehand the amendments thought necessary. But we are not sure that the method adopted is the proper one. Why should not the whole mofussil municipal law be recast, instead of being tinkered as proposed, which, while explaining existing doubts, introduces future difficulties, as such tinkering is sure to do. In truth, the Draft Bill does not disclose that a real attempt has been made to solve the difficulties of self-government in this country. It virtually abandons the problem.

DR. RASHBEHARI GHOSE'S FIRST APPEARANCE IN COUNCIL.

YESTERDAY'S sitting of the Viceroy's Council will be memorable from the unusual, though by no means abnormal, activity of its Additional element. The centre of interest was a single personality. It was not a field-day of debate but a quiet meeting for a monologue. At that meeting, for the first time in a long course of years, a member not belonging to the privileged circle of the Viceroy's ministers moved for leave to introduce a Bill. That outsider was a pure Indian gentleman, a Hindu of Bengal, Baboo Rashbehari Ghose. He was doubly an outsider, being, besides an Additional Member, a new member. He made his début on that occasion. But though in this sense he made his maiden speech yesterday, he was not quite a blushing maiden, unused to the company of legislators. For, he had earned his laurels in the Lower House of Bengal before he was translated to the Upper Chamber of India. His speech was the speech of not only a leading practitioner of law but also a man of some experience in a local legislative council. He spoke, therefore, with the full responsibility of a man of the highest reputation. We are glad to be able to convey to him our assurance of his perfect success. His speech was fully worthy of the most friendly estimate of his powers. It is not often that so good an address is heard even in that select Chamber whose walls have resounded with the eloquence—the wit and wisdom—of a Lytton and a Ripon, a Dufferin and a Lansdowne, a Maine and a Stephen, a Trevelyan and a Strachey, a Mansfield and a Durand, a Hunter and a Hutchins. Regarded as a literary effort, we cannot call to mind any one of the great men who have served with distinction in that Council, and whose names confer lustre on it and on the Government of India, who need have been ashamed to deliver it. A maiden speech is nothing if not rhetorical. It need not be puerile or bombastic, but it is expected to be sufficiently elegant and attractive. But Dr. Ghose was precluded from attempting anything dainty or fine even in the most honourable sense. He was virtually forbidden the graces. The law of Partition scarcely admits of humorous or fervid treatment. No doubt Gilbert A'Becket has written a Comic Blackstone, but a grave senator could no more descend to broad farce than to that rather contemptible species of wit which has been likened by high authority to picking of pockets. An epigram on Civil P. Code seems an absurdity. Besides, such opportunities as his subject offered, Dr. Ghose was not permitted to avail himself of by his practical attitude on it. There is, no doubt, a poetry of Partition, but that is open only to the Opposition, and Dr. Ghose is, for the nonce, a ministerialist—aye, indeed, a minister without a portfolio. The political economy of the Traveller and the Deserted Village is poor to be sure, but they are both fine works of literature, rich in all that constitute poetry. He who Wrote like an angel and talked like poor Poll, has constructed out of the enforced emigration of the poor of his rural Ireland, to earn a living in "fresh woods and pastures new," beyond the Atlantic Ocean, Poems which will live, which wrung the praises of those who despised the poor author, which have delighted generations of men and women, and will continue so to delight mankind to the end of time. The incidents of wholesale evictions, by unrelenting but irresistible landlords, furnished the Bard with pictures of distress which his genius worked up to harrowing interest. The Law of Partition has its dark spot as the Law of Tenancy—the same unhappy effects are common to both—the same disruption of ties and dissolution of households—the same abandonment of the associations which make life worth the living—the same sacrifice of continuity. A speaker against Dr. Ghose's motion might, out of such incidents, have made an appeal of heart-rending pathos. But that was not the Hon'ble mover's cue. He showed that he was quite aware of the sentimental rock ahead, and he noticed it just to steer dexterously clear of it.

In short, for tempting listeners, he had a difficult rôle to fill.

His subject was essentially a dry one—thoroughly matter-of-fact. But superior intellect and cultivation obey no restrictions, and the author of the classical Tagore Lectures on the Law of Mortgage was used to making the repulsive welcome. Accordingly, his address surprised those who had not known his literary antecedents. He spoke with uncommon liveliness on the unpromising topic which he brought to the notice of his colleagues yesterday. The case for his Bill is given in brief in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, which we reproduce in another column. This argument Dr. Ghose expanded and illustrated with rare brilliance and learned wit, not only giving a lucid exposition of the present law and its difficulties and evils, but replying by anticipation to objections with admirable force and effect.

Altogether, it was a very able and, indeed, striking speech. We are really proud of our member. The country may well be proud of him. The speech has been rather marred in the report, and we therefore do not quote from it, pending the publication of the official minutes. Still, there is enough in the Englishman's version to justify our appreciation.

A MAHOMEDAN BOARDING HOUSE AT ALLAHABAD.

On Friday morning (March 11) His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor arrived at Allahabad, and at halfpast-eight drove from his railway carriage at the Station to the grounds of the Muir College. Here there was a large gathering of both European and Native gentlemen, who had taken their places beneath a spacious shamiana. The object of the assembly was to witness the laying, by Sir Auckland Colvin, of the foundation-stone of a boarding house for Mahomedan students. The necessity for such a building was fully set forth in the address which was presented to His Honour. "We take it," said the committee, "that a complete education can only be secured by the close and intimate union of religious with secular education, and it is also important that physical development should not be neglected. At Allahabad, however, we found a large number of young Mussulman students who were attending lectures in the Muir Central College, but whose life outside the lecture-rooms was anything but satisfactory. They lived anywhere and anyhow, without check or hindrance, and without any fear of being rebuked for misbehaviour not uncommon to young men. We found them receiving no religious education, and profiting by no organised system of physical training." For these and other reasons the establishment of such a building as has now been commenced, was felt to be a crying necessity. A plot of land within the College compound was granted, and plans for a suitable building were drawn up. Mr. Chapman, the District Engineer, prepared a scheme which will at first provide accommodation for twenty boarders in a building which, architecturally, is almost a replica of the west portion of the College. In view of the probable growth of the institution, the plans at present approved permit of the ultimate extension of the building so as to contain sixty students' rooms.

When His Honour arrived at the grounds he was received by Sir John Edge, Kt., Prince Shahdeo Singh, Professor A. E. Gough, M. A., Raja Sukhmangal Singh, M. Samee-ullah

Khan, C. M. G., Haji Ahmad Said Khan, M. Habibur Rahman Khan, M. Abdul Jalil Khan, Mr. Abdul Majid, Mr. Abdul Jalil, Raja Syad Ali Khan, C. I. E., Koer M. Lutf Ali Khan, Koer Abdul Ghaffoor Khan, Khawjeh Mahomed Yousuf, and Khan Bahadur Mahomed Ali Khan. Being conducted to a dais His Honour took his seat under a reach cloth of gold canopy. Moulvi Samee-ullah Khan, who is one of the principal supporters of the movement, then requested Sir Auckland Colvin to accord Mr. M. A. H. Hydari permission to read an address.

The address, which was of great length, was then read. It referred to the success of the Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh as the best example of what combined effort and honesty of purpose could achieve. Alluding to the movement now inaugurated, the address remarked :—

"We regret to learn that some of the existing national institutions in India are opposed to our view, but we are convinced that it is only the abuse of time and opportunities in England which should be checked, and not education there under proper supervision. We propose with the grace of God to put fresh life in the movement, and our Committee will act as an advising body with which parents may consult, and from which students may take help before proceeding to England. We will not rest contented with only looking after and advising young men while in India, but intend to safeguard their interests in England by placing them under proper guardianship there."

The address, which was printed on white satin, was presented to the Lieutenant-Governor on a salver, and the foundation-stone was then laid. In a cavity of the stone was enclosed a bottle, containing a copy of the address, and newspapers and coins of the realm. The stone having been declared well and truly laid, His Honour replied to the address. He said :—

I have been asked to lay the foundation-stone of your Boarding House and am glad to do so, because the enterprise on which you are engaged is, you say, an example of a revival of the energy and initiative amongst the Mahomedan community in this Province, of which, as you state, the first illustration is to be found at Aligarh; but of which I trust the last will not be traced to Allahabad. I have been especially aware for some time that inconvenience was felt in finding suitable quarters for Mahomedan students at this place; and now that so many Mahomedans are by degrees joining the local Bar and making their influence felt in local society, it is the more desirable that members of their faith who are at the College should be properly cared for, and should feel that they have a collective existence and a collective reputation to maintain. Brought together under one roof, this will be easier probably for them than if they were scattered amongst bungalows here and there in the station. Discipline, moreover, and other influences over young men of their age can be better maintained if all the students are collected in one boarding house than living here and there in Allahabad.

The conditions under which land has been given to build upon in the college compound, have been intimated to you and received your assent. I look to those who are responsible for the undertaking to see that those conditions are faithfully observed. Before you begin the building your plans and estimates will have passed the criticism of the Public Works Department, and so much of the money necessary for the completion of the building should have been actually collected as will ensure its completion within a reasonable time.

No one watches with greater interest than I do the growth of the Mahomedan community in this province. I have served myself under a Mahomedan Government, and I trust I left behind me friends in the country to which I refer. Towards no one, whatever his race or religion, did I entertain warmer feelings of regard than towards that most staunch, but most tolerant Mussulman, the late Khedive of Egypt. I saw him in times of extraordinary difficulty, when his throne and his life seemed to hang daily in the balance. I was in close contact with him at one moment of supreme danger, when I had to communicate to him that the fortifications of Alexandria were about to be bombarded; and when he refused, for reasons which must in the opinion of all men have done him the highest honour, to leave his countrymen, although in revolt against his authority. He was aware at that moment that he must throw himself into their hands—the hands into which he threw himself were those of a rebel army—and take his chance of their good conduct. Perhaps, now that he is gone, I, who saw so much of him and had so deep a regard for him, may be allowed, without unseemliness, to say that neither at that time, when I am sure we both felt he was little likely to be allowed to live over the ensuing two days, nor at any other time during the anxious months that preceded the crisis I refer to, did I ever find the Khedive otherwise than in perfect calm and self-possession; nor did I receive from him any but the most considerate treatment and the kindest possible welcome. The recollection of the late Khedive and my treatment at his hands is a strong tie which has bound me to his co-religionists; the more so that not he only but many of the Mussulman high officials about him extended to me the same courtesy, the same kindness, and, as I hope, the same confidence.

In speaking recently at Aligarh Mr. Straight enjoined on one and all his Mahomedan friends to let no personal differences, no matter what their nature might be, impede or obstruct the carrying on of the great and able work the Aligarh College had already done. Applying his words to a larger area, I would say, let no personal differences, no matter what their nature may be, impede or obstruct the carrying on of the great and able work of Mahomedan advancement and progress in Upper India. A Mahomedan, like every other man, as you say in your address, must suit himself to the times in which he lives; and must so adapt himself in all aspects of his life to the time as to be able to hold his own in it. Your address shows that you are as much alive to this as I or any one else. As centuries pass on, conditions change and the equipment of the former great men of Islam is no longer one which would carry them through all opposition to-day, because the form and spirit of opposition has changed, and therefore the weapons with which it must be encountered. "Other men, other manners," and if the sword of the house of Timur must be laid aside, there can be retained the energy, the perseverance, the courage and the endurance which gave to that sword its keen edge. What the Mahomedan of the present day has to retain is not the fierce and fanatical spirit of his predecessor; but the great qualities which enabled that fierce and fanatical spirit to dominate the men of its time. Those qualities to achieve success must now be turned to other ends. So long as the British Government in India endures fanaticism can be allowed no license; but peace, as our own stern poet says, hath her victories no less renowned than war. For the sharp sword of a former time there must now be substituted the keen edge of intellectual and industrial supremacy. The battle-fields of life are now in India those of civil and social reform; and the enemy now-a-days is the man who clings with a desperate obstinacy to the philosophies and the formulae of a past age; and who hopes, with the weapons forged in that age, however blunted they may be by laspe of time and circumstance, to grope his way through the vigorous hosts which he meets in his modern progress. No one knows better than yourselves that the obstacle opposed to the reformer is still, whatever form it may take, or whatever specious guise it may assume, still the same obstacle of idolatry. There are as many images to-day in the world as were to be found in our seventh century in Arabia. There is the idol of a stupid adherence to past modes of education, reasoning and discussion; there is the idol of a bigoted hatred of all that is foreign to the creed or the country of the worshipper; there is the idol of fatuous pride of race, and there is the monster idol of all, the idol of apathy, of supine indifference and fatalistic submission to what is accepted as the "Will of God"; because man prostrate in so-called devotion refuses to exert any will of his own. Dumb, black images, all of them, hideous in their form, preposterous in their pretensions, despicable in their impotence. You, and others like you in other parts of the province, represent the true Mahomedan iconoclasts of to-day; and your task, as you and I are well aware, is no easy one. For you have to deal with thousands bristling with prejudice and ignorance; many of whom are only too eager (having regarded you hitherto as brothers) to turn upon you in your new character of reformers, as traitors and reprobates. To succeed, you must, as Mr. Straight said, agree to subdue all minor difficulties and exclude all jealousies or other unworthy motives. You must work to a common end although you may differ in some respect with regard to the methods you employ. All minor differences should be sunk in the presence of the common object. You have with you the sympathies of every Englishman in the country, and every civilised man throughout the world; and you know that you have the sympathies and the active support of the Government. But do not hide from yourselves the fact that there lies before you an anxious task, and unless you are animated by sincerity and sustained by conviction, you will fail abominably. The bringing together of Mahomedan students in a boarding house of this kind, careful of their own tradition while receiving a Western education, is a step taken in the right direction; and will, I hope, be the formation of a centre from which will radiate tolerance, reasonableness and enlightenment. The more centres of this kind multiply, the greater should be the number of points from which light will emanate into the obscurity which surrounds you. Therefore, from the day you first addressed yourselves to me, I have given you all the assistance in my power to smooth the difficulties in your way and furnish you facilities for erecting this building. Make it, I pray you, an advanced post of reason and tolerance, and not a stronghold of reactionary conservatism, or of mere blind, tenacious holding to a position no longer tenable because turned by the hand of time. If it should ever become that, it would be far better, you will agree with me, that its foundation-stone had never been laid.

THE MALABAR MARRIAGE COMMISSION.

The labours of the Malabar Marriage Commission have come to a close with the submission of its Report to the Madras Government. The two most important questions to which the attention of the Commission was drawn by the Government of India were (1) whether the marriage customs in Malabar are connected with the religious observances of those who are subject to the Marumakkatayam law, and (2) whether a majority of Marumakkatayam Hindus desire legislation to regulate their social marriage; and if only a minority desire it, whether legislation is necessary for their protection and whether it is expedient. The Report of the Commission deals with these questions fully, and all the members are agreed that the marriage customs obtaining in Malabar have no connection whatever with religious observances. The law of inheritance observed by the Malayalis is quite independent of marriage, and the forms of marriage are not regarded as constituting a religious ceremony, i. e., a Samaskaram, or sacrament in the Hindu or European sense of the word. With regard to the second question, whether there is a majority of people desiring legislation or only a minority, all the members of the Commission, including the President, except one, are unanimous in thinking that it is highly desirable in aid of progress and good morals that legislation should be resorted to, as it will on the one hand elevate and ennoble the precarious social marriage into a legal institution, whilst the strong arm of public law will, on the other, protect the domestic circle against the incursions of irregular passions, and thereby remove one cause of acute suffering and one strong temptation to the commission of crime. The dissenting member holds that the social marriage now prevalent in Malabar ought simply to be recognised by law, and that he would court legislation only in the absence of such legal recognition.

The other questions which the Commission has considered in the course of its Report are (1) what is the form which legislation, if any, ought to take, and (2) what effects the legalisation of Malabar marriages would have on the Native States of Travancore and Cochin and on those who follow the Aliya Santava law in South Canara. With regard to the form which legislation ought to take, there is considerable difference of opinion between the members of the Commission, who advocate legislation, and the President. The former strongly recommend the adoption of the Bill introduced into the Madras Legislative Council by the Hon'ble Mr. C. Sankaran Nair, with a few alterations. But the President is of opinion that the new Act should purport to legalise the existing forms of social marriage and not to provide a new form of civil marriage; that marriage to be legalised must be between persons who are permitted to cohabit with each other by custom obtaining in the caste to which they belong; that the form in which marriages may be contracted ought to be described as the one customary in the caste or class to which the woman belongs; that the marriageable age up to which the consent of Karnavans is necessary ought to be twenty-one and not eighteen; and that a declaration of marriage should be signed by both the parties and their legal guardians, and attested by witnesses. As regards the question of divorce, the President is of opinion that it must be of such a nature as to suit the conjugal relations in Malabar and to adequately ensure the stability of the matrimonial union. What, according to him, is adapted to the present condition of Marumakkatayam Hindus is a system of free divorce by judicial process as contradistinguished from an elaborate system of judicial divorce. The Munsiff's Courts are therefore indicated as the best machinery for trying cases of divorce, facts which require local investigation being left to pambayats at the discretion of the Munsiffs. To avoid the abuse of the liberty of divorce, two restrictions are proposed, namely, that the application by any person to the Court for the issue of a notice to the other party should be made only with the consent of the Karnavan of the Tarwad, and that an interval of a year, or two, from the date of the annulment of the marriage should elapse before the marriage is dissolved. The civil rights of such a marriage are that the husband could dispose of his property by will; that the wife must of right be maintained by her husband; that the husband could compel his wife to live with him when he has self-acquired property, and that the wife could compel her husband to receive her into his Tarwad. The President is also opposed to the right of the father to be the legal guardian of his children and the right of the wife to succeed in cases of intestacy. The members of the Commission, who disagree with the President with regard to the form that legislation ought to take, view his scheme to be impracticable as there are numerous forms of social marriage prevalent in Malabar and to legalise all of them, instead of one particular form, would lead to unnecessary litigation and complicated difficulties which it is highly necessary to avoid. With regard to the effects of the legalisation of Malabar marriages on Travancore and Cochin, the Commission is not in a position to pronounce any opinion, as the only witnesses examined in connection therewith were the Dewans of the two States, who have expressed only their own individual opinions on the subject. But with regard to the followers of the Aliya Santava law, the Commission recommends that they be allowed the same privileges as those who follow the Marumakkatayam law. The Report of the Commission is now under consideration by the local Government, which will forward it shortly to the Government of India with its own observations.---

ALIENABILITY OF ZEMINDARIES.

The following is the letter addressed to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras by the President (the Raja of Venkatagiri) of the Madras Landholders' Association:---

Sir,--I beg to point out an error in para. 8 of the Memorial of the Madras Landholders' Association, dated 5th December, 1890, presented to the Madras Government, praying for legislative enactment for regulating the succession of Zemindaries similar to the Oude Taluqdars' Act I of 1869, as contemplated by several previous Governors of this Presidency from Sir T. Munro downwards from political and other considerations, and as suggested by the Famine Commission which strongly urged against partition of Zemindaries as an "administrative," "social," "agricultural," and "economic" necessity. (Famine Commission Report, Vol. III. Condition of the country and the people of India, page 330.)

Para. 8 of the Memorial, to be corrected runs thus:--

"Although the rule of primogeniture, wherever it obtains, and in whatever case its applicability is recognized, necessarily implies that the inherent quality of inalienability also attaches thereto---the object being to preserve intact ancestral estates for all ages to come, and to safeguard the possession of such estates strictly in the families of the old nobility, with all their traditional attributes of prestige, rank, power and place---it causes your Excellency's Memorialists deep pain and regret to mention that, by a recent decision, the Madras High Court have ruled that even an impartible Zemindari may also be alienated, although they have mitigated the evil of this decision, in some degree, by declaring that such alienation shall not extend beyond the life of the alienor. Even this partial dispossession, for the time being, must have the effect of lowering the status of the property, the dignity of the Lord, and his power for doing good."

In the Kangundi alienation case alluded to in the above paragraph (page 197, Indian Law Reports, Vol. XIII of 1889) where the Madras High Court followed the decision of the Privy Council in Sartaj Kuari versus Deoraj Kuari, (page 272 Vol. X, Indian Law Reports, 1888, Allahabad) it was the District Court that declared that such alienation shall not extend beyond the life of the alienor. But the Madras High Court on appeal removed even the partial mitigation of the evil and upheld the alienability of Zemindaries absolutely, and has laid down the dictum that Zemindaries, however ancient or old, are alienable till the custom of inalienability (a negative state of thing) is proved. This unfortunate decision is destructive to the existence and prestige of the landed aristocracy. Though the Memorialists do not deny cases of alienation by Zemindars, yet they affirm that, considering the proportionate extent of alienated property and the frequency of alienation, alienation was only an exception and not the rule. There are no facts to warrant the assumption that alienation was the rule. It is wrong to take service inams granted for services rendered, secular or religious, and lands granted for maintenance to those entitled to it to be alienation; these being held under peculiar tenure restricting the grant. In the whole past history of all Zemindaries, there has never been a single instance of a Zemindari being alienated in toto from lawful heirs even as a solitary exception. Otherwise, the Zemindaries could not have possibly descended almost in their entirety in the families of the proprietors except those sold partly or wholly for debts. Yet unrestricted wholesale alienation of Zemindaries are quite legalised by such arbitrary court decisions protested against. The Law Courts have taken the rare and insignificant exception to be the rule and the rule to be the exception. With unaccountable inconsistency they have declared that partible Zemindaries are inalienable according to the Mitahara law to the prejudice of the successors and heirs of the alienor who are co-sharers, and who are entitled to maintenance, while the heirs and successors of the proprietors of impartible Zemindaries are made to suffer by any arbitrary alienation disinheriting the lawful heir and claimant and depriving those entitled to maintenance of their rights.

Even when the Zemindars succeed in getting their succession question settled by legislation, unless their estates are protected from the newly announced court-made law of inalienability, the Zemindars are sure to go to ruin and extinction. The evil is beginning to be felt seriously already as these erroneous decisions are possessed with all legislative force. It is the humble prayer of the Association, therefore, that the Government will be generously pleased to see that the legislation prayed for by the Association makes due provision against arbitrary alienation of Zemindari estates by their proprietors. In pointing out the error in the last Memorial, the Association begs to show the Government how grave and serious is the position of Zemindaries in the face of Court decisions quoted above unless remedied by early legislative enactments.

In conclusion, I beg to remind the Government of the Memorial, dated 5th December, 1890, and of the prayers contained therein, with the corrections above pointed out, fully hoping that they would have an early redress for their growing and increasing grievances and difficulties.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LIFE EVANGELS.

SILENT upon the threshold of life's portal
Sits the veiled Isis of the Future—all
That time has yet of bitterness and sorrow
Lies hid beneath that dark, unlifted pall.

Behind us sadly stands a mournful maiden,
With an enchanted mirror in her hand ;
Cypress and violets on her brow are blended,
With daisies ever fresh from childhood's land.

The shadowy Past glides o'er the changeful mirror,
Like sunny tears and clouds o'er April skies,
Or lit by avenging lightnings that have smitten
The heart with agony that never dies !

Thus the accusing and the unknown haunt us—
The hidden woe and the remembered pain ;
But Faith and Duty in the orb'd Present
With angel pinions hide the phantoms twain.

RESIGNING.

"Poor heart ! what bitter words we speak
When God speaks of resigning."

CHILDREN, that lay their pretty garlands by Most lingeringly, yet with a patient will :
Sailors, that, when the o'erladen ship lies still,
Cast out her precious freight with veiled eye,
Riches for life exchanging solemnly,
Lest they should never reach the wished-for shore ;
Thus we, oh Infinite ! stand thee before,
And lay down at thy feet, without one sigh,
Each after each, our lovely things and rare—
Our close heart-jewels and our garlands fair.
Perhaps thou knewest that the flowers would die,
And the long-voyaged hoards be found all dust ;
So take them, while unchanged. To thee we trust
For incorruptible treasure ;—thou art just.

FRAGMENT.

SAY on, that I'm over romantic,
In loving the wild and the free ;—
But the waves of the dashing Atlantic,
The Alps, and the eagle, for me !

The billows, so madly uprearing
Their heads on the blast-ridden main,
Mock the hurricane, dauntless, unfearing,
And roar back the thunder again.

The mountain, right heavenward bearing,
Half lost in the sun and the snow,
Can only be trod by the daring ;
The fearful may tremble below.

The eagle is high in its dwelling,
Forever the tameless, the proud ;
It heeds not the storm-spirits' yelling,
It swoops through the lightning-fraught cloud.

Tell me not of a soft-sighing lover ;
Such things may be had by the score ;
I'd rather be bride to a rover,
And polish the rifle he bore.

The storm with its thunder affrighting ;
The torrent and avalanche high ;
These, these, would my spirit delight in ;
'Mid these would I wander and die !

Say on, that I'm over romantic,
In loving the wild and the free ;
But the waves of the dashing Atlantic,
The Alps, and the eagle, for me !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

BOTH the Viceroy and the Lieutenant-Governor left Calcutta on Monday. Sir Charles Elliott will return on the 9th.

THE Hurdwar Fair had to be broken up early on account of cholera. Pilgrims were stopped on the way and those already arrived were sent back. To effect the last measure, the bunniah's shops were closed.

ON the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway, they have successfully tried the experiment of lighting the trains with gas.

IT is expected that the railway line from Joppa, a seaport town on the Red Sea, to Jerusalem will be opened in the next spring. When will there be a railway from Jedda to Mecca ? The pilgrim traffic is far more heavy at Mecca than at Jerusalem.

SIR Charles Paul having gone on leave, Mr. J. T. Woodroffe succeeds him both as Advocate-General and member of the local Legislative Council. The barrister goes with his solicitor. Baboo Gonesh Chunder Chunder's appointment as an honorable Councillor of the same Chamber is simultaneously Gazetted.

MR. Mahadev Govind Ranade and Mr. Javerilal Y. Umiashunker having completed their terms in the Bombay Legislative Council, Mr. Nulkar of Poona and Mr. Chotilal of Ahmedabad have been appointed in their places. Unexceptional selections.

Equally good is the appointment of the Maharaja of Vizianagram to the Madras Council.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

DEATH has of late been busy among the British plutocracy, unless plutocrats are multiplying at an abnormal rate. Already, in the quarter, we find that four estates each exceeding a quarter of a million had been proved prior to Mr. Leyland's: those of Mr. Barclay, of Gurney's Band; Mr. Hampson Jones; Mr. S. J. Brown, of Brown Janson and Co.; and Canon Bridges, of Winchester, who enjoyed the reputation of being the wealthiest clergyman in the English Church. The personality only of Mr. W. H. Smith comes up to some 2 crores (£1,764,000) and the wealth of the Duke of Devonshire must be larger still. The other great fortunes are those of Mr. Cox and Mr. Gilroy, the two greatest Dundee jute manufacturers; Sir James Spaight, the rich man of Limerick; Mr. Punchard, the greatest of foreign contractors; the Maichioness of Westminster; Mr. Whiteley, Sir Gilbert Greenall's partner in beer and the Bible; Mr. Ralph Brocklebank, a Liverpool shipowner; Mr. Hugh Rose, the Scotch drysalter; Sir J. P. Corry, the Belfast shipowner; Mr. Magniac, of Jardine, Mathieson, and Co., who died intestate; Mr. Tarn, of the well-known Newington establishment; Mr. Wertheimer, of Bond-street. Not a bad prospect for the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

A GOOD anecdote of the grandfather of the present Czar is told in a European magazine. The Emperor Nicholas, one day riding through a village near Moscow, accidentally dropped his whip, and beckoned to a peasant lad to pick it up for him. Undismayed by the grand cavalcade, the boy came up to him, and delivered the whip with the question "Who are you?" Struck by the youth's boldness, the Czar said, "I am the Emperor." What was His Majesty's amazement when, "Well," retorted the boy, "if you cannot take care of your whip, how can you take care of your subjects?" The great and good Nicholas ordered the lad to be brought up at his expense to any profession he might choose, and to-day Ivasovsky is a distinguished painter. The son of Armenian peasants, he is probably the greatest artist of his race.

THE Commissioner of Police has notified that between the business hours, from 9 A.M. to 6 A.M., on all days, except Sundays and general holidays, no vehicle shall be allowed to stand in certain thoroughfares in the town except in the manner specified. The notification concludes with a warning that every person disobeying the order is liable to a fine not exceeding Rs. 100. The order, penal as it is, ought to be made more generally known than by mere publication in the Gazette.

THE Government of India have ruled that, under the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, 1889, shawls need not be stamped on them their length, inasmuch as they are not piece-goods and the phrase "woollen goods" under the classes of goods included in the expression "piece-goods," includes none but "woollen piece-goods."

MR. Justice Parker, of Madras, has held that a minor Zemindar could not recover moneys due to his estate without first obtaining a succession certificate.

AT the instance of the Court of Wards, on behalf of Goungur, a Zemindar, in execution of a decree for Rs. 3,000, the District Court of North Arcot had committed one Pachamiah to civil jail at Vellore for six months. Two months before the expiration of the period, and while the debt remained unsatisfied and there was no failure to pay in the subsistence allowance, Pachamiah was released. The Zemindar has now sued the Jail Superintendent, Mr. Cavendish, for the decretal amount. The defendant denies negligence, the release having been made under a bona fide mistake.

A NUMBER of persons is again on trial at Rampur for the murder of General Azimuddin. Two of them, Ghazzan and Bhonda by name, have, on offer of pardon, turned Queen's evidence. The former, originally a resident of the Peshawar district, deposed that he was twice tempted with money—first by Abdulla Khan and then by Mustafa Khan—to murder the General. He was one of those who had fired upon him. He was under arrest since the day after the murder and had tired of his life in custody. He was corroborated by Bhonda who too formed one of the firing party.

Abdulla had early been suspected as the instigator of the murder.

Nawab Hyder Ali Khan, brother of the late Chief Kulb Ali Khan, on being examined, said:—

"Abdulla Khan was at one time Settlement Officer and Magistrate in Rampur, and was related to many families of position. Witness now lived at Bilsee. He knew Azimuddin, whose first appointment was to look after State visitors for which he received Rs. 100 per month. After Kulb Ali's death Azimuddin was the chief power in Rampur. The Nawab was not capable of ruling, and Azimuddin received Rs. 2,000 per month and Rs. 500 as his daughters' allowance. In 1889 witness's disagreement with the State was settled through Azimuddin, and his claims were paid. At the end of February 1891, Abdulla Khan came to see witness at Bilsee, and in conversation said that his son Saidulla had lost his appointment through Azimuddin, and he himself had had to leave Rampur, though still he was being persecuted. He added: 'We are Pathans, and if this continues I will surely kill him, even if it costs my life.' Witness replied that this was a very improper thing for an old man to say. Witness that night mentioned the conversation to his Agent, Mr. Hamilton. Next morning Abdulla said that he had spoken in anger, but would not do such a thing."

It appears from the evidence of Mustafa Ahmed that

"In 1887, Abdulla owed the State Rs. 16,000 as revenue. It was proposed by the Council to forego the claim, but this was not agreed to. Subsequently, when called upon to pay, Abdulla replied that he owed nothing. If the State and General Azimuddin chose to do so, they might sell his property and life, but he would pay nothing himself. Abdulla's houses were then sold, but subsequently the sale was cancelled, and the property restored. Saidulla was dismissed from the service by Azimuddin, and Abdulla was dismissed from the Council. Abdulla and Hyder Ali Khan intrigued against Azimuddin, who found it out, and stopped their plans."

OF the charges now being enquired into against Mr. P. Ram Chandra Rao, acting Sub-Collector, Madura, a graduate of the Madras University and a Statutory Civilian, the principal are that he received from a Zemindar a large silk umbrella for presentation to a temple, and Rs. 1,500. Another charge has been abandoned, that namely, of having received gifts of food when in camp.

SHAIK HUSSAIN, a butler in the service of Executive Engineer Le Quesne, Nira Canal, ran amok on the 12th March, at a village in the Hindapur taluq, Poona district. The butler had fallen out with a brother servant—a Goanese cook—and, in the heat of the moment, suddenly seized a rifle from his master's kit he was carrying and shot him dead. He then ran off, taking with him two of his master's sporting rifles and some ammunition. He was followed by several villagers. Finding escape impossible, Hussain took his stand on the side of a public road and fired on his pursuers, wounding two of them. He was ultimately seized and secured. The Sessions Court of Poona on the 28th found him guilty of murder and passed the sentence of death. The defence taken was drunkenness.

THAT precious planter Nickels, of Jubbulpore, having been once spotted by the Police or the District authorities, had better not be in a hurry to esteem himself safe. At any rate, before he has had time to breathe freely after his escape from the N.W. P. High Court on the charge of destroying a rival factory, he has received a summons from the Magistrate of Jaunpore to answer to an accusation of abetting an offence under section 211 of the Penal Code. He is charged with having, last year, bribed the brother of a man bitten to death by a cobra to break a couple of the ribs of the corpse, and to report at the police station that the man had died from the effects of a severe beating that he had received at the hands of the tehsildar. On enquiry, the report made against the tehsildar was found to be without foundation, and the lying brother was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. And now the alleged instigator of the calumny against a public servant has been called upon to clear himself.

INDIAN litigation has taken a new departure in the Panjab. An unprecedented scene lately occurred at the District Court of Rawalpindi. On the court's decision being made known, the winning party expressed his elation by a taunt at the loser which so exasperated him that he did not scruple to commit a serious contempt of court. He retaliated with blows, which the victorious suitor was not slow to return. In short, there was a general scuffle between the plaintiff and the defendant and their respective friends and adherents. Luckily, there has not been loss of life, still men on both sides have been severely hurt, of whom two have been taken to hospital.

THE Advocate of India writes:—

"An English correspondent of the Madras Mail is at great pains to prove that Warren Hastings was not the son of fifteen year old father. His pen and research, we think, would be better employed in disproving, if that be possible, the accusations which Burke and Macaulay have brought against the man who caused Nnmcomar to be hanged, and did several other things worthy to be recorded of a Roman Proconsul."

In the Fort St. George Gazette of the 22nd instant, appears a notification authorizing the affiliation to the Madras University of the Law College, Madras, up to the Bachelor of Laws standard, with effect from May 1891.

"THE Foresters: Robin Hood and Maid Marian," Lord Tennyson's new drama, was to be published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co., on March 27.

"ELECTROCUTION" or execution by electricity being discredited in New York, as brutal, hanging by machinery, the invention of a Colorado man, has come to the fore.

"The instrument is the only one in the world, and is in a stone building a short distance back of the cell rooms within the penitentiary walls at Canon City, Colorado. Entering the front room you notice a noose hanging from the tenfoot ceiling. The rope runs to a rear-room over a set of pulleys, and is fastened to a pig of iron weighing 500 pounds. The pig rests on a collapsing shelf, which is kept in place by a trip lever, on which hangs a receptacle holding fifty-six pounds of water. In the bottom of the vessel is a plug, which is attached to a chain. The chain passes down through the floor, around a pulley, and is hooked on to a rod which stands upright under a raised portion of the floor of the execution room. This surface is kept from touching the rod by means of four spiral springs. On the wall of the room is a white disc, on which is a red mark, and a black hand points downward. When the man condemned to die steps under the noose his weight forces the raised floor surface down the rod, which gives the chain a pull, and plug drops out of the water receptacle. This starts the flow of water, and at the same instant the black hand on the disc on the wall travels upwards. When it reaches the red mark the witnesses know that the water vessel is empty, and the trip lever, fifty-six pounds lighter, is forced upwards by a spring, the heavy weight drops, and the murderer hangs in the air. All this is done silently; not a creak or a snap is heard. This machine has never yet failed to break a man's neck."

MANDALAY has escaped being burnt down. There was a fire on Wednesday, the particulars of which are thus given in the Englishman:—

"The fire originated in a dwelling house in 27th Street, near China Street. The exceptionally high wind soon carried the flames in a northerly direction. The fire engines were quickly on the spot, but they were unable to cope with the fire, which extended with amazing rapidity across B. Road. All wooden and mat buildings were consumed, also several brick and pukka buildings, including the Telegraph Office. The fire then spread to E. Road, but the hotels and the National Bank in that road escaped, though the flames were borne against the doors and windows by the wind. The fire then ran along West Moat Road as far as Dyer's Brewery at Obo, a distance of at least two miles. Luckily the wind was not blowing in the direction of the town, or Mandalay would be now a thing of the past. The fire is still (Friday morning) burning, but so long as the wind continues with its present moderate force there is no fear of further disaster. The loss of property is immense, and it is feared that many lives have been lost. Large crowds of people are now collected besides the moat with their goods and chattels without any shelter. There are conflicting reports regarding the origin of fire.

"Telegrams of this morning (April 1) state that two new fires of a serious nature broke out on Thursday afternoon at the south end of the South Moat Road in Mandalay, spreading with alarming rapidity to the villages behind the Fort wall, burning hundreds of Burmese houses, and ran for about two miles past the incomparable Pagoda, burning monasteries between the north end of the city and the Mandalay hill, and making hundreds of families homeless. The transport lines at one time were in serious danger, but were saved by General Gossett and Staff, and a large force of the military there. Captain Alban with his Military Police has worked day and night on Wednesday and Thursday saving property from the looters. The fire is still burning. The second fire originated in the Burmese houses, south of the Race Course, and demolished blocks of houses. This fire, though at first incendiarism was suspected, is now clearly shown to be due to sparks of a cheroot igniting some Indian corn. The Burmese are reported to be taking the whole matter quite philosophically, though thousands and thousands are homeless."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE General Elections in England may come on in June or July next.

THE House of Commons is still aristocratic and vain enough to submit to the honesty of receiving regular payment for its services, instead of individually relying on pickings and indirect gains of sorts. But the old arrogance is decidedly on the wane. On the night of the 26th March, it rejected by a majority of sixty-five votes a resolution for paying the Members, moved by Mr. Fenwick, Member for Wansbeck.

MANY expelled Russian Jews have found their way into England, and more are expected. This has caused alarm. Surely, there is no room for a fugitive race in that small country, and warning has been given to that effect in Russia.

IN the House of Commons, on March 28, Mr. Curzon moved the second reading of the Indian Councils Bills. Mr. Schwann moved an amendment demanding the elective principle. Mr. Gladstone supported the Bill, saying that he deprecated binding the Government of India by a positive expression of opinion based upon incomplete information. It was necessary, he said, to avoid the danger of being subservient to the interests of any particular classes or cliques in India, and whatever support Government intended to give to the election principle must be genuine. The amendment was withdrawn and the Bill read a second time without the House dividing. The principle having been adopted, however, Mr. Maclean has given notice of an amendment in Committee to make it inoperative. He will move that the Viceroy shall not adopt the elective principle without the consent of Parliament. In the present temper of the House, we may take it that the Bill will be steered clear of the new little rock ahead.

Mr. Maclean is also against the Indian Officers' Bill. He has given notice in the House of a motion for shelving it.

THE United States having followed up the President's threat and detailed eleven warships for preventing poaching in Behring Sea, Lord Salisbury consented to the renewal of the modus vivendi as soon as the Arbitration Treaty was satisfied, subject to the mutual assessment of the damages to sealers arising from the prohibition placed upon their operations. The reply has satisfied President Harrison, and the Senate has ratified the Treaty.

THE Emperor William has returned to Berlin in renewed health.

The Education Bill has been dropped. Great is the wrath of the Catholic party, who are deserting the Government.

Prince Bismarck is reported to have said that the Emperor William, as a reformer, had displeased all parties, impaired the prestige of the Hohenzollerns, and got into a state of mind justifying alarm.

THE Paris Anarchists have revenged themselves on the Prosecuting Counsel in the recent anarchist trials. There was a dynamite explosion at his house, utterly demolishing its interior and injuring fifteen inmates.

THE author of the dynamite outrages is under arrest. Forty foreign anarchists have been expelled from Paris.

THE Chamber of Deputies has passed without debate the Bill for punishing dynamite outrages with death. The Senate too has accepted the measure.

FOR sermons preaching politics, the French Government have threatened to close all Churches. They have further resolved to expel Father Forbes, a Scotch Jesuit, for the insulting way in which he spoke of the French Army in his discourses. It is said that the Marquis of Dufferin will interfere in the matter.

IN Australia, the distress of the unemployed is increasing. At Sydney, they are being housed in the old Exhibition Building.

IN view of the impending Presidential election, the Bland Silver Bill has been dropped. Mr. Stewart will move in the Senate on Monday next for rediscussion of his Bill for free coinage of gold and silver.

THE Poet of Democracy, Walt Whitman, author of Leaves of Grass and other rhapsodies in prose and unrhymed verse, the incomprehensible immoralist, who had long been ailing, has died in his native America.

THIS will be a memorable week in India. It has been a Guy Fawkes Week, and it would not be amiss if hereafter loyal and truly patriotic citizens kept every 27th of March as a sort of Guy's Day. There was no immediate danger, to be sure—no actual Gun Powder Plot to blow up the Viceroy together with all his Councillors. It was only a question of time, though. The danger was there all the same—all the surer for being deferred. In place of immediate violence or sporadic outbreaks, the aim was to destroy by slow poison circulated through the minute capillaries of the entire body politic. But, fortunately for the cause of order, all plots are extremely liable to exposure, and this multitudinous cabal was doomed from its inception. There is not the slightest cause for wonder that it has exploded.

FOR sometime, vague rumours had been afloat of certain infernal bombs manufactured in the Congress laboratory by its Vulcan, which would at last fire up the damp zeal of Young India into an irresistible demand for rights and burn down the fabric of British Indian Rule and humble to the dust the pride of the Civil Service. The first public announcement was made by the enterprising Morning Post of Allahabad. On the 19th March, our contemporary wrote:—

"We hear that Mr. A. O. Hume's parting shot at the Government of India takes the form of an incendiary 'private and confidential' letter addressed to the Standing Congress committees. In it the English are held up to execration, and it is affirmed that the time will come when their throats will be cut like sheep. It is altogether a peculiarly offensive and outrageous epistle, and the authorities will certainly fail in their duty if they do not arrest the writer for sedition. There is plenty of time, as Mr. Hume does not sail from Bombay till next week."

We quoted that in our last as a sensational paragraph, scarcely believing that, after his previous experiences, Mr. Hume would do such a wrong to India and England and compromise the Congress itself. But the matter was far too important for pool-pooling, or even mere indifference, and we thought it our duty to give our Allahabad brother's statement circulation in order to draw out the truth and warn Government of a possible danger. The Congress journals denied the imputation and abused the Morning Post and some other papers which had presumed to doubt the honor of the Congress and its "boss." Of these papers, the Madras Mail, edited by Sir Charles Lawson, the leading European journal of the Southern Presidency was one. And it was taken to task by the Native Press there. On the 27th March, the Madras Mail, in the South, and on the 28th the Morning Post, up in the North, answered the abuses heaped on them by publication of the full text of Mr. Hume's Private and Confidential despatches to each and every member of the Congress, showing that they had not in the least misrepresented.

The publication produced an immense sensation. The Congressists were alarmed. Their press adopted conflicting methods of tiding through the crisis. The Statesman and the Amrita Bazar reproduced the letters, but the Indian Mirror, which reproduces everything—good, bad or indifferent—as though by instinct led, ignored not only the correspondence but the event itself. The appearance of the Hume Plot in the Morning Post was followed by an article in the Indian Mirror, in a strain of hue and cry against traitors in the national camp who betray its secrets. The Indian Mirror had derided the Morning Post's news of the 19th March as mere "bosh." But the "bosh" has come true. And now when the Allahabad journal publishes the text of the Hume correspondence, the Calcutta writer whines and, without one word of acknowledgment or admission, complains like a schoolboy that the Morning Post has taken a mean revenge. The whole treatment of the business by our Calcutta contemporary is characteristic and discloses the weakness of the cause. "We have nothing to do," says the Mirror, "with the spirit or letter of Mr. Hume's writings. Mr. Hume and his friends know, we presume, what they are about,"—the said friends including, we presume, the editor of the Mirror himself. Nero fiddled while Rome was burning. Here we have a musician—God save the mark!—enjoying with his instrument while his own house is in flames. For the rest, the writer exhausts himself in an impersonal jeremiad against some supposititious enemies in the councils of the arch-congressists who have presumably been doing something dreadfully nasty. Up to this, our contemporary has kept the secret of the Hume exhortation to the country. He is evidently resolved to sit down the irruption.

The sensation is not confined to Bengal. It is common to the empire. In the South, Mr. Hume's manifesto, which we publish elsewhere, has drawn a protest from Dewan Bahadoor Ragoonath Row. He writes to the Madras Mail denying the sullen discontent among the rural classes to the extent alleged by Mr. Hume—or to any dangerous extent.

LORD Roberts had been to Nepal. This is the first visit of a British Commander-in-Chief to Khatmandu. Ten years ago, when the British Minister was virtually a prisoner confined to the Residency and the roads near it, the proposal could scarcely have been made without offence. But with each revolution in Nepal, as in other native States, British influence gains.

NO sooner was British authority established in Manipur, than measures were taken to bring it within reach of the outside world. Here is the latest news of an important operation in that behalf:—

"The Nichuguard gorge on the Manipur-Assam road has been successfully pierced by a cart road by the Madras Pioneers and Sappers, specially brought up for the purpose, and carts have gone through to-day to convey the baggage from Depupam camp on the return of the troops to India. The first detachment of the 1st Madras Pioneers leaves for Shikanghat to-day, for embarkation there on April 3rd. The work was commenced in the middle of November and 21,000 lb. of dynamite have been expended, and about five million cubic feet, chiefly of rock, excavated since that time. Strong wooden bridges have been thrown over the principal nullahs by the Queen's Own Sappers and Miners, who have also bridged the Kuki river, 390 feet wide."

This is the first fruit of civilised administration. Manipur is no longer the inaccessible region beyond the Eastern frontier of Bengal that only yesterday it was.

WE have received a letter from Chittagong containing the following:—

The Kookies have done very mischievous work up in Lushailand. The extent of the mischief is not yet fully known, but that it is of no mean character is evident from the somewhat gigantic preparations that are being made to bring them to their senses. A detachment of 200 sepoy from the 3rd Native Infantry came here on the 23rd for moving up to the hills.

GREAT was the excitement among the Mahomedan community at Delhi lately, at the news that one of their learned, Maulvi Hafiz Ahmad, had after all been convinced by the arguments and the earnestness of the Rev. G. A. Lefroy, of the Cambridge Mission, whose acquaintance he made while the latter was engaged in street preaching in the Chandi Chowk, and had decided to adopt the Christian faith. A day had been fixed for the Maulvi's public baptism by the reverend gentleman at St. Stephen's Church. As the excitement among the Mahomedans threatened a disturbance on the occasion, application was made to the police and special protection promised for the ceremony. Meanwhile, the Maulvi's friends besieged him, and at the last moment he backed out. A great crowd assembled on due date and hour, at St. Stephen's Church, but there was no baptism, and nothing to quarrel about, so the people quietly dispersed, agreeably disappointed.

THE cry of distress comes from almost all parts of the country and almost all districts. And the distress is on the increase. There has been no rain to speak of anywhere. The want of water is producing cholera in many parts. The District of Nuddea is specially suffering. At our door, in the North Suburban Town, many deaths have occurred during the week.

LORD Lansdowne arrived in Bombay on Wednesday and was accorded an enthusiastic welcome. Next day, he opened the Tansa Water-Works. These works have cost a crore and-a-half of rupees, being commenced in 1886 and completed in 1892. They are remarkable as a feat of engineering. The Viceroy, in his reply to the address of the Municipal Commissioners, said:—

"The reception they had given him was something more than a mere personal compliment. He regarded it as an indication of their desire that the supreme Government should be associated with them in their rejoicings at the completion of the work, which, though local in its character, was one of such magnitude and conferred such benefits upon the community. It was so important that they might well be allowed to consider it as falling outside the category of ordinary Municipal undertakings. The address referred in appropriate terms to the dimensions of the work, the completion of which they were celebrating. They had every reason to be proud of the achievement. It had been carried out in the face of great physical obstacles. They had not a perennial stream at hand whence by a simple process of diversion their city could be furnished with an abundance of water. They had no lakes like Loch Katrine from which the city of Glasgow draws an unfailing supply. The climatic peculiarities of India imposed upon them the onerous condition of providing a storage reservoir sufficiently large to collect during the rainy season a quantity of water adequate to provide for their wants during the remainder of the year. They had had to go far afield, over fifty miles, to discover a suitable catchment area in which to imprison the monsoon rainfall, while the subsidiary works connected with conducting the water from the lake to the city had involved the construction of aqueducts, bridges, tunnels, and other large works of hydraulic engineering. It was no small thing to be able to say that in order to procure for Bombay a supply of pure water they had erected the largest masonry dam, which had resulted in the creation of a lake with an area of nearly six square miles. Their efforts were likely to be crowned with a measure of success greater than was anticipated by the most sanguine supporter of the project. The quality of the water was undeniable, and, as regarded quantity, the works were expected to provide a daily supply of 17,000,000 gallons, but would as a matter of fact provide 21,000,000, or 40 gallons per head of the population. He believed that no city in the world, considering its requirements, would be more liberally provided with pure water than Bombay."

Lord Lansdowne thanked the Corporation "for their kindly reference to Lady Lansdowne, who was on the point of leaving the country for a few weeks possibly, owing to a fear that some evil disposed Member of Parliament might move an amendment to the Bill now before the House with the object of rendering it illegal not only for the Viceroy but for his wife to absent herself from her post." That would have done for an after dinner joke, but it was scarcely in the best taste on the occasion. It does not become the Viceroy to disparage the honest opposition of members of Parliament to the measures of Government.

Next day, that is yesterday, in the afternoon, the Viceroy reviewed the East India Squadron in the Bombay harbour. The festivities in honor of the august visit closed with a display of fireworks on the Kennedy sea-face.

Today, Lady Lansdowne leaves for England.

PREPARATIONS are making at city Bhagalpur for a fitting reception of the Lieutenant-Governor now on tour in that district. At the instance of Rai Bahadar Shib Chunder Banerjee, a Reception Committee has been formed at a public meeting. Sir Charles Elliott is due there on the 7th, where he stays one day, returning to Calcutta on the 9th.

THE Government of Bombay having passed a resolution that the services of the officers and clerks employed in the political department of the Secretariat, should in no case be lent to the Native States, the Advocate of India says:—

"Mr. Lee-Warner, who is responsible for this order, believes and rightly we may suppose, that a training in our Political Department makes a man far too knowing to be employed anywhere else; especially in some Native States where an unscrupulous man with his possession of our political secrets would prove a veritable thorn in our side."

A futile restriction. Nothing can prevent Government employés from clandestinely selling their information and advice, if so minded. The Bombay Resolution will only have the effect of promoting irresponsible service. The best thing the Government can do, under the circumstances, is to abolish secrecy as a rule. There is nowadays no necessity for secrecy, even in the Political Department, except in peculiar circumstances of extreme rarity.

ANOTHER curer of Leprosy has come to the fore. Mrs. Algar, the wife of an officer at Sialkot, is the claimant, and she is supported by not one but three Fathers of the Romish Church, Messrs. Leo, Lieven, and Edmendor. These gentlemen, who are now at Lahore, testify to having witnessed two wonderful cures accomplished in their presence by Mrs. Algar. This lady saviour is said to have righted in no time a native who had been suffering from water leprosy for a period of fifteen years and had lost two of his fingers, and another native who had been afflicted with this malady for about five years. What "water leprosy" is, will probably confound the Faculty to tell. This is the first time that we come across the word—in the Anglo-Indian press. We acknowledge the appropriateness of the term. The whole business is of water—watery. Before the lady wizard or—if that word should be thought to carry any offensive suggestion—magician, the fell disease is simple as water. At touch of her nostrum, like water, it evaporates.

EDUCATED Indians need not repine for employment. Lord Wenlock has solved the great problem. Speaking at the Christian College anniversary, the Governor of Madras emphasised on the necessity of material and moral progress side by side. He had observed that the higher classes were educated at the expense of the lower, who can no longer be neglected but must be fitted for the position they should occupy. Primary education must therefore be extended. He advised the soundly educated for whom there appeared to be a lack of openings, to take to agriculture and make a special profession of it. By going back to farming, they would do the country generally much good.

Native Opinion has one long paragraph by way of a leader on the appointment of Mr. Crawford, of the Bombay Civil Service, at present Judge of Tanna, by the Gaekwar of Baroda to high office in His Highness' service, for the especial purpose of drafting a Penal Code and other laws for that State. Apart from its architectonic peculiarity, this single-paragraph article is a statement of great ability, marred by the constant repetition of one unfortunate, not to say barbarous, word, and one curiously unsound opinion. That opinion is contained in this sentence, to wit:—

"Mr. Dosabhoj Framjee has drafted a Penal Code for the Bhownagur state and there are equally able natives, if not abler, who can accomplish that not very difficult feat with equal success."

What! has the making of a Penal Code come to be regarded as such a joke? So far from a great jurist being a rara avis, it would seem that Solons and Lyciuses, Livingstons and Macaulays are in Bombay common as black crows in the East.

THE retiring Municipal Commissioners at their last meeting on the last day of their term, on Thursday last, passed the Budget for the official year just commenced, without altering the rates. The rates will therefore stand thus:—

General rate...	9½ per cent.
Water rate	6 per cent.
Lighting rate	2 per cent.
Sewage rate	2 per cent.
or a total of ...			19½ per cent.

With the exception of the General, all other rates are levied at their highest. The General is capable of expansion to thirteen, and the Chairman advised the raising it by half to be on the safe side and to avoid, if possible, a sudden high rise in the next year.

The meeting would not sanction the increased emoluments to servants and officers recommended by the General constituted into the Budget Committee. At the instance of Baboo Norender Nath Sen, it was decided to refer back the increases to the General Committee that will now be formed, for thorough sifting of the claims allowed by the retiring Committee. With this attitude of the meeting, it was not deemed advisable perhaps to bring forward the propositions in the list of business for the increase of Rs. 100 a month to the salary of the Vice-Chairman, and horse allowance of Rs. 50 per mensem to the Senior Assistant Assessor and to each of the Assistant Assessors.

A protest was raised by Pandit Prannath Saraswati, seconded by Baboo Shewbux Bogla, against the cruel destruction of stray dogs in the Calcutta streets. It was suggested that these animals should not be killed by battering their heads but caught alive and sent to the Pujrapole, or killed by chloroform or other easy and less cruel methods, or made over to their owners on certain conditions.

Mr. Apar drew the attention of the meeting and through it of the Government to the unworkableness of the Fire Brigade engine during the recent fire at Shibpore in the mills.

The meeting quietly confirmed a resolution of the General Committee granting permission to the scheme of building for a new office for the Standard Life Assurance Company involving the bridging of Vansittart Row. The bridge will be over a blind lane, and will replace what is at present no better than a mews. It would have been better still if the sanction were not unconditional. A stipulation for its removal by the Company on any future requirement by the Corporation would have been all right.

A CASE which, from the position of the parties concerned, created some sensation in the Hoogly District, has been occupying the local courts for some time. It arose out of a land dispute in the old town of Serampore and came originally before the Subdivisional officer, Mr. Windsor. The well-known High Court Pleader Baboo Troylokha Nath Mitter, Doctor of Laws, Chairman of the Serampore Municipality, had obtained from the Hoogly Civil Court a decree against one Sarat Chandra Chatterjee. By virtue of it he entered into possession of certain premises and proceeded to make some alterations, removing windows and corrugated iron railings. One Mr. Gerald claiming as tenant of Sarat Chunder Chatterjee obstructed the operation and finally charged not only the men but also Dr. Mitter with theft of the iron railings, &c. A young Civilian blade is not, as a rule, scared away from perpetrating any enormity against a native however eminent, but to cry "thief!" against a man of Dr. Mitter's standing seemed to Mr. Windsor too much of a good thing even as a Civilian freak. So he reduced the charge to one of mischief. The case was ably argued before him, counsel from Calcutta having been engaged on both sides, but the defendants had scarcely fair play. A single circumstance will show the spirit in which Mr. Windsor heard it. He would not call any witnesses for Dr. Mitter unless he deposited Rs. 40 for expenses of each. However, there being nothing against Dr. Mitter, he was acquitted, but his men were convicted and fined.

The case was next taken up to the Judge of Hoogly. Mr. P. Mitter, barrister-at-law, a gentleman who had earned a reputation for able and fearless advocacy in the Backerganj District, appeared to support the conviction, while the eminent advocate Mr. Manomohan Ghose with Babu Kali Charan Banerjee, Pleader, and others appeared for the prisoners. It would appear that the Serampore Magistrate defended his action on the ground that the affidavits filed before him by Baboos Gonesh Chunder Chunder and Kali Charan Banerjee were a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end. That is a fine statement for a young officer to make against two well-known practitioners, one of whom is an Honourable member of the Bengal Council. But Civilian "cheek" can go any lengths. Be that as it may, the mature Civilian Judge of Hoogly has not been able to countenance the proceedings of the scape-grace of the Service. He is of opinion that there is no evidence to sustain the conviction, and he will recommend the High Court accordingly.

But supposing a poorer or less influential man than Dr. Troylokha Nath Mitter were concerned? He would simply have been a victim of Civilian incompetence, without redress.

As a mark of distinction and favor, the Maharaja of Mysore has allowed Mr. Ramchender Iyer, 2nd Judge of the Mysore Chief Court, the privilege of appearing in Durbars without the Kumerbund. It may be taken as an honor, but it detracts from the dignity and grace of the assembly, and ultimately recoils on both the giver and the recipient. Now that the British affect the Mogul and hold Durbars, they should prohibit attendance without the Kumerbund.

BABU Bany Madhub Mookerjee having retired, Babu Abinash Chunder Ghose has been promoted to the Chief Interpretership of the High Court, Original Side. Moulvi Budrudin Hyder from the Calcutta Police Court fills the vacancy created by the elevation of Babu Ghose.

It was time enough for these latter gentlemen to have a lift. Time enough too for a better style of interpretation in the High Court than has been known since the Browns and Larymours left, to make room for ignorant Baboos, adopted children of Judges, and so forth.

Mr. Budruddin Hyder's translation to the High Court is a distinct loss to the Police Court. He was Sir Rivers Thompson's "strong man" to coach the Honorary Bench. Who will take his place we wonder?

THE appointment of Mr. Woodroffe to act for Sir Charles Paul going on long furlough, has been Gazetted. The office of Advocate-General of Bengal—equal to that of the Attorney-General in England—is so important that the change in the personnel thereof claims more than a passing announcement. We confess the succession comes upon the public with some surprise. But it is no surprise of protest or of the slightest doubt as to the propriety of the dispensation of patronage by the powers that be. Mr. Woodroffe's reputation for exceptional ability is too well established for cavil. His success at the bar has been unparalleled. His practice is simply enormous. Hence, indeed, the surprise. Nobody expected that Mr. Woodroffe would care to go into harness, any more than the other great defender of the liberty and rights of the subject, Mr. Jackson, would care to be shelved to the pench of the High Court. The official emoluments of the post could not be an object to him. In all probability, Mr. Woodroffe as Advocate General will find his income reduced, for as chief Prosecutor for the Crown he must forego the uninterrupted succession of magnificently paid briefs which the accused have been wont to pile on his lap. He has been known to make in a month or so what at the official rates of payment he must not hope to make in six months or perhaps a year. If he thought fit to take office, the Government would be only too glad to secure his services. They could not, under any circumstances, refuse a barrister of his high reputation who is also senior to all possible competitors. In such an event, the Administration might well have been suspected of religious bigotry in setting their face against a staunch Romanist and well-known liberal supporter and, indeed, princely endower of the Catholic Church. It is perhaps with an eye to his future at Home, that Mr. Woodroffe accepts the to him somewhat barren honor of the office of Advocate-General. But that is his concern, and we need not pursue the why and wherefore. The public concern is that his taking office weakens the unofficial side of the bar. There is one consolation, however, that so able, staunch and fearless an advocate as Mr. Jackson had, after an absence of several years, returned, before Sir Charles Paul applied for leave.

Mr. George Yule is dead. The private schools in Calcutta had a holiday in sad memory of the deceased, who had latterly identified himself with the Congress movement. The schools cannot but be grateful to him for the distribution among them of the poundage during his shrievalty.

But Mr. Yule was something more than a charitable member of society. He was a politician of calibre whose politics were not anti-native. He was probably the only non-official European who repudiated the doctrine of India for the British above all. A fearless canny Scot holding the view that he did, he joined the Congress, at whose session at Allahabad he presided, delivering a memorable statesmanlike address. His death weakens the Congress and is a loss to the empire and the British and Indian races.

THE High Executioner of Great Britain—James Berry—has resigned his odious but necessary office. With his experience of over 200 executions, he considers himself the master of his art and the situation, and it were infra dig for him to brook an adviser or a dictator by his side. He writes to the Home Secretary, "My reason is on account of Dr. Barr interfering with my responsible duty at Kirkdale Goal, Liverpool, on my last execution there." For the poor medico he has all the scorn of an expert for an amateur. He does not reflect that your doctor is a better hand at killing than in saving. But this Dr. Barr was simply good for nothing. It appears that Berry had arranged for a 3ft. 6in. drop, the medical attendant, however, without consulting him, decided upon, and, against his advice stuck to, a 6ft. 8in. drop. As Berry had foreseen, the prisoner was decapitated on the fall of the drop. Berry, though hardened in his awful trade, had conceived a repugnance to capital punishment. He took this opportunity to wash his hands clean of a business which had grown distasteful to him. It is said he has received guarantees for 145,000 dollars for twenty lectures in America on capital punishment. At present, he is on a lecturing tour in England on his own account.

THE HUME MANIFESTO.

WHEN exactly ten years ago, Mr. Allan Octavian Hume, plucked in the competition for the prizes of the service, retired in a huff, who ever thought of the possible finale of that desertion? Who ever thought that he contemplated plunging from office into the thick of the opposition?—That he would even create an opposition if none existed—for the pleasure of confounding his British brethren and previous colleagues?—That he was prepared to set on foot a mischievous agitation with ramifications spread throughout this vast Empire and extending even to Great Britain? Still less could any one imagine that, in the vindictiveness of disappointment of a vain old man, he might tempt the enthusiasts who follow his lead out of their duty to the state and involve the land in the horrors of civil war. Some of these things have been done, however, and it will not be from any absence of will or want of rashness on his part if the programme is not completed. If all or any part of this could have been anticipated ten years ago, it would certainly have been worth while keeping the enraged man in the service at any cost. A membership of the Supreme Council of the Government of India, for which it was understood the gentleman pined, would not have been thrown away for securing peace. It is even said, and his habitual rate of self-estimate makes it highly probable, that he harboured aspirations after the Lieutenant-Government of the North Western Provinces. If so, it would not have been too costly a sop to the grim Cerberus. He might almost have commanded terms. Who is there now, if he could have guessed all that has taken place, that would not, in 1882, have made this unhappy gentleman the ruler of a British Province, even the Governor of Madras or Bombay, if that would have contented him? That certainly would have been the less evil. There can be no question about the advantage of muzzling a mad bull instead of allowing it to go away and roam at large, in Brahmani bovine fashion, upturning sweetmeat shops and running amok through the crowded Chowk. The sweets and responsibilities of office are a wonderful specific, for subduing the fever of patriotism and extinguishing the fire of philanthropy.

Throughout his long service of thirty-two or thirty-three years, from 1849 to 1882, Mr. Hume gave no reason to suspect that he had any love for the people of India or thought any evil of his fellow servants in the Government. In the high position of a Governor or a Lieutenant-Governor, he would have been disposed to still greater complaisancy. Under any circumstances, he could not have done serious mischief. We have seen how, in the Government of Bengal, Sir George Campbell was curbed. Governor or no Governor, the British administration is a self-acting machinery which goes on tolerably. Even a mad Civilian at its head cannot work a tenth of the harm that he can effect when left out in the enjoyment of the full freedom of the liberal law of England, but without the restraints of official usage and etiquette, or the influence of brother officials.

Such are the reflections that naturally arise on a perusal of the correspondence whose appearance is the political event of the week. The Congress "boss" is incorrigible. He comes of a fine British stock, and he was always known for his courage. But it is useless to acknowledge the courage of one who has developed the highest imprudence. He is no longer bold, but simply rash. Perhaps he is weary of life. Overtaken by one reverse after another, he may well be. Virtually driven from office in the maturity of his powers, he took refuge in such amiable "fads" as vegetarianism and such questionable games as Mahatmaism. These could scarcely afford consolation to one who, for more than thirty years, had been busy in the excitement of the exercise of command. Then the Mahatmas jilted him, and occultism proved a poor illusion. Then he fell back upon the more congenial work of coaching the native politicians and advising the Government. Throughout the weak Viceroyalty of Lord Ripon, he posed as interpreter between the natives and the Viceroy, and, shall we say, sold the former in the Ilbert Bill Controversy? Many were the projects which in those days issued from the brain of this Anglo-Indian Sièyes, which, with one exception, came to nothing. That exception was the Telegraphic Union to counteract the misrepresentations of the Times' Calcutta Correspondent. Then came the hit of the Congress. He found it just the thing, and has been working at it with untiring devotion all these years. But this too has been a disappointment, and now he is leaving the country, he cannot contain his soul and is out with it. Instead of blaming his own hurry before time and maturity for the failure, he condemns everybody right and left, all round. Having made so much sacrifice without fruit, he is loath to abandon the dear thing. He is still ready to help it from England, if he sees a chance. But the people must give him assurance that they care for their rights and, above all, must pay for the agitation that British men, whether mercenaries or philanthropists, are ready to conduct in their behalf. He is not again going to be done out of his money, as well as out of his time and energies. This is the object of his letter. In order to rouse the Congress men, he kicks them, and calls them names. He not only abuses but threatens. Slaves they are and slaves they must remain, says he, unless they act up to the Hume mantrams. He threatens not only the ruled but also bullies the rulers. To make the latter submit to the demands of the Congress, the General Secretary of the Congress rants against them like a virago and terrifies them like a Calvinist preacher.

It is difficult to keep temper under such a wrong as the Hume correspondence is against both the people and the state. It compromises our countrymen and weakens as well as exasperates the ruling class. And all this most gratuitously. Had there been the slightest ground for such an anathema maranatha against the British Government, we might understand, and might in some measure excuse an excess of zeal. But there is no colourable pretext for the diatribe.

Not but what there are many abuses in administration, as there will always be. But they are none of that serious character which would justify us in regarding this land—in the language of Mahomedan Law—Darul Harb. Beyond the fact that the Government is foreign and that, in consequence, the Indians are commercially somewhat depressed and have not enough of high careers open to them, there is nothing to complain of. Not only are they free from the countless forms of misrule, rife in Oriental countries, but they are distinctly better governed than the Europeans of the Continent. Under the circumstances, Mr. Hume's indictment is not only most unjust but most imprudent. It will only set the rulers and the ruled against one another. It will prick the people into discontent and disaffection. At its best, a foreign Government cannot possibly escape jealousy and misunderstanding. Mr. Hume will certainly intensify the feeling where it exists and create it where it is not. And this is the great friend of the Indians!

But Mr. Hume is past counsel. This is not the first time that he has been caught in the act. It is now four years since, a similar scandal threatened to kill the infant Congress. Pamphlets of an inflammatory character had been circulated by the Congress. It was those pamphlets that alienated from the movement such a well-trying, if not flattering, friend of the people as Sir Auckland Colvin, author of the stirring essay in the Pioneer which, after the disaster of the Concordat, once more buoyed up the native cause to the surface, and estranged such a life-long Liberal as Lord Dufferin. They naturally kept back the more prudent natives. Those pamphlets were the subject of much controversy. The native chiefs of the Congress, justly fearful of the fate of their infant institution, were ready to repudiate the seditious publications. Not so Mr. Bonnerjea, who took the old man under his ægis and saved his amour propre. A superior man would have bowed to the storm, instead of trying to wriggle out of it. At any rate, that lesson ought to have sufficed for both Mr. Hume and the Congress, if that thing has any existence independent of him. But it did not. Here now we have a performance by Mr. Hume before which all his previous performances, whether in his own name or in those of imaginary Maulavis, pale into nothingness. He knows that he is above the law, or else, on that first occasion, he would at least have made the acquaintance of a Magistrate. So he does not care to mince matters. Others are proud of giving a bit of their minds, if opportunity offers. Mr. Hume has gone the whole hog—of his moral consciousness.

Mr. Hume might seem to be tempting the Fates, but he is not tempting. He would be glad enough to be a martyr, but there is no chance of that. And he knows it. Over and above the fact that an Englishman in India is practically above the law, the novelty of his conduct gives Mr. Hume immunity. The very extravagance of his conduct is his best safety. It seems ridiculous to accuse an Englishman of perpetrating or abetting treason against the British Dominion in India. The ridiculousness becomes all the greater when that Englishman happens to be a retired high official drawing pension. Hereafter, such cases will occur from time to time, but just now Mr. Hume is the sole offender. And the cautious, unimaginative, and unlogical British mind cannot move unless supported by precedents. Mr. Hume is aware of his strength too. He is the head of a formidable organization, which, though it cannot attain its political objects, can make matters unpleasant for any official or administration. If he is touched, he will make the welkin ring with his wrongs. Who will care to disturb the vast hornets' nest which the Congress Committees in India and England together constitute? Relying on his position, therefore, as well as on the weakness of the administrations too often demonstrated, Mr. Hume has turned as outrageous as possible.

Had there been at the helm a statesman with the nerve, experience and prestige of a Dalhousie in his latter years, with Lieutenants like Ashley Eden, and Chief Kazies like Barnes Peacock, Mr. Hume would probably have been more discreet. As it is, he has been free to think aloud at the top of his voice in the marketplace. And his unchallenged privilege will emphasise the injustice of the recent prosecution of the Bangabasi.

With his usual bad taste as well as bad tact, Mr. Hume would implicate his friends, trying to utilise the kindness that in private humours an old man of many virtues and accomplishments into public support of all his extravagances. Surely, men like Mr. Bonnerjea could publish as well as Mr. Hume, if they thought it necessary, instead of asking him to proclaim their views. A lawyer would be the last person to allow another man to represent him on vital questions of the last moment involving endless nuances of thought and policy.

MR. A. O. HUME'S MANIFESTO.

TO EVERY MEMBER OF THE CONGRESS PARTY.

DEAR SIR,—I have had so many letters asking me whether any permanent memorial to the late Pandit Ajudhia Niah is in contemplation as also, what I think about the matter, that it seems to me best to write a short circular letter on the subject.

In my opinion, in the present state of the country, it is not desirable to attempt memorials to any one. We so grievously need money for the national cause that we should give to this every rupee we can spare, and not fritter away our resources in half-dozen different channels. No matter how deserving are individuals or institutions, these are of little moment compared to the national cause, upon the triumph of which depends the comfort, prosperity, nay the very lives, of countless millions.

A very large number of you seem almost as blind as the Government. You do not, especially the rich and well-to-do, realize that the existing system of administration is not only ill-adapted to the wants of the country, is not only pauperizing the people—you all know and heartily deplore these facts,—but is inevitably preparing the way for one of the most terrible cataclysms in the history of the world.

The people are very patient, very mild and humble, but so were the people of France only twenty years, nay only ten years, before they rose and murdered their Sovereign and, practically, the bulk of the better classes; they are very ignorant and absolutely devoid of definite aims and leaders, but so were the masses in France. It was Hunger and Misery, those great leaders and teachers that changed at last, apparently in a day (though the change had been going on unseen for years), that crowd of sheep into an army of wolves.

All history shows that, however peaceful a population, time comes when starvation, injustice and despair instill into them a new nature and drive them into violence and crime.

Those of you who have gone deep into the roots of the question know that the cup of the misery of scores of millions of our masses is well nigh full, and that day by day Poverty, the mother of Anarchy, is pressing with a heavier and heavier hand upon an ever-growing portion of our population.

As surely as night follows day, must a terrible rising evolve, sooner or later, out of this state of affairs, unless we can remedy existing evils and redress the more prominent of our paupers' grievances.

Do not be buoyed up with the false hopes. Providence in its mercy may delay the catastrophe, but come it must, and come it will, and it may be sooner and not later.

Do not fancy that the Government will be able to protect you are itself. No earthly power can stem an universal agrarian rising in a country like this. My countrymen will be as men in the desert, vainly struggling for a brief space against the simoon. There will be no foe to meet in the field, but rail and road will become impassable, bridges will be wrecked, telegraphs cease to exist, supplies be arrested. Thousands of the rioters may be killed, but to what avail, when there are millions on millions who have nothing to look forward to but death--nothing to hope for but vengeance; as for leaders--with the hour comes the man--be sure there will be no lack of leaders.

This is no hypothesis--it is a certainty. Recall what you know of the growing poverty and sullen discontent amongst the masses, and reflect for yourselves, those amongst you who have read history to any purpose, what such a state of things ever has led to and ever must culminate in.

Now, we can only avert this general ruin by those radical reforms in the administration which the Congress has, after years of patient labour, all the ablest and wisest Indians, declared to be essential. Even these alone will not suffice, but they will do much, and they will substitute hope for despair in the hearts of the masses, and give us time to work out those other changes and reforms which are required for a peaceful solution of the terrible problem that our Rulers' failure, to realize the real position of affairs, has created.

But here in India we pray, we argue, we protest, to men who cannot or will not hear, cannot or will not see. Our only hope lies in awakening the British public to a sense of the wrongs of our people--to a consciousness of the unwisdom and injustice of the existing administration. The least that we could do would be to provide ample funds--for sending and keeping constantly in England deputations of our ablest speakers to plead their country's cause--to enable our British committee to keep up an unbroken series of public meetings, whereat the true state of affairs in India might be expounded--to flood Great Britain with pamphlets, leaflets, newspapers, and magazine articles--in a word to carry on an agitation there, on the lines and scale of that in virtue of which the Anti-Corn Law League triumphed.

As a fact, however, but a small sum, comparatively, is provided--a wholly inadequate sum, and even that, though promised, is paid so tardily, thousands of letters, circulars, and reminders are needed to get in even this ineffectual contribution.

Now, perhaps, you will understand, why I say--"For God's sake waste no money on memorials or any other minor enterprise; give every farthing you can spare to the general cause." It is not your patriotism I appeal to only, but to your dearest interests; your homes, your little properties, your lives and these, it may be, even of all dearest and nearest to you, are at stake. Cherish no false hopes. You are the creation of Great Britain--of British learning, history and literature, and with British rule you stand or fall. On the peaceful continuance of that Rule depend all that is dear to you in this life, all your earthly hopes, but that peaceful continuance can only be ensured by securing those fundamental changes in the policy and practice of the administration that you have advocated in Congress. You all know this, you feel its truth in your hearts as strongly as I do, and yet you twiddle on about memorials here and memorials there, and I can hardly spur you into paying even that miserably inadequate subsidy which you yearly promise so cheerfully to the national cause!

I know that there are a few of you who, living on pittance of £100 to £300 a year, do contribute, relatively to your means, most liberally, but I marvel at the short-sighted avarice of so many of the rich who grudge what for them are truly paltry sums. Are they, too, like our Rulers, wholly blind to the signs of the times? Is it impossible for you to make them realize that it is they themselves and their beloved treasures that would be the first to fall victims to the cataclysm? That they are grudging a few hundreds or thousands to the only cause that can save their lacs and crores? Or do they comfort themselves, as some of the most far-seeing of our rulers do, with the hope that "it will last our time?" It may, in the case of some but all probabilities are against its doing so in that of the majority. They and their precious riches, which they hug so miserly, rest upon an almost limitless heap of loose dynamite, which any trifle may explode--how, when, or where, no man can say. Such troubles ever come like a bolt out of the blue; it is always the unexpected that occurs.

Our Government here, after seven years of persistent efforts, I give up in despair; but it is quite impossible for you to open the eyes of your own countrymen, to make them realize the position and induce all to join heartily and liberally in a grand effort to save that Government to whom, in the past, India has owed so much (and in whose fortunes ours are indissolubly bound up,) even without its help--even against its will?--Yours sincerely,

Feb. 16, 1892.

A. O. HUME.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

NOT FOR PUBLICATION.

6, Park Street, Calcutta, 8th March, 1892.

TO EVERY MEMBER OF THE CONGRESS PARTY.

DEAR SIR,--In continuation of my letter of the 16th February, I now forward for your information copies of certain letters that have passed between the Chairman of the Allahabad Standing Congress Committee and myself. I think these letters raise questions which will interest you all. Moreover Pandit Bishumber Nath is a gentleman second only to the late Pandit Ajoodhia Nath in wisdom, experience, and the respect in which he is held by all classes in the N.-W. Provinces, and it is only right that you should be made acquainted with his views on this vital question.--Yours sincerely,

A. O. HUME.

No. 378.

Allahabad, 23rd February, 1892.

MY DEAR SIR,--We have very carefully considered the contents of your printed circular letter dated the 16th instant, copies of which were received here the day before yesterday, in the afternoon. With due deference to you I beg to submit, on behalf of myself and the Members of the Committee here, that the publication of that letter is, for various reasons, inexpedient and calculated to do great injury to the cause which you and we have so much at heart. You, no doubt, address that letter as an independent member of the Congress Party, and not as its General Secretary; but considering the position you occupy, the letter in question will be held to be a manifesto of the whole party; and, though you have taken very great care to leave no room for misconstruction or misrepresentation, still we feel positively certain that our opponents will misconstrue it and misrepresent us in a way that is likely to do us serious injury as a party.

In fact, we are not only afraid of being misrepresented by our opponents, but we also think that a considerable number of men in our own ranks will feel nervous at the publication of the letter.

We fully understand that such a publication would be considered wholly harmless in England, where it can only be taken as an honest expression of the deep and earnest convictions of a person who, possessing an intimate knowledge of the condition of the country, and burning with a desire to promote the welfare of both the rulers and ruled, feels it his duty to awaken them to a proper understanding of the situation. You know, however, how different India is from England, and with what hostility the expression of such opinions is treated here. I beg you, therefore, to reconsider the matter, and to stop the circulation of the letter by wiring to all those committees and individuals to whom it may have been sent to return all the copies of it to you.

It is with great reluctance and regret that I address you this letter, but we feel that we would be wanting in our duty, not only to the country but also to you, if we did not express our honest opinion of the matter, especially when we consider it to be so extremely serious.

With best respects, I remain, my dear sir, yours very truly,

BISHUMRUR NATH PANDIT.

To A. O. Hume, Esq., C. B., 6, Park-street, Calcutta.

6, Park-street, Calcutta, 24th February, 1892.

MY DEAR SIR,--Your promised letter arrived this morning. I have considered it most carefully.

I can only discover in it this one argument, v.z., that our opponents will misconstrue my letter and misrepresent us. You do not urge that the letter lays itself open to this, but you hold--and possibly rightly so--that they will do this.

Now let me point out to you that this argument is not entitled to much weight. There is no conceivable step that any mortal man can take, in any direction, that an adversary will not misconstrue and misrepresent. Were we to allow weight to such an argument, all action would be paralyzed, and all progress and reform rendered impossible. It is this timidity, this fear of what others will say, that has so constantly paralysed the reform party here, and given an appearance of lukewarmness to their proceedings that did not really characterize the private feelings of the men who composed that party.

You add, I note, that many of our own party may feel nervous at the publication of this letter. This, too, may be true, but, if so, it only proves the necessity of the publication.

Am I to allow all these good people, multitudes of whom do really (however foolish this may be) look up to me as a guide, to go on dozing at the edge of a precipice? Certainly not. The sooner they do get nervous about the situation and begin to exert themselves, in real earnest, the better, for the situation is one full of most serious, I fear I must say terrible, probabilities.

I am well aware that there are a large number of the Congress Party, as there are amongst the officials, who don't want to hear of or believe in these things--whose hearts indeed faintly whisper to them, now and again, that they are so, but who stifle the small voice--who don't want to be waked up to the realities of the case--who feel dimly that some grim spectre is nigh at hand but keep their chaddars firmly bound about their faces to prevent their seeing it. It is as a first step to tearing away those veils and com-pulling them, themselves, to see what is there---themselves, to face and reckon with that spectre--- that this letter has been written.

Your own action in this matter, your letter and its arguments, show how necessary this awakening is. If you, gentlemen, at all realized how little there is between you and absolute wreck, would you talk to me of misconstruction, etc.? No; you would say "let them say what they like, for Gods' sake let us, at any rate, try with all our might to avert this coming ruin!"

Many of you have, doubtless, never taken the trouble to explore and measure the extent of the suffering and discontent amongst the masses. A great many of you do not understand what a house of cards our grand administration is. You have not seen, as I have, the entire administration shivel up like a parchment, flung into the fire, in less than a month, in consequence of the mutiny of some 40,000 soldiers, and that, although at that time the entire population were with us, in most places actively, in all passively if not actively.

Lastly, very few, if any, of you have so studied and thought over history as to realise what these two propositions necessarily involve as a consequence---a starving and discontented population and an administration of foreigners constituting much less than 1 per cent. even of the community.

I tell you that the danger is real and imminent, and that the time has long passed when you could afford to consider in the smallest degree what blind opponents may think and say. The time has come for you to stand boldly out and say: "This is what we have to expect---this is what we will seek to avert by every possible effort, quite as much for your sakes as for our own. If you are blind, we are not, nor will we sit still to be destroyed, merely because you wish not to be dragged out of your fool's paradise by our sounding the alarm. We will sound it---whether you like it or not---until we get, you or the British people, to realize the danger and make common cause with us in averting it."

You say that in England no one would find fault with an earnest effort like this letter of mine, to awaken both rulers and ruled to a proper understanding of the situation, but that I know with what hostility such expressions of opinions are treated here. I do know something of this, and it has been this knowledge that has restrained me so long from a frank exposition of the facts. But the progress of events during the past twelve months has convinced me that, hostility or no hostility, the time has now come to speak out, so that none who read can fail to understand. The state of affairs in Southern India is becoming sensibly worse, and we have had a series of little squalls that, carefully studied, seems to forebode an approaching cyclone. There have been during the last twelve months fully a dozen local riots, of no consequence in themselves, but of a character differing from any previous ones---riots in which the riot was not made by the parties concerned, but by rushes of outsiders not directly concerned in the dispute. The Balloon riot, the Sham Bazar riot in Calcutta, the Benares riot, the Salvation Army, Bombay, riot, the Madras grain riots, etc., were all of this nature. The real fracas, in each case, was caused not by those persons who commenced the dispute, nor with their knowledge or consent but by sudden upheavals, of, as we should call them in England, the roughs who gathered to the place. You cannot now, it would seem, get together any low class crowd in any city, which does not include a multitude of half starving, discontented, and therefore poor, weak creatures as they look, dangerous men, ready and anxious to join in any dispute where there is a chance of a row. In themselves though many persons were injured and perhaps a few killed, these riots were of no consequence as signs of the times, their importance can scarcely be overrated.

To my mind your duty and that of the whole Congress Party is clear.

You owe it to Government, to yourselves, your families, your country to mince matters no longer, to come out boldly as men and insist on attention being given to the growing gravity of the situation. Let them take their time about granting us representative institutions if they will, but let them satisfy the people somewhat before these eat up both ourselves and the Government. Let them reduce their overgrown military and civil expenditure, and alike where land, forests, salt, etc., are concerned, lighten their entire fiscal system, and let them put down their rural drinking shops with a firm hand, for it is in these---believe it or not as they please---that much of the coming mischief will be hatched.

As I told you in my letter replying to your brief telegram, and reporting Mr. Bonnerjee's matured opinions, he does not think that the officials can take offence at anything in the letter. But admit that he, and I think rightly, credits them with a wisdom that you are not prepared to anticipate from them. Grant that they are even very angry (though God only knows how they can be) with my letter, what after all does this amount to when your duty is plain before you. Can you allow the irrational anger, for irrational it would be, in this case of a veritably microscopic minority, to weigh against the lives of millions, the future of two nations?

After all, as Mr. Bonnerjee---who agrees in all I have thus far said---asks me to add, the whole point of the matter is this: Can you lay your hands on your hearts, and as true and honest men deny the existence of widespread poverty, semi-starvation, misery and discontent? If you can, this entirely alters the case, and we understand your position. But if like ourselves you thoroughly believe in this, then it seems to us that your duty like ours is plain. We complain of the bondness [sic] of the officials---may this not be partly due to our own reticence on these matters, our rooted antipathy to telling any one anything that we think he will not like? Is it not reasonable, for those officials at any rate who live on more or less friendly terms with Indians, to ridicule all ideas of coming trouble, thinking that were there anything in it they would be sure to hear of it from their Indian acquaintances? Certainly on every ground the time has come to speak out, nay it is not impossible that if all the educated classes would behave like men and speak out boldly to all their European acquaintances, official and non-official, as to the existing state of the country and the dangers this involves, that the authorities themselves might be awakened to the urgency of the matter.

Be this as it may, if you do your duty, you will not have, happen what may, to reproach yourselves with having, through a sheer lack of moral courage, neglected that primary preventive precaution of looking matters steadily in the face and doing your best to make others do the same.

May I now ask that you will cause this letter and the two previous brief ones to be read by all your committee, and then kindly favour me with their mature verdict,---Yours sincerely,

A. O. HUME.

TELEGRAM FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE ALLAHABAD
STANDING CONGRESS COMMITTEE.

The Committee have resolved to circulate your letter of the 16th February. It is being circulated.

P. S.---Since this was in type, a letter has been received from one of the most learned and thoughtful Indians now living (not himself, ostensibly, a Congress man, for he is an official, but entirely with us in heart) which suggests an additional reason for the comparative coldness with which many now regard the Congress movement---a coldness which I had attributed solely to a growing disbelief in the efficacy of merely constitutional agitation. He says:---

"From the time you gave the cold shoulder to the cow preservation movement, they have begun to look upon you with half-heartedness. To Hindus it is the question of all questions, and it will always be the war cry of the discontented in the times that you presage.....I much marvel at your prophetic strain in your last circular. It is all truth, I have been long thinking over the same problem, and I am much struck with your arriving at the same conclusions as I had arrived at. . . . But it is coming nearer with an imperceptible but irresistible force The country is poor, the masses starving, the middle classes have too many drains on their purses, and the Rich and Reis, the Princes and the Millionaires are blind to all perception of their real interests, the national wants and aspirations. We have failed to arouse them, and we almost despair They seem doomed to general ruin. The country must pass through a baptism of fire and sword to chasten it to purity and enfranchisement."

From all sides letters have been pouring in endorsing all that my letter of the 16th February sets forth. Except this one letter from the Allahabad Committee, which I have faithfully reproduced, no single dissentient voice has, so far as I know, been raised.

It would seem that educated Indians throughout the country accept as facts the most widespread Poverty, Misery, Semi-starvation, and Discontent, and yet, for the most part, they sit silent and passive, making no real efforts to avert the inevitable consequences of such a lamentable state of affairs. I call upon each and all as honest men and loyal citizens to do their duty by themselves, their country and their Government, by firmly, openly, and persistently pressing on the notice of all Europeans, official and non-official, with whom they are brought in contact, or whose ears they can in any way reach, a correct view of the present state of the country.

In the introduction to the forthcoming Congress Report, I, in consultation with Mr. Bonnerjee, have endeavoured to put the matter clearly, and if hundreds of thousands of voices throughout India endorse and support, by local instances, our general propositions, it may be that even now the Government may be persuaded to listen.

I know that many of you cannot quite say all that you know or suspect, that you must make allowance for human frailty, and so put things as to enlighten without exasperating, but you can all say quite enough to give the authorities ample reason for reconsidering the entire position, and if merely through a selfish timidity or ignoble dread of awakening official hostility by calling attention to unwelcome facts you as a body refuse to play your parts like men, I declare that you will become as immediately responsible for any untoward consequences that may ensue as will be the Government itself.---A. O. H.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Rheumatism, Neuralgia.—It is sometimes difficult to determine which of these diseases is afflicting the sufferer, but this ignorance will not matter if Holloway's remedies be used. They alleviate and cure all muscular and nervous pains. In hereditary rheumatism, after bathing the affected parts with warm salt water, Holloway's Ointment should be well rubbed upon the spot, that it may penetrate and exert its soothing and regulating properties on the deeper vessels and nerves which are unduly excited, and cause both the pain and swelling. Holloway's treatment has the merit of removing the disease without debilitating the constitution, which was the inevitable result of the bleeding, mercury, and colchicum practice formerly adopted in these complaints.

VISIONS OF THE PAST.

(A FRAGMENT.)

BY THE LATE MICHAEL M. S. DUTT,

author of "The Captive Ladie," "Meghnathvada" (Bengali epic), &c., &c.

IV.

I said I saw two beings in that bow'r
Pent in each other's arms in balmy rest—
Was it a dream?—Or didst thou wing me back—
Fancy!—thou aery visitant and sweet!
Through the dim waste of ages—wild and vast—
The sepulchre of Empires and of men—
Of things that were—whose mournful eloquence
In deep—sad—solemn accents tell the tale
Of Time's proud triumph over all below!
Oh!—didst thou wing me back to loveliest scenes
Primæval,—when Creation brightly steep'd
In sunny glory smiled as the fair brow
Of Virgin pure—unclouded—when the blight
Of sin—like the vast shadow of some cloud
Dark-wing'd and brooding o'er a sun-lit spot—
Dimm'd not the spring-ting'd beauty of her cheek—
When the young Earth shone as the image fair
Of Heaven—glass'd on blue ether—joyously—
When the great father of mankind arose
God-like in Majesty—and look'd around
On his proud heritage—a wondrous world
And multitudinous—and clad in light—
And Woman bloom'd in Love's bright halo wreath'd,
And innocence—sweet beauty's sweetest gift!—

V.

I said I saw two beings in that bow'r,
Pent in each other's arms in balmy rest,
In bliss without alloy—the birth-right then
Of Man—when he in scathless beauty won Heaven's brightest smiles—and cloudless—glorious boon!
'Twas night—and all around the vast expanse
Star-lit and bright—was hush'd to list in joy
Ineffable—in joy whose depth alone
Silence interprets—hush'd in joy to list
To melody which swell'd and sunk again
To softest cadence—for from grove and bow'r
It came—a fairy spirit—came and went
In wanton play :—and myriads too were there
Of beings refulgent—children fair they seem'd
Of some far planet where with dewy locks
Morn smiles—A realm of light and cloudless ray :
But there was one amidst that sunny throng—
And there he came as some dark visag'd cloud
Careering on in gloomy majesty—
Which dim'd the tranquil smile of every star

And wings its lightless path along the sky ;—
A form of awe he was—and yet he seem'd
A sepulchre of beauty—faded—gone—
Mould'ring—where memory, fond mourner, keeps
Her lonesome vigils sad—to chronicle
The past—and tell its tale to coming years!—
Or—like a giant tree in mighty war
With Storm, on whirlwind car and fierce array,
Blasted—and crush'd—of all its pride bereft—
Or like a barque which oft had walk'd the deep,
In queen-like Majesty—and proudly brave,
But by the fiery hand of some dread fiend,
Nurs'd in the starless caves of Ocean, shorn
Of all its beauty on the boundless surge—
A phantom of departed splendour—lone!
I trembled—and methought each beaming brow
Of those aerial entities which throng'd,
Above—around—pal'd at his dread approach :
He came, and as he near'd the blooming bow'r,
Of that bright pair—I saw the light which beam'd,
And wove soft haloes 'round all sudden fade—
As when dim Twilight—sable-rob'd and slow,
Doth frown away the gladsome smile of gold
From Day and sadden Nature all around :—
There was a stir—as if a thousand wings,
Cleft the deep air in hurried flight—I look'd—
All—all had fled—the beings which erst had throng'd
Around—so beautiful and starry-wreath'd
Of softest sheen and lovely—all had fled!
There was a hush—and melody which came,
Soft undulating on the viewless wing
Of every breeze from grove and bow'r, now sunk
To low-breath'd wails—such as the pilgrim hears—
The pilgrim of the midnight deep—the dirge
Of spirit disenthral'd from bond of clay—
Its plaintive dirge, Love! o'er thy watery grave!
The Moon was pale—and all that fairy scene
Swift faded from before me : shadows vast Now curtained all around in misty trance—
I wept—and knew not why—yet wept again!

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Indian Press is yet in its infancy, and Indian life is comparatively poor and barren. So we have not yet evolved an Agony Column. But we are within a measurable distance of doing so. When that time comes, our Times will be not the Englishman or the Pioneer, but the Statesman. Already, there has appeared in the first page of the last named daily a paid notice which is without parallel in the annals of journalism. We refer to the advertisement in the Statesman under the signature "A Resident (confidential)," in which the advertiser bears high testimony to the abilities of the Sub-Inspector of a particular Police station in the Hooghly District, and advises Government to "keep the Sub-Inspector permanently located there for some time to come."

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, and other means are considered liable to cause confusion.

A COPY of the Orthodox Hindu Union, Vol. I, No. 3, dated Madras, 18th January 1892, addressed to "Editor, Reis and Rayyet, Bangalore," was delivered at this office on Sunday, the 27th March 1892. From the post marks, it appears that the copy was posted at Madras on February 1, and received at Bangalore on February 2. Thence it travelled to Simla, reaching that place on Feb. 8. It was returned to the Lahore D. L. O. on March 3 and was detained there till March 24. Thence it was sent down to Calcutta, reaching the local post office on March 27. Shall we say, such is fame! Such, at any rate, is our P. O.

A NEW sage has turned up in the West, whose aphorisms are passing current. "Five words," says Pierson, "describe the biography of woman in Eastern lands: unwelcome at birth, untaught in childhood, uncherished in widowhood, unprotected in old age, unlamented when dead." Shubash, Mr. Pierson! But your form of expression may be easily turned the other way, mutatis mutandis. That elaborate structure has even less foundation than the usual run of hyperboles.

"IN France there are 28,000 peasant schools in which are taught garden and fruit culture through state aid." While such is the practical turn given to agricultural education in Gaul, the education given to the lower classes of the people in British India, is a mere varnish of liberality which makes them discontented with their lot.

THE Madras High Court Long Vacation commences from May 9 and ends with July 9.

HERETO a steamer left Tuticoin only once a week for Colombo. Now steamers will leave three times a week. Nearly the whole of the correspondence passing between our continent and the neighbouring island will be transmitted by that route, and the mail service considerably accelerated.

ON the 6th instant, the Bombay Municipal Commissioners met to elect their Chairman. Mr. Javarlal Umia Sankar Jagnik, of the local bar, a gentleman of high ability and character—was unanimously accepted as a fit successor to Mr. G. Cotton. The corporation then elected eight members for the standing committee, of whom four are Hindoos, three Parsees, and one Goanese.

BABU DURGA PRASAD, Banker and Zemindar, Gaya Town, has offered "to contribute Rs. 10,000 only towards the Gaya Branch of Lady Dufferin's Fund." He begs that "this humble contribution be accepted in the name of my much loved mother, to perpetuate whose memory a ward may be called Panitra Ward after her name." The Government has accepted the offer and thanked the Babu for his liberality and public spirit.

DR. Kenneth McLeod, Professor of Surgery, Calcutta Medical College, about to retire, has endorsed over to Government 5 per cent. debentures amounting to Rs. 2,500 for a scholarship of Rs. 10 a month, tenable in the Bengal Veterinary Institution to be opened. The Doctor desires it to be called "The Sheo Baksh Bagla Veterinary Scholarship" "in recognition of that gentleman's liberality in connection with the establishment of the first Veterinary school and Hospital in Bengal." It is a condition of the scholarship that in awarding it, preference should be given to an inhabitant of the district of Jessore. It is said that this partiality for Jessore is due to the prevalence of murrain in that district.

SHRIMANT Sheik Ajmodin, Jagirdar of Wai, died at Poona in his residence in Vetal Peth, leaving his father and two widows to fight over his dead body. It was buried in the Bara Inaam Musjid preliminary to removal six months after to the family cemetery at Wai. Before the period expired, the father and the widows fell out as to the right of removal. The matter went to court and Mr. Plunkett, the City Magistrate, advised them to make up as all of them were equally interested as rightful heirs, and that he had no jurisdiction. The parties, without agreeing to perform the joint ceremony, took no steps for a time for the final translation of the body. Recently, without any notice to the father, the two widows had the body exhumed and carried to Wai. He, however, coming to know of it, took measures against the burial at Wai, and charged the persons engaged in the affair with theft and clandestine disposal of the dead body.

Mr. Plunkett acquitted the accused, and again advised the parties to make an amicable settlement.

ALBERT STOHP—a non-commissioned officer in the German army—aged 26, was indicted at the Central Criminal Court for indecent assault on Annie Maria Wilcox, of nineteen years of age, residing at Bainsbury, employed at Messrs. Hughes', manufacturers. Stohp had called at the warehouse to see the principal on business, but he happening to be out, the German entered into a conversation with the girl and offered to take her to the theatre. Thus grown familiar, he kissed her and took other liberties. The Jury found him guilty. In mitigation of sentence, it was pleaded for the defence that the prisoner was ignorant of the English law. On this the Commissioner Kerr: "I am told the Germans are considered a very moral nation, but if they act as this man did they must be a race of hypocrites." He then sentenced Stohp to nine months' hard labour.

A WORSE report of judicial rigour towards a more serious offender follows. Ernest Charles Skinner, pianoforte maker, was sentenced to eighteen months' hard labour for indecent assault on his step-daughter of fourteen. It was stated that he was intimate with her since she was thirteen. He had been bound over for assaulting the mother of the girl.

THE Revd. A. Clifford, M. A., replaces the Revd. K. S. Macdonald, D.D., during his absence in Europe, on the Central Text-Book Committee. It is time, though, that the Committee should be thoroughly revised and recast.

SIR Alfred Croft has gone on furlough and Mr. Charles H. Tawney officiates as Director of Public Instruction in Bengal.

THE results of the last University examinations are being Gazetted. The medical Tests come first. 32 candidates have passed the Preliminary Scientific L.M.S. In the First L.M.S., occur 22 names and in the Second L.M.S. 19.

In the Entrance Examination, excepting the Patna Circle, the preliminary lists circulated to schools shew poor results, specially for the Calcutta institutions.

IN the districts of the Orissa Division, the limit of possession of unlicensed Garjhát gánja has been fixed at 5 tolas. A most improper harshness which will defeat itself.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Sultan's firman investing Prince Abbas as Khedive of Egypt was, after all, read on the 14th April. A telegram was also read conferring on him the administration of the Province of Sinai. It now appears that Great Britain declined to agree to the territorial rights of Egypt being impaired in any way unless the telegram about Sinai was read simultaneously with the firman.

In the House of Commons, on the 11th, Mr. Goschen presented his budget for the current year. The revenue is estimated at £90,477,000 and the expenditure at £90,253,000, with a surplus of £1,067,000, which is not considered sufficient for any remission of taxation, except a small reduction in patent fees and a fixing of a uniform duty of two shillings on sparkling wines.

There is a reduction of £50,000 which is to be in the annual Government payment to the Bank of England.

The Suez Canal shares are calculated to yield £625,000.

The consumption of tea and tobacco has increased four and half per cent.

The State grant to education is over one millions sterling.

Since 1887, the expenditure on naval defences has been nearly fourteen millions, of which only five millions represent borrowed capital. An earlier telegram speaks of nearly five millions only expended since 1887 in naval defence and that one million will be borrowed this year.

AT the University Boat Race, on the 9th, Oxford beat Cambridge by two lengths. The two old seats of higher training are much on a par in this British Olympic game, with a slight advantage in favour of the older academy. Oxford has continued uninterruptedly the winner since 1890. The complete record covers a period of 45 years, during which there was one dead head and Cambridge won 20 times and Oxford 25. From 1861 to 1869, it was one long stretch for Oxford and from 1871 to 1876 for Cambridge.

THE closure of cotton mills in Lancashire was to have been commenced on the 14th and completed on the 15th.

IT is announced that Mrs. Osborne of the Pearl fame will be released from jail in a fortnight, owing to her delicate state of health. The pearls themselves, we read, were to be sold on the 28th March, at Messrs. Christie's Rooms, King Street, St. James's, as "the property of Major Hargreave, of Shurley, Torquay," and consisting of "a pair of top and drop brilliant earrings, each with a large pearl-shaped brilliant below and two smaller brilliants above; and a set of three pearl pendants with brilliant caps."

THE state of siege lately proclaimed at Rio de Janeiro, owing to the discovery of a plot to reinstate Fonseca, has been withdrawn. The province of Matto Grosso, with an area of nearly seven hundred thousand square miles, has seceded from the Brazilian Federation.

THE agricultural situation continues unaltered in the South. The scattered and imperfect showers of last week in the Coimbatore, Bellary, and Salem districts, have not affected the general prospects. The cattle are in a sad plight and perishing, specially in Bellary, Anantapur, and North Arcot. Prices of grain generally maintain the previous quotations. But the number of relief works has been increasing largely from last week.

THE little war on the Cashmere frontier which commenced with the rise of Hunza and Nagar against Cashmere, having with perfect success to British aid, shall we say, Cashmere arms, terminated by the end of the last year, the Government of India in a despatch dated the 6th January sent the India Office a complete account of the transactions and operations. The demonstrations of the Rajas of Hunza and Nagar against the Cashmere fortress of Chalt, were promptly answered by the advance of Colonel Durand with a small force from Gilgit, followed in quick succession by the storming of the fort of Nilt, on the Southern bank of Hunza, and the entry of troops, British and Cashmeri, into Hunza and Nagar. Safdar Ali Khan of Hunza and Uz Khan, the son of the Nagar Chief, fled, but the Raja of Nagar submitted. The people are reported to show the best disposition, and they probably feel the responsibility of provoking the British Power, however disposed they might be to trouble the Maharaja of Cashmere. Still so long as the two leading fugitives are at large, it were premature to expect a permanent quiet.

PEACE having been restored on the extreme North-West frontier, there has been a miniature Durbaring at Gilgit by way of a finishing—for the moment. On the 25th March, the British Agent, Colonel Durand, formally received the homage of the frontier chiefs. There were present Mahomed Nazim Khan, Raja of Hunza; Wazir Inayat Khan, Agent of the Mehtar of Chitral; Raja Afyat Khan, of Punjab; Raja Shere Ghazab, ex-Raja of Yasin; Raja Kamal Khan, son of Nagar; Raja Mahomed Aziz Beg from Chitral; Wazir Mazhar Hyat, Agent of Sirdar Afzul-ul-Mulk of Chitral, and some other lesser Rajas or their representatives and officials from neighbouring States, all together numbering some twenty-five. Major Kaleh Khan, Governor of Gilgit, sat on Colonel Durand's right, and General Suram Chund on his left, while the European officers of the Agency and with the Gilgit Field Force in a semi-circle behind. Through a Guard-of-honour the British Agent entered the durbar at four in the afternoon under a salute of eleven guns. The durbars were now presented one by one, and offered nuzzars, which were merely touched. The Colonel addressed the assembly in Hindustani. After welcoming the Chiefs and representatives, he reminded them how last year he had painfully warned them of what would be the result should they be inclined to mischief. Notwithstanding, the Rajas of Hunza and Nagar had been so misguided as to defy the British Government. They had been guilty of waging war against the British Raj, and they are now fugitives, and the Hunza Raja a prisoner in the hands of our friends the Chinese. The refractory States have already felt the heavy hand and now they were experiencing the mercy of British Power. Those who had been obliged by war to leave the country had been invited to return and resume their occupations, and were doing so. The reign of oppression was over. As for the loss the people had sustained, it was entirely due to the late Rajas, who, not content with warring against the troops sent to punish them, had destroyed their own villages and grain by firing them when flying away. Mahomed Nasim Khan, half-brother of Saftar Ali Khan, author and chief ringleader of the disturbances, has been placed on the throne of Hunza, and Jaffir Khan, former ruler of Nagar, who did not take an active part in the opposition to our troops, has been reinstated.

A COLOSSAL claim has been just adjudicated upon at Tanna by Mr. C. E. G. Crawford, the District Judge, with Messrs. C. E. Kane and de Monte, Assessors. The heirs of the late Mr. Framjee Cowasjee, owner of the Pawai estate, claimed under the Land Acquisition Act, Rs. 36,00,000 for land, etc., taken up by the Government for the Pawai Waterworks. The Collector tendered for all rights to the land, and all its contents, Rs. 1,25,173-6-4½. The case occupied the District Court off and on for twenty-three days. A great many men, experts and others were examined on both sides. The Assessor for the Collector, Mr. Kane, considered the Collector's tender ample, and he awarded accordingly. The assessor for the claimants thought the amount ridiculously low. The Judge came to the same conclusion as Mr. Kane, and decided that the Collector had made an adequate tender. Thus the golden dream is dissipated at length. Where the Judge agrees with one of the Assessors as to the amount of compensation, there is no appeal under the Land Acquisition Act. The decision is final—unless some lawyer, more gifted than others, can make night of daylight.

THE Bengal Government has started a sort of Press Commissionership to pamper the vanity of the members of the Native Press Association smuggled into existence during the prosecution of the Bangabasi for sedition. The Association had, according to its recognised exponents, asked that "perhaps it might be convenient for Government to entrust the work of furnishing the Association through its recognized representative with such information as it may be considered desirable to circulate by means of the Native Press, to a special officer connected with the Secretariat, with whom the representative of the Association could be in such communication as might be a matter of subsequent arrangement. Information obtained by the Association in this manner would be communicated by them as speedily as possible to all members of the Association." Gracious Sir Charles Elliott heard the modest prayer of the devotees, and has charged Mr. Risley with the additional duty. The other day, he held a conference with the representatives of the Hindoo Patriot, the Bengalce, Hope, the Bangabasi and the Sanjibani, all of Calcutta. Whatever the ultimate fate of the Association, Mr. Risley, himself pleased with this fresh mark of favor of his Chief, sent away these members of the guild highly satisfied at the success of their enterprise. The new office, while it enables Mr. Risley to interfere with the work of the other Secretaries, will be of as little benefit to the public as possible. The abolition of the Imperial Press Commissionership was generally hailed by the Press in India, both native and European. It was hardly of any use to the press or the public. As a public body, the Native Press Association of Calcutta must be very easily satisfied, whatever may be its triumph as a trades-union.

DURING the debate on the Court of Wards Act, 1879, (B. C.) Amendment Bill, in the Supreme Legislative Council, on the 25th March, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal gave an undertaking that the certificate system shall not be abused in realizing rents due to Wards estates. As good as his word, Sir Charles Elliott has issued orders that "As soon as an estate comes before the Court of Wards, the first duty of the Court shall be to carry out the provisions of section 101 and the following sections of the Bengal Tenancy Act, VIII of 1885, to make a settlement of the estate, that is, to have a field measurement made and a complete record of rights prepared. Until such a record of rights is made, and every dispute between landlord and rayyet is decided, and a clear account has been prepared showing exactly what each man holds, what his tenure is, and what the demand from him is, no certificate is to be issued for any unpaid arrears of that demand. Until such measures have been adopted, the Manager of the estate is not to be permitted to use the certificate procedure, but must go on collecting only undisputed rents, or have recourse to the ordinary law."

Cadastral Survey seems to be the present panacea for all evils. Sir Charles Elliott suspends the certificate system in its favor. He will be prepared, as he said in his reply to the Bhagalpur addresses to be found elsewhere, to grant this quick process for recovery of dues to Zemindars provided they accept the Survey.

THE widows and children of Maharaja Kula Chundra Sing and Tikendrajit Sing arrived at Sylhet, on Wednesday, the 30th March last. There they are consigned for ever, we suppose, to remain under Police surveillance, of course. Not a bad selection of a residence. Brindaban would have been too far a home. Although a shrine it would have virtually been a Botany Bay. Sylhet too is holy ground. It was the family home of Chaitanya, the man god of adoration of the Neo-Vaishnavas to which the Manipuris belong. In Sylhet the expelled ladies and children of the reigning family of Manipur will be among Manipuris in abundance, and in hailing distance as it were of their old home and in touch with their people. So far so good. But the provision for the poor family is questionable. If we are to believe the statement made by the Parimazaka, a vernacular hedomadal of that city, Major Maxwell, the Manipur Political Resident, has fixed a monthly allowance of Rs. 3 for each of the three widows and three children left by Maharaja Kula Chandra Sing, and the Senapati. The statement made by our contemporary seems to be absurd on the face of it, and the Supreme Government would do well to vouchsafe to the public the exact information on the subject.

THE Puri Municipal Commissioners took the advice of the Lieutenant-Governor in good part. The Chairman Babu Nityanand Das resigned and they elected the Civil Surgeon Dr. G. J. H. Bell, in his place as desired by Sir Charles Elliott. This is a complete answer to such of the native Press as raised a cry on Sir Charles Elliott's reply to the Puri municipal address during his visit to that holy city. At the same time, it shows that Municipal Commissioners and their elected chairmen, unless hounded on by reckless professional demagogues and disturbers, are not disposed to push matters to extremes, but prepared to meet the wishes of Government in matters affecting public interests. It may be urged too as an argument against Government assuming more powers than already provided for for controlling mofussil municipalities.

FRESH milk is a microbe-killer—such is the discovery of recent years. The experiment was once performed in France and communicated to the Academy of Science. It has lately been repeated, with the following result obtained by Dr. Freudenreich and published in the "Annales de Micrographie." In fresh cow's milk, the cholera microbe dies in an hour, while the bacillus of typhoid fever lasts twenty-four hours. Both these kinds of bacilli are killed within five hours in fresh goat's milk. Milk kept at a temperature of 131°F. loses its power to kill microbes, in an hour, and becomes weaker the older it gets. Cow's milk after four days and goat's milk after five days have no power to destroy the microbes. All this involves an odd, not to say rather ugly, surprise. All of a sudden, the common teaching of boiling milk for purification, is condemned. What, then, in the face of this experiment, are we to do? The prospect is specially bad for us of the East and the South. In a hot country like ours, where the temperature varies generally from 90 to 106 during the day time, there is a greater chance of milk losing its power of destroying the microbes than in the colder climates. It is all very fine for these experts and investigators to demolish one another's pretensions and discredit one another's experiments and conclusions, but it is confounding and highly inconvenient to the laity. The only consolation that we can offer the general public under the circumstances is that, so far as we can judge, the science of bacilli is yet in a tentative, theoretic stage. The experts and experimenters are still groping in the dark. No final deliverance has come to the world as yet. So we all better stick to the established teaching and our individual experiences.

THERE is a good anecdote in connection with Sir Henry Isaacs, the plutocrat of the City, who has been committed. He is a fine musician, both singing and composing well. In 1862, he composed an ode on the death of Prince Albert. Still better known is his maturer production, the "Lone Star." It appears that Sir Joseph Chitty is also an excellent musician. The learned Judge and the distinguished fruit-broker admired each other. In 1889, Isaacs was Sheriff and on the occasion of the Jubilee got himself knighted. It was about that time that Isaacs composed his "Lone Star." He sent a copy of it to Sir Joseph Chitty, who, in acknowledging it, said that, in his humble opinion, "the publication of an original song by a Sheriff of the City of London is an undoubted sign of the progress we are making in civilization."

THE method of electric execution in New York is no longer a secret. The reporters were formerly kept out of the field, but by combined agitation the newspapers succeeded in having the law altered. Of one of the latest executions, the press have given a grimly sensational description. The victim is fastened in the chair, the priest with his prayer book stands on one side, the chief executioner and a physician on the other. There are two methods of contact—one from the top of the head to the leg, and the other from the hands to the head. The hands or the feet are placed in a solution of salt before the currents are passed. In this instance, the currents were passed through the hands. The victim gave out a loud wailing and struggling sound, and then presented the appearance of a man in dreadful fright choked to death. "Let her go!" were his last words. A powerful convulsive movement as if to burst the bands, followed. It was a hideous picture. The chest arched out and the face contracted on one side expressing severe agony. The legs tugged at the straps and one foot was drawn up sideways. The lips opening disclosed the teeth tightly clenched. After fifty seconds, the current was turned off, the chest slowly collapsed, giving out a coughing gasping sound, while saliva from the lips ran down the chin. The current was then turned the other way, and almost similar convulsive movements followed, presenting another cruel picture.

After thirty-eight seconds this current was stopped, and the man was pronounced dead. The chief executioner then expressed his opinion that the consciousness of his victim was lost at the moment the first shock reached him, and asked the opinion of other physicians present. One of them, while agreeing in the fact of loss of consciousness at the first shock, disagreed as to the test of it. Thus ended the horrible scene of "electrocution," to be abhorred and shunned of most men of feeling. It is a real American business at best, more worthy of scalpers and adepts in tar and feathering than of humane men.

THE order of the Lieutenant-Governor regarding the quick discharge of witnesses and disposal of cases, is telling terribly upon the Mahomedans in this their fasting month. In almost all the Eastern and Northern Bengal Districts, the parties, witnesses and some of the legal practitioners, are Musalmans, and one can understand what must be their condition when they are forced to stop in court till 7 or 8 P.M., or even up to 6 P.M. which is nearly the time for breaking the fast. They come from distances of miles and, after the whole day's fast in this hot weather, can hardly get sufficient water to wash themselves or to drink, not to speak of eating. What a trying and difficult religious ordeal the Ramadan fasting is and how strictly millions upon millions of Mahomedans adhere to it up to this time and how zealous they are about it. Such religious observances must command the respect of every thoughtful Government, and were the matter brought to his notice it would surely receive due consideration from Sir Charles Elliott. Mahomedan officers also deserve consideration. After a whole day's fast, they take a glass of sherbet in court and then sit till 7 or 8 P.M. to decide cases. It would be simply cruel to put a Rosádar at 6 or 7 in the evening in the witness box and cross-examine him. Superhuman power alone can stand it. But Mahomedans are not superhuman, even after the purification of a religious fast, and the officers as well as the parties and witnesses of the faith are entitled to receive that indulgence which humanity allows. Besides fasting, the Mahomedans have to perform prayers at night and to attend the special prayer of Travik, at which they have to stand for one or two hours in the mosque without any punkah.

We hear, being afraid of the present order, some experienced, old, and most religious Mahomedan officers have taken privilege leave, in order to fast quietly at home and perform their prayers, &c., punctually. Unless the order is modified, every year, this difficulty will arise and its political effect upon the feelings of the people will not be at all good.

A CORRESPONDENT from Bauleah, under date April 12, writes:—

Last night we had a very heavy shower of rain which has cooled the atmosphere, improved the prospects of the cultivation and removed to some extent the fear of an impending scarcity or famine in this district. The report of the Indian Daily News's correspondent about the hailstorm is very exaggerated and the alleged great damage done to the jail imaginary. Last evening I enquired of a jail visitor and he said that some roofs of the tiled sheds and thatched ones were damaged—but it was not to that extent as described by the above correspondent. The actual damages done would be at the highest to the extent of some Rs. 450 or Rs. 500.

The students of the Rajshahi College are getting a bad name for riotous conduct in the Bazars and for oppressing the peaceful inhabitants. The other day, they ransacked and plundered the shop of an old Jew, named Cohen, looted his articles worth Rs. 100, and broke his glass case and other things, and when he complained to the proper school authorities, some of the boys revenged themselves upon him by a brutal assault. He then went to the magistrate who was much annoyed to hear of such conduct in the students. He proceeded to take action, but some good people interfered and settled the matter out of court. I hear the Principal of the College has heavily fined the turbulent youngsters and paid Rs. 70 as damages to Cohen. These boys some time ago had assaulted the durwan of the Bara kothi of Messrs. Watson & Co., but the matter was dropped owing to kind offices of friends. Some ten of them kicked up a row one day in Sahab Bazar with some Dacca tobacco sellers (Mahomedans) and assaulted one of their boys in the shop. These men gave a sound thrashing to their obstreperous invaders, who, receiving severe injuries in the conflict, fled from the Bazar and never visited it again.

The scene of another disturbance, I hear, was on board the flat which was at anchor at the steamer ghaut here, when they assaulted some officers belonging to the flat at the office of the steamer and misbehaved themselves in more than one way, the details of which are not at all pleasant. They also, I am told, misbehaved themselves towards an innocent lady who was driving alone in a hackney carriage in the town, and threw clods of mud on her garment. Stringent measures should be adopted by the authorities to check this sort of misconduct on the part of the students. It is said that the students are proud of such misdeeds and think that this is a proof of their martial spirit and proficiency in physical exercise and will probably help them in their enlistment to the black volunteer regiment which may be formed on some future date. It is only lucky for them that they commit cowardly assaults upon undefended and weak persons in places like this, where the population is so quiet and peaceful. Once let them come in contact with the lower classes, the Mahomedan population of the large towns, and they will rue the day when they invited an encounter. They will then learn a lesson which will not be forgotten at least in one generation. We earnestly invite Bhai P. C. Muzumdar to our town to lecture on the higher moral training of young men. I cannot understand what sort of influence is exercised by the teachers upon their pupils. Cannot they improve the character of their students?

There is a rumour that the notorious man-eater has been killed by Mr. Price, but no authoritative report as yet.

THE Calcutta Gazette of the week notifies the removal, by the Lieutenant-Governor on the recommendation of the Commissioners, of Munshi Mahboob Hossain, an elected Commissioner, Baraset Municipality, from the Municipal Board, for disgraceful conduct. What is the disgraceful conduct for which the Munshi suffers? The wording of the law is too vague. "The Local Government may, if it thinks fit, on the recommendation of the Commissioners at a meeting, remove any Commissioner appointed or elected under this Act, if such Commissioner shall have been guilty of misconduct in the discharge of his duties, or of any disgraceful conduct." The penalty is not confined to misconduct as a Commissioner but, as was explained by the Advocate-General during the passage of the Bill in Council, applies to "conduct unbecoming the position of a Commissioner." Vague still!

What is the position of a Commissioner? That is not yet such an ascertained quantity or quality as to be incapable of any doubtful interpretation. It is ultimately left to Government to decide, as cases arise, whether or not any conduct of a particular Commissioner amounts to conduct unbecoming the position of a Commissioner. But surely the Government ought not to be left to form its ipse dixit without the help of fixed rules.

The wording has obviously been framed on the model of the well-known phrase "unbecoming an officer and a gentleman." But is it possible that the legislature regards a position which is obtainable by persistent devotion to cabmen and grocers, one of equal dignity with the status of a holder of Her Majesty's Commission in the army? Be that as it may, it was time that there should be a provision in the law for removing members of the Calcutta Corporation.

WITH the spread of civilization, we are in danger on every side. Even the buttons we wear are some of them capable of blowing us up. Professor Vernon Boys, after actual experiment, has given out this alarm. A lady standing near a bright, but not blazing, fire found herself in danger of catching it and was with great difficulty rescued. This led to an enquiry, and it was discovered that a large fancy button had disappeared from its place when the fire originated. The definite result of the inflammability of such buttons was obtained by experimenting on similar ones, which on igniting gave out the smell of camphor. A spurious amber mouthpiece in a tobacco pipe ignited on a light being accidentally applied. Most of the ivory and tortoise-shell combs and hair pins, amber mouthpieces and even billiard balls, are made of this spurious manufacture. They are made by dissolving 50 parts of gun cotton in a mixture of 100 parts of ether and 25 of camphor. After evaporation, the plasticity is obtained. But polish cannot be given without exposing the articles well in the air. As a simple test, by briskly rubbing them a smell of camphor is given out. If this fails, a portion may be ignited, when unmistakable camphor fumes expose the spuriousness.

MR. Sala is unusually interesting this week in the Englishman. He gives a characteristic anecdote of the fattest Gossainji in all England. The Archbishop of Canterbury, after a recent inspection of a Metropolitan Workhouse having remarked in the visitors' book that, although he found the place warm and well aired and comfortable throughout, he would have been glad to discover that additional means had been found for providing occupation or recreation for the aged paupers, Mr. Sala exclaims:—

"Simple-minded Primate of all England! Unsophisticated Dr. Benson! Evidently the self-sacrificing tenant for life of Lambeth Palace knows nothing of the delights, when one is old and broken and jaded, of doing nothing. A London cab horse, whose master does not go out on Sunday, is aware of such bliss, but it is beyond, I should say, the ken of an Archbishop."

That reminds us of the alderman who to the explanation of a poor man accused of theft that he had only eaten some turnips in the complainant's garden for hunger, exclaimed, Hunger, for sooth! I would give ten pounds to know what hunger is.

BY far his most important contribution is a personal reminiscence:—

"In September, 1870, I was staying at the Grand Hotel. It was after Sedan, and the Second Empire was crumbling to its fall. The people were half demented with rage and terror and the people had 'espionnage' on the brain. Late on the night of the 3rd, at the Café du Helder, I was arrested as a Prussian spy, dragged from police-station to police-station; flung into a den full of malefactors of the vilest description, who jumped upon me and battered me with wooden sabots; and at about six in the morning I was incarcerated in a solitary cell at the Dépôt de la Préfecture, formally charged as 'un espion Prussien.' I was in evening dress, and 'smothered in blood.'"

"In one respect I was luckier than the Messrs. Purdie. My captors had been so intent on trying to murder me that they had forgotten to rob me; and I had some pieces of gold and my cardcase with me, safe. The British Ambassador at Paris was then that excellent, high-minded and kindly nobleman, the late Lord Lyons, whom I had known for some years. 'Twas to Lord Palmerston that I first owed the honour of acquaintanceship with him. I wrote on a visiting card the Ambassador's name with these words: 'In prison as a Prussian spy. For God's sake, get me out.' This card I gave to the warder with a couple of Napoleons, and entreated him to forward the missive to its destination. He took the card, promising to send it; but he refused to take the money, stating that he was an old soldier, who had fought at Inkermann and could sympathise with des braves gens who were passing un mauvais quart d'heure.

"Lord Lyons was at church when my card was brought to him. He at once despatched one of the gentlemen of the Embassy, Mr. De Saumarez, to the Dépôt to assure the Prefect of Police, M. Pietri, that I was no more a Prussian spy than I was the column in the Place Vendôme. So with many expressions of regret I was released. Now mark. This was at noon on Sunday, the 4th of September. At 2 P.M. the Revolution broke out. At 4 P.M. the Dépôt was stormed by 'the gentlemen of the pavement,' and my liberator, M. Pietri, was flying for his life; and, depend upon it, if the mob had found me in my cell, duly inscribed on the griffe as a Prussian spy, they would most assuredly have murdered me out and out.

"My bedroom window looked upon the sumptuous façade of the then new Grand Opera, the edifice of which bore the imposing inscription 'Académie Impériale de Musique.' On Monday, September 5th, a scaffolding was hastily erected, ascending which a workman proceeded to hack out the word 'Impériale' and substitute for it the word 'Nationale.'"

"And this is the way that public matters are generally managed in France. The letter is changed, but the spirit—the spirit of stupid tyranny and official inquisitorial Buccaneerism remains unaltered. I have known France for more than fifty years. I have been an active witness of these revolutions in Paris—in 1848, 1851, and 1870; but I fail to see that from the time of the deposition of Louis Philippe, the French people have obtained any kind of political rights or franchise whatsoever, beyond that of making a noise at public meetings, and abusing or calumniating public men in the columns of a frothy and frivolous press. They have practically no law of bail or mainprise, or Habeas Corpus Act, or security against arbitrary arrest."

Yes, this is the way they order the matter better in France. And not in France only but all over Europe, except in blessed Britain.

IN the course of a hearing in an undefended suit—Cohen v. Nursing-das Auddy—the Chief Justice remarked:—

"This section (80 of the Civil Procedure Code) is intended for cases in which the writ should be affixed in the way required by the section after a proper attempt has been made to find the defendant. You may go to a man's house, and not find him. That is not attempting to find him. You should go to his house, make enquiries, if necessary follow him. You should make enquiries to find out when he is likely to be at home, and go to the house at a time when he can be found. Before service like this can be effected it must be shown that proper efforts have been made to find out when and where he is likely to be found—not as seems to be done in this country, to go to his house in a perfunctory way, and because he has not been found there, to stick the summons up on his house. I think this affidavit is insufficient, and it is as well that persons should know that such service is not good service, and that actions should not be tried as undefended actions on service such as in this case. A proper attempt must be made to find the defendant and serve him with the writ."—I. D. News, Ap. 8.

Mr. Justice Phear used to be as searching. He would require the strictest proof of service and would see that the absent defendant had full justice done him. But for the very accurate statement in the affidavit in the present suit, the presiding Judge would not have known how the summons was served and would not have been in a position to expound the law. Proof of service of summons is not generally minutely examined in courts, and defendants sometimes come to know too late that a decree has been passed against them. The reform is very much needed in the Small Cause Court. There they fire away decrees when defendants fail to answer to their names when called, without evidencing any particular care to know if it was properly served or the suit rightly brought.

THE WEAKNESSES OF BENGALI HINDUISM.

AN OPPORTUNITY.

INDIA is unquestionably a land of faith and charity. Here, if in anything, is the empire one. Morally as well as physically, the different parts are separated one from another, more or less, sometimes in the highest degree. Geographically isolated as they are from one another, their mutual variance in other matters is still more remarkable. Great as are the diversities separating the millions scattered throughout the country—diversities, ethnic, linguistic, historic, social, and political—they agree in one characteristic—their attitude towards the poor—and the majority of the millions belong, in a general way, to one religion.

In Faith and Hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity.

In Charity as well as in Faith, the bulk of the Indian population are one. Yet even in these the Hindus show surprising disagreement. Not only are the varieties of Faith and religious usages among the Hindus endless, but even in Charity their ways are often conflicting. Charity—that redeeming feature of every ~~Age~~ that pretends to civilization—runs as a silver thread through all the countless and at times grotesque forms of Hinduism. It is a virtue practised, more or less, by Hindus of all denominations throughout the land. But there is no homogeneity in its methods. This difference does not necessarily indicate domestic conflict, yet it is caused according to sectarian variation, and notably according to geographical. Perhaps, ethnology has something to do with it, certainly it is contingent upon the peculiarities of social evolution of the different groups of the Hindu family. Thus, no one who has studied the matter can have failed to notice the many points of difference between the Hindus of this province and the Hindus out of it. Lower Bengal, as it has founded a system of Law of its own and glories in a system of Philosophy of its own, has developed peculiar forms of faith as well as social and religious institutions. The doctrine of the Dayabhaga is something more than a new school of interpretation. It is in direct conflict with the fundamental law recognised throughout Hindudom outside Lower Bengal. The Upper Bengal logical system of Gotama, perfected in down country, is the only Bengali Philosophy. The opposing religious systems of Chaitannaism and Tantrikism are Bengali creations and still flourish most in Bengal. Siva worship is, of course, a necessary complement to Sakti worship, yet there are few professed Saivas in Bengal. It is significant that all the renowned shrines dedicated to the Destroyer and all the endowed monasteries belonging to that worship, are from their foundation in charge of up-countrymen. The priests of not only Deoghar on the Ethnic Frontier but of all the akras even in the heart of Bengali Bengal, are, in a sense, foreigners. Whether at Jaffraganje or Sadakbagh in Moorshedabad—whether at Devagram in Tipperah or at Chundernath in Chittagong—whether at Burdwan or at Tarkeswar—or, indeed, anywhere else—all the monasteries and abbeys are held by Hindustani-speaking monks. Yet, all these religious houses are supported by the endowments and the offerings of Bengalis.

This is a singular phenomenon which has not attracted the notice of our Bengali brethren but which is obviously grave enough to merit the best attention. It is difficult to account for it. Not that the Bengalis are not sufficiently religious. They yield in sincerity of faith to no people professing Hinduism in any of its forms in any part of the continent or of the islands. Bengal is one of the last strongholds of Hinduism. Here it is better understood and better practised generally than in most parts that own its sway. Yet, it is here alone that the people depend upon strangers for the charge of all their great monastic establishments and all their noted Sivite shrines.

Chaitannaism being a modern Bengali form of Vaishnavism as yet in its evolution and developments wholly confined to Bengal Proper, with Bengalis for its only disciples, its shrines and establishments are necessarily in Bengali hands. But though, whole tribes having, for good reasons, adopted it, it already numbers followers by the million, including some of the most prosperous and wealthy castes, it has not yet built any grand temples or endowed any costly foundations. Relying still for its strength on its hold on the masses, it as yet presents but a beggarly appearance, with its religious sheds diversified at best by occasional brick holes. Even the poor monastic sheds of this sect in Nuddea are being laid under contribution by the municipal tax-gatherer, under color of the Pooree Lodging House Act!

The worship of Sakti is prevalent in Bengal and boasts numerous shrines. But it has not founded monastic houses. The result is that there is no provision at our holy places for housing or entertaining guests. This involves a real difficulty. Ordinary pilgrims may shift for themselves, at shops and lodging-houses for payment. But what are fakeers to do? The sadhus and sannyasis have not the wherewithal to pay for board and lodging.

Bengal temples are of the meanest. There are a few noble edifices belonging to private men, but the generality are mere holes with just enough room in each for the divinity to which it is dedicated and a priest or so. The public temples at the people's shrines are scarcely better. Few have any accommodation attached for pilgrims even of the religious order.

This is another peculiarity of Bengali Hinduism, and it is not more creditable to us than the one first noticed. It must be admitted to be a reproach to the people that their religious liberality has wholly avoided the most amiable direction which Hinduism in other parts of the empire has taken. They must submit to the charge of at once niggardliness and a want of consideration for their fellows in faith, including the devotees who have abandoned the world for religion. As, after all, they are not deficient in liberality, they really show a singular absence of the faculty of organization. There is no gleam of statesmanship in religious charity in Bengal.

We are glad to discern at last a sign, in one quarter at laest, that we are awaking to the deficiencies of our religious spirit. If there are no Bengali Mahants, there is in our neighbourhood the making of one. We do not take into account the hundreds of Baboos who, without a "call," or any understanding of the matter, have, for novelty if not worse, assumed the garb of sanctity, whether as Jogees, Brahmacharees, Sannyasis, or any others. There are true renouncers of the world, though, if handful their number. One such is at Kalighat. He is no imposter. His family and antecedents are wellknown, and he has stood the test of observation of years. He presents the spectacle of a prophet honored in his own country, having earned the esteem of his native townsmen and neighbours. Aghornath Swami was originally known as Aghornath Bhattacharjee of Bhowanipore, formerly a clerk in the Public Works Department. Somehow, he got tired of the world and forsook home and kindred and the comforts of life, to repair to the adjacent shrine of Kalighat, where he has worshipped ever since. Living sparsely, on chance offerings, just to keep up enough strength for his devotions, he has been practising Yoga as a Shivite. Whatever his success in this, his character as a holy man has stood the prying of censorious neighbours for almost two decades. For nearly eighteen years, he has made the service of the emblem of Siva of Kalighat, well-known as Nakuleswar, his own. Pilgrims as well as the religiously disposed people of the place, crowd round the holy man, and Jogees and Sannyasis and Sadhus cling to him. But he is unable to accommodate his visitors. His chief regret is on the score of the pilgrims of the religious orders. He supports as many as he can out of the offerings of worshippers, but this is not only an uncertain but also a very meagre income, and there is no shelter. Most of the Sadhus who come for worship, are compelled to go about begging for their very simple wants—to the pain of the Swami of the shrine and the reproach of Bengal's metropolitan Pitasthan. At last, Swami Aghornath has been advised to appeal to the public for means to establish a guest house at Kalighat. A few gentlemen have taken up the matter in hand, among whom we may name Babu Sadanand Banerjee, Honorary Magistrate, Kalighat, Baboo Bireswar Mookerjee, Translator, Foreign Department, Babu Prosunno Kumar Chatterjee, Manager of the late Prince Rahimuddin's estate, and Babu Preo Nath Mullick, Pleader, Alipur, and Municipal Commissioner, Calcutta. Monies received will be acknowledged in Reis and Rayyet and other papers, and be deposited in bank. We trust the appeal will be largely responded to by all Hindus. The Bengalis have at last an opportunity of wiping the disgrace of ages. They should take a pride in founding a religious house under a head of their own—a true Bengali Swami.

THE JUVENILE RAMAYANA.*

BABU Navakrishna Bhattacharya's Shishuranjana Ramayana is an excellent little booklet and we are not surprised to see that it has already passed into a second edition. As its name implies, it is the Ramayana for juvenile entertainment—the Boys' Ramayana in short. It is as good as its title-page. It presents in a nutshell one of the most ancient and interesting traditions of the Indo-Aryans. The Rama Saga is not the same all over Southern and Eastern Asia. The Singhalese, for instance, have a different version from the Continental story. It is different to the extent of shocking the Indians. Thus, among them, the Prince of Ayudhia (Oudh) and his consort are brother and sister, who nevertheless marry one another!

Even in India different versions are current, but their variations never reach anything like that extreme. In the vernaculars the most popular versions in the North are the Hindi Ramayana of Tulsidas and the Bengali version of Kirtibas Pandit, both powerful compositions. There are excellent works on the subject in the popular languages of the West and the South, to which the speakers of those tongues are respectively wedded. They all differ not only in literary treatment but also in many of the incidents in different parts of the narrative. They all professedly draw from Sanskrit originals, but even these are not quite in unison with one another. Valmiki, Bhavabhuti, and Kalidasa and others have each moulded the old tradition according to his genius or the requirements of his plot and characters. The oldest written record of it is in the early part of the Mahabharata—which we regard an earlier authority than the Ramayana. After all, whatever the merits, and they are very high, of the works of the dramatists or the other poets and sages, the Epic of Valmiki is the highest in general regard and the standard authority on the subject, and Baboo Navakrishna Bhattacharya has done well in following it. It has the advantage of giving the whole careers of the national hero and heroine identified with a god and a goddess. Hence the educational value of an abridgment of it for the boyhood and girlhood of the country. So far from being objectionable on the score of morality, the teaching of Valmiki is pure and healthy. In this the old Rishi is far above his compeers in the same field. Baboo Bhattacharya has done his work well. It is interesting to see how he has been able to compress the great story within his few 16 mo. pages. The wonder is that he has not omitted any material incident. At the same time he tells his story with fluency and lucidity. No Hindu can afford to be ignorant of the life of Rama and the history of his invasion of Ceylon, and yet few have the leisure to go through the seven books of Valmiki in original or in translation. Accordingly, this Ramayana jelly will be welcome to many more than the little boys and girls of our schools.

BIRBHUM.

The capital of the District of Birbhum is a small poor town of the same name, 11 miles distant from the East Indian Railway station Sainthia. It has a municipality with a limited income and a population of about 9,000 souls. It was once a very healthy station, so much so as to be considered almost a sanitarium for the invalid and the overworked official, but for the last few years the climate has changed for the worse. Fever of a virulent type and periodic visitations of cholera, have made their influence felt in almost every household. Strangely enough, the municipality has not given the least thought towards the improvement of this state of things. The people used to drink tank-water and kept excellent health. The tanks were then religiously guarded and every precaution was taken to prevent contamination of the water, so precious to life. But with the introduction of Local Self-Government, with an elected Chairman, those happy days have ceased to exist, and the majority of the people now drink water drawn out of wells. So that what with the dirt and filth of the tank water, the weeds allowed to grow within the tanks, the dust of the streets and want of proper sanitary and conservancy measures, it is no wonder that the climate should indicate a change, to say nothing of the malarial poison imported from other quarters.

Suri, as the civil station is called, makes no extensive pretension to visible signs of exuberant luxury, wealth and prosperity. Rice and dal are the staple food of the rich and the poor, with meat and fish for those who can afford the same. It contains no beautiful buildings to call forth the admiration of the artist, but there are tombs, shrines, mosques and temples where the memory of the pious dead is honoured and revered, and proper respects paid by men of every religious persuasion, creed and nationality. Fourteen miles from the town is a place called Rajnagore, a place wellknown in the historical annals of Bengal. It was the seat of the Rajahs, and the ruins are still to be seen. It was originally a Hindu principality, but fell into Moslem hands under circumstances to which tradition attaches a sort of tragic romance. Two brother Afghans served the Rajah. One of them fell in love with the beautiful young queen, and the passion was reciprocated. For a time, the elder brother dissuaded the younger, but who listens to the counsels of even a brother when love holds mastery of mind, body, and soul? The two brothers, who could come to no decision how to act and move in the matter, at last struck upon a plan. It was a murderous plan with ambition for collateral object. They decided to murder the Hindu Rajah, their master. An opportunity was taken when the Rajah, like an orthodox Hindu, was at prayers by the side of the shrine, situate in the middle of a large tank whose ruins may still be seen. The Rajah, however, resisted, drew his sword and, in the midst of the struggle that ensued, the younger brother, the lover of the queen, was cut down, while the Rajah himself fell under the sword of the elder Afghan. This man then ascended the throne, proclaimed himself the Rajah, and thus the Hindu dynasty became extinct. But the queen, the object of all this tragedy, this double and foul murder, coming to know the fates of her lover and of her lord respectively, committed suicide, faithful to her vow. The Mahomedan family ruled for generations extending over a considerable period. It was semi-independent of the Nawabs of Bengal, exercising almost royal rights and prerogatives. The last Rajah was Zahor Zaman Khan, who died some 7 or 8 years ago. He it was who, through lust, debauchery, and sensuality, lost all the property, and his sons, and the sons of a Rajah brought up in affluence, are actually living, in common huts, from hand to mouth, and on occasional begging from door to door.

The estate, at least a good part of it seems to have passed into the hands of the Dewans and amla, menials and cooks. Such is the origin of the flourishing Hindu families like Hetampore. The Hetampore Rajah, not a brilliant man, manages his property through a manager and enjoys the good graces of high European officials, whom he occasionally entertains in right royal style.

Though the first Mahomedan Rajah came to the throne as a treacherous usurper, the family is well known for its charity and works of public utility. It appears that one of the Mahomedan Rajas ordered an accurate survey of the estate. The records preserved in the Collectorate point clearly to the fact that the survey was carried out on a scientific basis and on correct principles. It must be a valuable record, unique and interesting from an administrative point of view.

Rajnagore is still an interesting place to the antiquarian. It has several magnificent edifices and mosques, which, in point of grandeur, beauty, rare workmanship, surpass many a famous Mahomedan building of the Moslem period. Are these, then, mementos of Moslem tyranny and cruelty? Few would endorse the opinion publicly expressed by no less an authority than Sir W. W. Hunter some time ago before his final departure from India. I had occasion to visit the ancient place, and I was struck with its ruins, which are visible all round.

SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT AT BHAGALPUR.

The Lieutenant-Governor made one collective reply to the four several addresses presented to him by the Municipality, the District Board, the Mahomedans, and the residents generally.

THE ACCIDENT.

His Honor said he begged to thank the assembled gentlemen for the very kind and hearty manner in which, in the addresses just read, they had welcomed him on this his first arrival in the town of Bhagalpur, and he wished to assure them how sensible he was of the feelings of loyalty and kindness which had animated their addresses. He wished to take this opportunity of expressing how much he regretted the unforeseen accident of the previous night, by which they had been caused the inconvenience of such a prolonged wait at the railway station. Had there been any expectation of such a possibility, he would most certainly have telegraphed, asking that no one might await his arrival.

THE SCARCITY—NO CAUSE FOR ALARM.

In three out of four addresses reference had been made to the principal object of the present tour, which was, too, the principal thought in the minds of most people, and certainly of all those who were in any way connected with land matters, the prospect of scarcity and famine in this district. He was, therefore, very glad to be able to reassure his hearers that he did not consider the present state one necessitating alarm. He had visited a considerable number of affected parts of the district, and had not seen half a dozen persons all told who appeared to be suffering from hunger, or who were to any degree emaciated. People came to the relief works chiefly because owing to the cessation of work in the fields they had to come and earn sufficient money to buy their food. Most effectual measures had been taken by Mr. Wace, the Collector, to provide ample labour in all places where the people would possibly require it. Those works which had been started were being carried out in a most suitable and sagacious manner, and His Honor wished to congratulate the district on their good fortune in having such a Collector at such a time, a man of such ability and sound judgment, as to know exactly how far to start these relief works or where to limit or close them, and yet avoid any possible harshness or severity. It was a most difficult thing to decide the exact time when works should be lessened or extended, and the district was, indeed, fortunate in having in Mr. Wace an officer of both ability, earnestness and previous experience of famine work.

PRIVATE LIBERALITY.

His Honor said it afforded him great pleasure to be able to announce that the Maharaja of Sonbursa, with his well-known generosity, had offered to Government Rs. 10,000 to be expended on relief works on a road or any other work of utility in the distressed tracts. Babu Janordhan Singh, of Barail, had offered Rs. 900 for gratuitous relief in Supowl. Rani Sitabati offered Rs. 1,000 for the relief of widows and women who could not appear in public. He understood that the Raja of Burwari intended making an offer of which, no doubt, he would soon make known the details. The Raja of Baneli and Kumar Nityananda Singh had intimated their intention of jointly undertaking some improvements on their estates which would serve as relief works and cost Rs. 7,200. Babu Gunput Singh intended starting some similar work, to the value of Rs. 2,000. The Maharaja of Durbhunga had before him a liberal scheme of works as he carried out in 1889, but no orders had yet been given. This His Honor considered a most laudable record of private liberality at a time when most needed, and he begged to congratulate the generous donors on their public-spirited actions.

OFFICIAL TOURS.

In the address from the Municipal Commissioners, the remark that a ruler benefited by a knowledge of those he ruled, had afforded great pleasure, as it agreed so entirely with his own views, and he was glad to find the District Board has spoken in a very similar sense. His Honor said he did not wish anyone to think that tours through different parts of the province were in any way prompted by the least distrust of local officers or fear of being misled by them, but there was such a great advantage in being able to inquire into and discuss local requirements on the spot itself, where far more information could be gained than from any number of written reports. No doubt many of those present had read the admirable terms in which His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, when speaking at the opening of the Tansa Water-works in Bombay, had explained what an advantage it had been to him to be able to discuss the question with the Governor of Bombay. In a smaller way the same remarks applied to a Lieutenant-Governor of a province, and His Honor said that he had constantly found it of the greatest advantage to have a local knowledge, so that he could distinguish and know for himself.

THE LOCAL WATER WORKS.

A reference had been made to the filtered water-supply which this town was fortunate enough to possess, and he congratulated it on being one of the few towns in Bengal which could say the same thing. He hoped, during his stay, to be able to look into the municipal accounts, to see how the funds were allotted and administered, as mention had been made of the maintenance of the Water-works being a heavy charge on their resources. There was to be a new reassessment of the town, by which it was to be hoped a substantial increase to their funds would be secured. Reference had been made to a promise made by a landholder of the Sonthal Pergunnahs to present a large sum for the further extension of the Water-works, but His Honor said he feared he would be hardly justified in entering into that question, as he knew none of the details, and it was not one in which Government could in any way interfere. If any gentleman found himself unable to carry out such a promise he could hardly be expected to do so, but if he had changed his mind in the matter it was for the Commissioners to use what gentle persuasion they could to lead him back to a better way of thinking. Mention had been made of the long period during which the municipal franchise had been enjoyed in Bhagalpur, and it was satisfactory to have reason to believe that the powers had been exercised judiciously and well.

THE PROPOSED MUNICIPAL BILL.

The fact of having to reply to addresses on first arrival at a place before there had been time or opportunity to become acquainted with it was unfortunately unavoidable, but His Honor hoped to be able to see for himself how work had been carried on. When in the address a hope had been expressed that Local Self-Government should receive still further expansion in his hands, His Honor feared it implied that there was some idea he wished to restrict. He could, however, assure his hearers that nothing was further from the thoughts or wishes of the Government, whose only desire was to take such measures and to make such corrections as would enable officers to carry on their work. Wherever it had occurred to himself or his advisers that flaws existed, they proposed making small modifications in the Act to empower Government to step in and make small changes without having to use the drastic measures which under the Act were in its power, and the employment of which would bring much discredit to any Municipality. It was certainly a much severer measure to abolish a municipality than what was now proposed in the modification in the Bill before Government. The proposed alterations had been circulated for their opinions and remarks, and any criticisms would receive full attention.

DISTRICT BOARD FUNDS GOVERNMENT FUNDS.

The District Board had referred to the heavy drain upon their funds in connection with the famine, but they appeared to have made a very full and excellent distribution. It certainly was not desirable that more than they could afford should be diverted from other purposes. The district contained very good roads, which certainly should not be allowed to fall into disrepair. It was also well equipped with kutchra roads, some of them a relic of 1873, and it would be a mistake were anything done that would lessen the benefits they conferred. As far as one could foresee the present distress might continue or possibly somewhat increase during the next two months, but with July the rains should come, bringing with them labour in the fields and wages, and in August they might expect to reap their new crops. Should this be so, the present arrangements of the District Board seemed ample. The District Board had rather a tendency to speak of the funds as their own, but His Honor said he wished to remind them of the solidarity that should exist between themselves and the Government. They were merely a body of public-spirited gentlemen who gave their voluntary assistance to Government and had these funds at their disposal, but the funds actually belonged to Government, and when they spoke of their proposed allotments they were in much the same position as Government when framing its budget. Of late Government had been obliged to withdraw two lacs from other proposals to meet the expenses of the present distress, and to cut down many items.

MAHOMEDAN EDUCATION.

Referring to the Mahomedan address, His Honor said that he was glad to hear so much had been done for education, and that a Medressa had been instituted in a manner suited to the requirements of the day, that the Mahomedan boys might not fall behind the rest, and be able to hold their own in competition. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, in the North-West Provinces, had set them an example which but few could follow closely, but which many nowadays were striving to do, and every effort made to establish and carry on a system of education for Mahomedans on Mahomedan principles was deserving of Government encouragement. The Mahomedan gentlemen of this place were to be congratulated on what they were doing, and would receive such assistance as was fair and just. The request for aid from the Mohsin Fund seemed reasonable, and though the annual fixed sum had for this year been all allotted, no doubt the Director of Public Instruction would be willing to consider fully their claim when distributing the grants for next year.

THE CADASTRAL SURVEY—AN EXPLANATION.

His Honor said he had kept till the last a reference to the remark made by the residents of Bhagalpur, when in their address they said "We venture to express a hope that your Honor will not proceed with the proposed cadastral survey involving an expenditure on the part of landlord and tenants which they are alike unable to bear." Now, it was not very clear whether this remark was intended to refer exclusively to some possible extension of the cadastral survey to the district of Bhagalpur, or to the work which is actually going on of the survey in North Behar. There was no thought of extending the survey to Bhagalpur at present but His Honor hoped that so soon as the cadastral survey of Behar had been brought to a successful conclusion, and when the people came to see and understand the enormous advantage that such a complete record of rights conferred upon them, so far from requesting that they might be delivered from it, they would in coming years include in their address to his successor a request that the cadastral survey of Bhagalpur might be begun at the earliest possible date. Assuming, however, that the passage related to Behar, and that they were speaking on behalf of their friends and relations in that part of the country, His Honor said he was glad to be able to take advantage of this opportunity to make a few remarks and explanations which he hoped would tend to allay their alarm and anxiety. The objection taken in the address rested on the ground of the expenditure the survey would involve in the present season of scarcity. It was to be hoped, however, that the present distress and scarcity are but a temporary evil. No one can forecast the future, but, on the other hand, no one had any valid grounds for anticipating a failure in the coming monsoon; and should all go well, the present trouble would be as completely forgotten next year as the pressure of 1889 was forgotten in 1891. There was every reason to hope that a kindly Providence would not afflict the district beyond what it could bear, and that with the advent of good and seasonable rains all fears of further scarcity would pass away. So much for the special objection as to the burden of expenditure being aggravated by the present scarcity; but there remained the general objection that the survey would undoubtedly cost money, and he sympathised with the general dislike to have expenditure thrown upon them. In the address, however, mention had been made of the fact that the cost would fall on both landlords and tenants, but as regarded the latter, His Honor did not think there was any need to feel much alarm. As matters stood at the present moment, any rayyet who had to defend a rent suit, was sure, first of all, to go to the Collector's cutcherry, and there to pay one rupee for a copy of an extract for the Patwari Jamabandi, which was absolutely of no validity whatsoever, and would not be accepted as evidence in any Court. When, however, the proposed survey had been completed, the average rayyet who held probably some four or five bigahs of land would have to pay one rupee for a trustworthy and valid statement showing the area, the rent, and the number, of his fields, and all the incidents of his tenure, and for all this he would pay exactly the same amount as he now had to pay for a document that was perfectly worthless. He was quite sure that any rayyet who understood the facts would willingly offer to pay ten times what the survey would cost him, for the sake of the security of the record. He had quite lately had an example of this brought to his notice, in the case of a gentleman in this district, Mr. Hirsch Christian, who holds a rayyetti tenure in the Banchi Srinagar Estate, of which a survey and record of rights has lately been carried out by the Court of Wards. That gentleman had informed him that he set the highest value on the record he had secured, and that he considered that the survey had been the greatest blessing which could have been conferred upon the estate.

The case of landholders no doubt was somewhat different, and those who owned large tracts of land would have largish sums to pay. All that Government could and would do was to try their best to diminish, as far as possible, the disagreeable burden of payment, by spreading it out over a number of years, and to further offer them the assurance that this survey would be to their clear and certain advantage, which when they had realized and come to understand in its true working would be accepted by them as even more than an equivalent for any expenditure it might have entailed. His Honor said that his hearers might possibly have noticed the speech he made at the last meeting of Supreme Legislative Council in Calcutta last month in connection with the Court of Wards Bill. He had undertaken there to do all he could to secure for the landlords in whose estates a cadastral survey had been carried out, a short and summary procedure for the recovery of arrears of rent. When there was no longer any dispute as to whether a man was a rayyet or not, and as to what his rent was, but only as to how much he had paid and how much was in arrears, he was sure that the summary powers for dealing with such cases which are provided for in the Tenancy Act might fairly be utilised, and he was in hopes that even a shorter procedure might be allowed, corresponding to the powers of Government under the Certificate Act.

There was another suggestion for the relief of Zemindars under consideration, concerning which no definite promise could be made beyond the fact that he was favourably disposed towards the scheme of abolishing putwarris if it could be done with safety. The suggestion was that there should not be any Government servant retained as accountant in a village, but only the landlord's own accountant, provided security could be given that that accountant should be competent, and that the landlord would keep the record of rights in a complete and corrected condition, entering mutations or other necessary alterations. As it was the audience knew that at present all alterations in the registers of the names and shares of the proprietors were supposed to be carried on by a self-acting system, and there was a penalty prescribed for any omission to register alterations. It was reasonable to think that similar procedure could be devised for receiving the correction of the khatians and jamabandis, and the maintenance of the record of rights from year to year; and if this were provided, it was quite possible that Government would agree to the abolition of the patwarri, who is undoubtedly an object of suspicion and dislike to the landlords, and is an interminable element of discord. Although no reference had been made to it in any of the addresses, there was, however, another point on which he would like to make a few remarks, as he had reason to believe it was one of the chief causes of alarm in connection with the proposed survey, especially among the Zemindars, and that was the great expense likely to be incurred on account of the bribes taken and illegal demands that might be made by unscrupulous amins. It was needless to say that one who had been so long in this country as he himself had been, and had seen so much of the manners and customs of the lower orders of such people, was not prepared to deny the possibility of such demands being made, or was ready to undertake the defence of amins; but though it were impossible to rely on the absolute integrity of these officials, it was both possible and sufficient to rely on the constant supervision and inspection of their works by superior officers, with the aid of scientific mathematical instruments. The fears of the malpractices of these amins were, in fact, due in great part to ignorance of the system to be pursued, and when once the survey was well started and its modus operandi understood, it would very easily be seen that such alarm was quite unnecessary. The measures which it was proposed to adopt were that as the amin went on with his work, measuring and recording in his record say about thirty numbers a day, he should give to the holder of each field a "parcha" or slip showing exactly what had been recorded. This the rayyet would take away with him and discuss at his leisure, and at once see whether there was any mistake in the record. During this work it would be quite unnecessary for the Zemindar to detail any person to keep a special watch over the amins. Everything recorded would thus be brought to light, and its accuracy would be challenged and tested at once, so where would be the use of an amin making any false entry? When this work had been completed for a block of villages, the attestation officer would come round, who would be either a Covenanted Officer, such as an Assistant or Joint Magistrate, or else a Deputy Collector. He would fix a certain day for the attestation of the khatian, and have up all the villagers before him, and read out the record which concerned each in turn, enquiring before all the assembled crowd if there was any mistake; and thus the examination would be easily completed. At this point only would it be necessary for the Zemindar to have some trustworthy agent present, able to offer any necessary explanations to the attesting officer, or to assist in settling errors and disputes, and to protect the Zemindar's interests. He hoped that those present, who were connected with Behar, would explain this method of procedure to their friends, and that they would see how impossible it would be for an amin to make false entries undetected, and how useless it would be for anyone to offer him bribes and to submit to any illegal demands on his part.

He trusted that what he had said to-day would be of some efficacy, both as removing the alarm felt by Zemindars about the results of the unknown operations of the survey, and also as disclosing to them what has to be set on the other side of the account, as advantages which will accrue to them in consequence of the survey. He would further observe that a conference had lately been held at Mozuffarpur, at which the Director of Surveys, Colonel Sandeman, and the Commissioner, Mr. Lyall, had met a large number of Zemindars and indigo planters; and though he had not received an official report of the proceedings, he had reason to believe that the explanation offered had been favourably received, and had done much good. In any case, he was sure that in Colonel Sandeman they would find an officer of great experience and skill, and one who was most anxious to make the survey go smoothly, and to meet all reasonable wishes of the parties concerned.

His Honor concluded by again thanking those assembled for their kind reception of himself and the good wishes expressed towards Lady Elliott, who, he hoped on the occasion of his next visit to Bhagalpur, would be able to accompany him.

VISIONS OF THE PAST.

(A FRAGMENT.)

BY THE LATE MICHAEL M. S. DUTT,

Author of "The Captive Lady," "Meghnathvada" (Bengali epic), &c., &c.

VI.

I stood in solitude,—and as I look'd
Night wan'd—~~that~~ lovely night of star-lit smile,
With all its hosts—save, morn! thy gentle star,
Who with his dewy coronet of light
Sits on his throne—in lonely beauty—far—
To glass him in thine laughing eyes and then
Flee to some slumb'rous haunt to dream of thee!—
Night wan'd—and now the pilgrim fair of Light—
The sun—whose path is on the sky—uprose
Careering: Nature smiled her eloquent
And gentle welcome as he came in pride
And beauty—such as when rapt Delian maid
In voiceless adoration saw him rise—
God of the silver bow and deathless lyre!

VII.

But where were they—the tenants of that bow'r,
Those gentle beings whom I there beheld
Pent in each other's arms in balmy rest?
I look'd—but saw them not; for shadows vast Still brooded 'round their flow'ry home and frown'd
On Light and dim'd her brow and joyous mood.
How fearful!—for it look'd—that lovely bow'r—
Like some dark isle upon a sunny sea—
The haunt of Phantoms dire and such as flee
The realms of Day.—Aerial shapes and grim
Now crowded fast in misty—sullen throngs
As if some sunless world had just unbar'd—
—Land of pale spectres and of Night profound—
Had just unbar'd her portals to disgorge
Her darksome brood from cavern'd sleep and lone:—
They came—oh! how unlike the beings bright,
That, ere that night of starry smile had wan'd—
Disported 'round—oh! how unlike they throng'd—
Ghastly—and pale—and joyless—horrid crew!
I stood, as one by foul Enchantress' wand,
From sunny scenes, or blithesome revelrie
Of Fays by mossy marge of moon-lit fount,
Wing'd to some Donjon's dark and starless keep—
Where the lone captive weeps in solitude—
And shrieks of agony oft rend the ear
From spirits disenthral'd, who nightly haunt
Dire scenes—where murder bares her hideous arms!

* * * * *

VIII.

I stood, when, hark!—a sudden voice there came——Forth from that bow'r now curtain'd as by wall
Of darkness dense for mortal ken too deep—
Awful and deep like thunder and it said,
In accents of proud triumph, lo! 'tis done!
There was a shriek of joy—methought it burst
From that dread throng—and rolling far and near—
It sunk—Earth trembl'd—and from grove and bow'r
There came a sound of mournful wail and sad:
I look'd—the sun had veil'd his dazzling brow—
As when he saw upon thee, Calvarie!
The Pilgrim from His Father's bosom—He—
His God—with blood stain'd brow and crown of thorn
Die on th' accursed tree—yea—die to save—
And dying pray for those who shed His blood!

* * * * *

IX.

Slowly and sad, with brow where still the shade
Of sorrow linger'd, on to western realms
The Sun now hied him, and the star of Eve
Came pale and all alone with throbbing breast—
Unwoo'd by melody from twilight bow'rs—
Unwelcom'd by sweet breath of flow'rets fair,
Which ope their dewy eyes to gaze in joy
On her soft brow of loveliness and smile!
I sigh'd—and as I sigh'd methought there came Loud blasts and shrill of trumpets from afar,
And dazzling, waves of light of cloudless beam,
Above the brightness of the sun—now roll'd
Along the blue expanse of Heav'n—erst dim—
—Such as once burst upon the Pilgrims' path,
When he with fiery wrath and fierce intent
Trode Syria's sunny plains and view'd afar
Damascus—and fast pal'd the noon tide ray.*—
Night fled—not with her wonted steps so slow
And ling'ring, when—as matron loth to leave
Some lovely maiden gay midst festal scenes
Of joyance—from bright morn she lies away,
But in wild hurried flight as routed host—
Night fled before that light which beam'd around
As if ten thousand suns were in the sky—
Earth trembl'd—and methought the pathless sea,
—Like giant waken'd from his deep repose,
Rose in wild tumult—Nature stood in awe,
As the dread blasts of trumpets louder swell'd,
Such as before thee, Sinai! mount of God—
The Pilgrims of the Desert heard and quak'd! †

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LORD Lansdowne arrived at Simla on Thursday. On account of cholera, he had to abandon his visit to Khanki.

SIR Charles Elliott will be off for the hills next week, leaving Calcutta on the 25th and reaching Darjeeling on the 30th. In the way, he will take in Parbatipur, Dinajpur, Rangpur, and Jalpaiguri. He will be accompanied by Captain Currie, Private Secretary, throughout, and by Mr. C. E. Buckland to Dinajpur only.

SIR Charles Hanks Todd Crossthwaite, K.C.S.I., took over charge from Colonel R. C. B. Pemberton, R.E., on the 7th April under the usual salute, and is once more Public Works minister.

COLONEL P. D. Henderson, of the Thuggi and Dacoity Department, has been appointed Resident in Mysore and Chief Commissioner of Coorg.

MR. H. H. Risley, C.I.E., has obtained another mark of favor of his chief. He has been taken in place of poor Mr. P. Nolan as a member of the local Legislative Council.

It will be a relief to many that Mr. E. N. Baker has obtained two months' leave from 2nd May next. We hope Mr. E. G. Drake-Brockman, Mr. Baker's Joint and Deputy in the 24-Pergunnahs, gazetted to act for him as Magistrate and Collector, will prove a salutary change.

MR. T. Jones is about to go out of the Small Cause Court and the Government service. Mr. A. P. Handley from the Police Court will be the third Judge for disposal of Small Causes, preparatory, it is said, for the first, as soon as that place is vacant. Mr. T. A. Pearson, barrister-at-law, replaces Mr. Handley as Chief Magistrate. The arrangement may be construed as a slur on the native judges superseded. Syed Ameer Hussain has several times complained that he was never allowed to officiate as Chief Presidency Magistrate as Mr. Ameer Ali, though he is unwilling to claim all the functions exercisable by the chief of the Magistrates. In the Small Cause Court itself, Mr. K. M. Chatterjee has a grievance.

"As a thank-offering to God for recovery from severe illness," Mr. J. D. Rockefeller, of the Standard Oil Company, has paid to the new Chicago University one million dollars. This is the second gift from the same oilman, the first being valued at over a million and a half.

THE only monument to mark the place where the Rev. Charles Haddon Spurgeon lies in Norwood Cemetery, is a marble slab, with the inscription "C. H. Spurgeon." It is to be enriched, at the suggestion of Mrs. Spurgeon, by the addition of the word "Waiting." The personal estate left by the reverend gentleman has been valued, for probate duty, at 10,643*l*. That really left is about 2,000*l*., the balance being made up of a life insurance policy for 1,000*l*., with bonus additions, and the valuations of all his copyrights, the furniture, the extensive library, as well as all other effects at Westwood, Beulah Hill, Upper Norwood. This was a true shepherd, indeed, who not only preached but also practised poverty, simplicity and temperance. How unlike the Princes and plutocrats of the Church, Catholic or Anglican!

THE Mahratta of April 17 writes approvingly of the Partition Bill introduced in the Viceregal Council:—

"The Hon'ble Mr. Rashbehary Ghose, the author of the well-known work on the law of mortgage in India, who has been nominated as an additional member of the supreme legislative Council, appears to be determined upon not being merely an ornamental member of that body. He has brought forward a bill to amend the law of partition in India. The main object of the Bill is to prevent the land from being divided into infinitesimally small portions, to the great inconvenience of all the parties concerned. According to section 265 of the Civil Procedure Code the partition of the revenue-paying estate is referred to the Collector, who in this Presidency, proceeds according to the provisions of the Land Revenue Code which authorise the Collector, in cases where the minimum limit of a number is reached, either to give the land to one sharer or to sell the same and distribute the proceeds amongst others, or all as the case may be. The Hon'ble Mr. Ghose wishes to have these provisions extended to cases of non-revenue-paying lands that are partitioned directly by the Civil Courts. 'In order at the same time to prevent any oppressive exercise of this privilege, it is proposed to make the consent of parties interested at least to the extent of a moiety in the property, a condition precedent to the exercise of the court of this new power; while such of the shareholders as do not desire a sale will have the right of buying others out at a valuation to be determined by the Court.' This is a necessary safeguard and we are glad that it has been anticipated. The Bill also gives the court the power of compelling a stranger, who has acquired by purchase a share in the family dwelling house, when he seeks for a partition, to sell his share to the members of the family, who are the owners of the rest of the house at a valuation to be determined by the court. This as has been justly observed, is only an extension of the provision contained in the transfer of property Act section 44 and is calculated to prevent one member of the family to force a stranger on the other member against the wishes of the latter. Thus the Bill hardly introduces a new principle, but still it is important as coming from a non-official member and affecting personal and domestic rights of the Hindus. We hope Mr. Ghose would take up with the same boldness, the desired amendments in the other branches of Indian Law, and thus set an example of what an additional member can and ought to do."

That will, we suppose, depend upon the reception given by the country to the present effort.

WE are glad to be able again to read the Behar Herald and the Indian Chronicle. It was a good paper conducted by one of our best, if also busiest, men, but of late years it had been reduced to a miserable illegible rag. High-class native journalism, whether in English or in the vernaculars, does not pay, to be sure. But surely the organ of the Chiefs and landlords of Behar does not depend on commercial exigencies. That the Tirhoot Courier, another able weekly, edited by Mr. Pringle Kennedy, which has been dropped, should be unsightly and unreadable, was not so strange, as it was a speculation, we believe. But it was a shame that a journal like the Herald, financed as it was by the Behar Landholders' Association, should be reduced to the same pass. It is all right now, however. The paper is now being printed on substantial white paper and in new type. It is as ably conducted as ever.

LATELY the Pioneer, having in an article on the Patna Examination scandals, stated that "On the 10th of February the Editor of the local paper, had sent to him (Mr. Ewbank) anonymously a correct copy of the history questions," the Behar Herald and the Indian Chronicle says—"If it refers to us, it is as big a lie, as could be uttered."

Our Behar contemporary need not have been to so much ado in the matter. The statement did not merit the seriousness of even a subjective lie direct. To rage against a bull is scarcely less ridiculous than its own absurdity. The Pioneer seems to have fallen in characteristically Hibernian hands.

BRIGADE-SURGEON G. King, C.I.E., having taken furlough, Surgeon D. Prain, Curator of the Herbarium, Royal Botanic Garden, Calcutta, will, in addition, act as Superintendent of that Garden and of the Lloyd Botanic Garden, Darjeeling, and as Government Quinologist and Director of the Botanical Survey of India.

ON the recommendation of the Municipal Commissioners, the Lieutenant-Governor has sanctioned the extension of Part X of the Municipal Act—relating to Markets—to the Nadia Municipality. The Commissioners have now power to open markets of their own or to take a lease of any of the existing markets, or to virtually close any of them, or not to allow opening of new markets.

THE Calcutta Hackney Carriage and Palanquin Act has been extended to the Gaya Municipality.

THE Public Works cess has been fixed by the Lieutenant-Governor for the year 1892-93 at one-half of an anna in the rupee on the annual value of lands, and on the annual net profits from mines, quarries, tramways, railways, and other immoveable property (excepting such as may have been exempted under section 2 of the Cess Act IX (B. C.) of 1880, ascertained respectively as in the Act prescribed.

ON payment of Rs. 94,262-8 by the Bombay Municipality, as composition for the stamp duty chargeable on a debenture loan of Rs. 1,88,52,500, the Governor-General in Council has exempted the said debentures from any stamp duty with which they might otherwise be chargeable, whether on issue, renewal, sub-division, or consolidation.

WE read in an English paper that they have formed a syndicate for the publication of a half-penny morning newspaper which will steer clear of party politics. It is also under consideration whether it is not possible to illustrate that daily broadsheet.

THE English Society of Authors numbers 800 authors and journalists, 226 of whom joined last year.

THE now famous Hargreave jewels, with the addition of a pearl, were sold by Messrs. Christie, Manson and Woods, of King Street, St. James's Square, on March 28, for 660*l*. and 416*l*. Mrs. Osborne had sold them—minus the one pearl added—to Messrs. Spink for 550*l*.

THE Bank of Bombay has obtained permission of the Governor-General in Council to establish a branch at Bhaunagar.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Queen of England visits Darmstadt today. It is reported that the Czar will visit Berlin at the end of May and the King and Queen of Italy in June.

MR. Gladstone has declared himself in a pamphlet against female suffrage. He says neither the public nor women themselves desire the reform aimed at in the Female Suffrage Bill. He is willing to admit the fitness of some women for masculine offices, but is afraid that women would lose their refinement and purity amid the turmoil of masculine life.

A LONDON telegram of the 17th reported fresh difficulties between Turkey and Egypt. The Sultan telegraphed to Eyoub Pasha, not to leave Cairo till further orders, while the Khedive telegraphed to the Sultan, complaining of the latter's High Commissioner in Egypt, Mukhtar Pasha's interference in the internal affairs of the country. An arrangement was, however, immediately made. Eyoub Pasha has sailed for Constantinople, and Mukhtar Pasha has orders from his Sultan not to interfere in the internal affairs of Egypt.

ON the 16th a great change came over the weather in England, specially in the south-east, where a foot of snow fell that evening in Essex, not only making the roads impassable but also blocking the trains.

THE latest news of the Straits of Singapore comes all the way from London. The panic in Pahang has subsided. The men supposed to be implicated in the murder of Messrs. Harris and Stewart have been arrested, and will shortly be tried.

A FRENCH Fleet visited Plymouth last year. At the next Naval manoeuvres, a Russian Fleet is expected at Davenport in June.

THE first international Football match was held in Paris on April 18, between the Paris and London Football Clubs. The English team beat the French by three goals to nothing.

ON the 19th, the Times announced an agreement between England and France upon all colonial questions. The agreement was subsequently explained to refer to the prevention of the sale of arms and ammunition to Natives of Africa.

THERE is in London an anarchist paper called the "Commonweal." The editor, Mr. Mowbray Nicholl, is charged with having published an article inciting murder of Mr. Matthews, the Home Secretary, and Mr. Justice Hawkins. On the 20th, he was brought up before the Bowstreet Magistrate. Nicholl admitted the authorship of the article and was remanded.

TROUBLES are reported from West Africa. The Jebus and Egbas tribes have threatened Lagos on the Gold Coast. To reinforce the garrison, Captains Larymore and Bayly have started with a force of Houssas. The King of Dahomey has, in a letter, openly defied France, and is again threatening Porto Novo at the head of his forces. The French press is alarmed and urges the most complete measures promptly. How interesting to foreigners at a distance all this about Jebus and Egbas and Lagos and Houssas! But this is not all.

REPORTS from Uganda are disquieting. The Catholics under Mwanga attacked the Protestants and killed their chief. The Protestants returned the attack and deposed Mwanga.

DURING his late visit to Bombay, the Viceroy had ample opportunities of noticing not only the material progress and prosperity of the place, but also the nakedness of the land in other particulars. In their zeal for kudos doubtless, the good Ducks were not content to conduct his Excellency to their big mills and their magnificent charities, but they showed him some of their institutions of science and learning. The wellbred nobleman of course was not slow to express his interest in whatever was presented to his observation, and his great gratification in all that he saw. The discerning few among them are not well pleased at the choice of places that was made for the great visitor. The Times of India thinks it a mistake that the Viceroy was taken over to the University Library. Our contemporary would have preferred the Asiatic Library housed in the Town Hall. That is a properly kept collection, whereas the University collection is simply a "conglomeration of books." In a long but brilliant paragraph, the Times gives a scathing account of the lamentable condition of the Bombay Bodleian. The collection is rich and rare, but it is useless and tantalising from the neglect to which it has been abandoned. There is no catalogue—no classification—nor any kind of arrangement, except perhaps of the beind mechanical, the books being shelved according to size only, and associated together without regard to subject, and even then packed two or three lines deep! A fine University Library, to be sure.

THE San Francisco Examiner, a paper claiming the largest circulation in the Golden City, has provoked British journalists at Home and abroad by a recent article in its "Ladies' Column." The first offence is that in its blunt Republican way our Queen is described as "the English-woman, Victoria—." Then the writer proceeds to give what is characterised as wonderful information, to wit, that the said Victoria "is not allowed to have a great many privileges that the humblest of her subjects can boast of. For instance, she isn't allowed to handle a newspaper of any kind, nor a magazine, nor a letter from any persons except from her own family, and no member of the Royal Family or household is allowed to speak to her of any piece of news in any publication." "All the information the Queen is permitted to have must first be strained through the intellect of a man whose business it is to cut out from the papers each day what he thinks she would like to know. These scraps he fastens on a silk sheet with a gold fringe all about it, and presents it to her unfortunate Majesty." These quotations we take from an English paragraph which is going the round. From its writer it would seem that the American paper states that only communications printed in letters of gold on golden fringed silk are admissible to the august Presence. This rule must, of course, not only check the flow, but also considerably reduce the volume, of the correspondence that reaches the royal table. "This silken sheet with gold fringe is imperative for all communications to the Queen." The Examiner concludes with relating how an American lady sent the Queen a collection of pressed American flowers, which for three months much delighted Her Majesty. But "at the end of that time, which was as long as she was allowed by Court etiquette to keep it, she had it sent back with a letter saying that, being Queen of England, she was not allowed to have any gifts."

WHETHER miracles have ceased or not, the claim to them continues. It appears from the New York Medical Times of March, that physicians in Corea have to examine their patients by the inspection of a thread tied round their wrist and passed out by a hole in the door to the doctor outside. This goes beyond any feat heard of the hakims of this country—or any other. Whether in India or in Turkey, the Mahomedan physicians even in the case of ladies are allowed to feel the pulse though not see the person of the patient. At the worst, there is no objection to their inspecting the urine.

OUR long article—of four columns and a quarter—of the 19th March on "Self-destruction of Hindu Women" has met with a curious reception. The Indian Daily News, long known for an observer of social phenomena, reprinted it entire, and drew attention to it more than once. Its worthy Darjeeling Correspondent, a really superior man, then took up the cue, treating a matter of obvious importance with the needful seriousness and his usual intelligence.

The Indian Mirror, that journal of Hindu-Buddhist-Theosophic morality, published a condensed plagiary, echoing our views and suggestions without once naming us.

That was all. With that exception, the whole native Press has ignored a subject of vital importance to Hindu society.

NOT the whole native Press, exactly. Out of Bengal the subject seems to have attracted rather more interest. In Bombay, the Indian Spectator of April 17 writes:—

"Suicides of women in high Bengali life, as also among the middle and educated classes to the far east, appear to have been on the increase of late. Reis and Rayyet had a pathetic leader on the subject, a few weeks ago. If the note of alarm sounded by our contemporary is on facts, which evidently is the case, it ought to attract the most serious attention of our Bengali countrymen. The circumstance is all the more regrettable when we learn that most of the victims of suicide are young married women. If the victims were Hindu widows, whose life is made unbearable by social tyranny, we could understand the circumstance. But that young wives should in large numbers be driven to end their existence, is sad to hear, sadder still to contemplate. What must be at the bottom of all this weariness of life to Bengali women, it is not easy to divine. Our Calcutta contemporary, who handles the subject with his usual fearlessness, attributes it to these causes: (1) The ill-treatment which the wife receives from the notorious mother-in-law and the no less formidable nanud, the husband's elder sister; (2) the husband's ill-treatment of her and want of sympathy with her for various reasons, viz, evil habits of drunkenness and debauchery. It appears to us that the husband is perhaps a more potent factor in these sad ends than the mother-in-law. The mother-in-law is doubtless not to be ignored, for she is nothing if not a despot. In some cases, hers is a benevolent despotism, but in many others it is downright tyranny. But even though the mother-in-law may be a veritable tyrant, the wife can be happy if she has the consolation of her husband's sympathy and love, which, we fear, is a minus quantity in the case of many an educated Hindu gentleman. The educated Hindu, full of high notions of Western life, is, we are afraid, dissatisfied with his ignorant wife. She is no companion to him. He thinks and talks of things which she—poor ignorant creature—cannot understand, much less appreciate. There is a wide gulf between the two. But thoughtful educated Hindus put up with their lot and try to improve it as much as possible by giving their wives such education as they are capable of receiving after marriage. Others, less thoughtful, seek pleasure elsewhere. The poor wife, ill-treated by the mother-in-law, and if not despised, at any rate not loved by the husband, is kept company with by sorrow, which develops into infatuation and may end in suicide. Suicides of this sort are happily rare on this side. But that may only mean that the gulf between the husband and the wife on our side is not so wide as in Bengal. The percentage of English educated men in Bengal is larger than here. Or, it may be that educated men in Bengal are more impulsive and less thoughtful than those out here. Anyhow, the tale coming from Bengal is extremely painful. We think the remedy lies in educating Bengali women more largely than at present. A rapid advance in female education will remove the causes of the educated husband's dissatisfaction. He will find his wife an agreeable companion. She will, by and bye, come up to his ideas of a ministering angel. He can then enjoy a feast of reason and a flow of souls, such as his education makes him hanker after. He will be happy; his wife will be happy; and his home will be a centre more of concord and happiness than of groans and misery, as it appears to have been to a great extent in the eastern Presidency."

A NEIGHBOURING contemporary has suddenly become unco-righteous. It is specially ailing its civic honour. It was certainly not used to such grand language as it has of late given expression to in connection with the practices of pettifoggers in municipal councils and the conviction of a municipal magnate for misappropriation. The thing has the effect of the name of God—in Indian parlance, Rama—from certain lips. But our contemporary is wise in its generation. It probably believes in the prudent Greek principle of contingent chronological and circumstantial virtue. And it doubtless has discovered that quoting Scripture pays.

THE whole country has heard with pain that Raja Narendra Chandra Roy, of the Kayastha family of Sheoraphuli, one of the oldest and most respected in the land, has been convicted for misappropriating in his capacity of Vice-Chairman of the Baidyabati municipality, a Government Promissory note for Rs. 500 lodged by a contractor, and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 800.

Upon that case, the Hindoo Patriot philosophises in this strain:—

"The present is no doubt a case of rare occurrence, but we feel justified in making the facts known for obvious reasons. It ought to open the eyes of the ratepayers in general to the absolute necessity of making a judicious selection of their representatives. At present the man most capable of canvassing is returned. This should never be countenanced. The aim of our rate-payers ought always to be to elect men with strong heads and stout hearts. We simply abuse the great privilege of Local Self-Government, which the Government has conferred upon us by putting up as our representatives on the Municipal Board such worthless figures as the condemned Narendra Chandra Roy. We have no doubt Narendra Chandra's example will have a most salutary effect."

The above are "sensible observations" in the opinion of the East of Dacca, from which we quote them second-hand. To us, they sound differently. At best commonplace and futile, they are even contradictory.

THE Maharaja of Durbhunga has appointed Mr. Henry Bell, of the High Court Bar, Manager-General of his affairs. We are on principle opposed to the employment of Europeans by, or in native affairs of, native Chiefs. Without harbouring the slightest repugnance to, or jealousy of, Europeans or Christians, several considerations determine us in this view, not the least powerful being the difficulty natives feel, and must feel, of commanding Europeans. These considerations, however, affect political chiefships far more than private estates. Indeed, several important considerations of expediency recommend European management as the fittest for private property, specially of a certain type. The Durbhunga Raj seems to come under the same category, and, not inappropriately perhaps, has it, since the decease of the last Maharaja, been under European management, in some form or another. From Furlong to Gwatkins, a long succession of civil and military men have administered the charge with more or less success, but even with unimpeachable honesty. Mr. Furlong had been the Prince of Planters before, on the downfall of Indigo he took service in Durbhunga during the minority of Maharaja Luchmessur Singh.

WHAT the Doorga Pooja time is to the Bengalis, what the Holi season is to other Hindoos, what the Moharram Week is to the Moslems, that Passion Week is to the Christians, especially of the Roman Catholic persuasion. This year it came to a close on the 15th instant. Yet who of our readers thought of it? What Hindu or Mussulman, Jew or Parsee, ever perceived that he was in the midst of a great festival of a great community? We do not know how the Indian followers of the Catholic Church, observed the Festival, no newspaper in India, so far as we are aware, having given a proper and particular account. One would have thought that the Calcutta organ of the Roman Catholics would, for the reputation of its co-religionists, come out with a description of how Passion Week was observed, all round, in the city of Palaces. No such thing! Are we to attribute this to decay of religious zeal? Perhaps it is owing to the Government of an adverse denomination. But, surely, if there was spirit enough in Catholicism, it would be brought out by competition. Were Great Britain still a Catholic Power, perhaps Lord Lansdowne, with his councillors, would have, on Thursday, the 14th instant, sent for twelve native Catholic beggars and performed the function of lovement des pieds, as is still done by the Emperor of Austria, by King Humbert of Italy and, last but not least, by His Holiness the Pope himself. Then, in imitation of what takes place in the Portuguese Navy, Good Friday Eve would have been solemnized on the banks of the sacred Ganges, by the flogging of Judas Iscariot.

But alas! instead of all this, Passion Week is passed in India, almost unnoticed, and there is no one in the Indian Press to tell us how in Bombay, Madras and Calcutta, not to speak of other cities in India, the Nonconformists and the Low-church men spent the week, and in how many Christian families, hot cross buns were consumed in the morning repast.

ACCORDING to Dr. v. Tassinari, tobacco-smoking is valuable as a powerful disinfectant, a prophylactic against a number of infective diseases. He made a number of experiments on the influence of tobacco-smoke on the germs of cholera, anthrax and pneumonia.

He lined the interior of hollow balls with gelatine containing the germs of the diseases named; tobacco-smoke was then passed through these globes for from ten to thirty minutes, with the result that the bacilli of true Asiatic cholera and of pneumonia were completely destroyed. The gelatine was absolutely sterilized. The anthrax bacillus was more resistant, while that of typhoid was scarcely acted on at all. The Roman Doctor is supported by Drs. Miller, (New York,) and Vassili, (Naples,) who are of opinion that tobacco-smoke prevents the development of pathogenic germs.

THE Land Acquisition Collector for the Town of Calcutta, Baboo Cally Churn Ghose, goes on leave, preparatory to retirement. Baboo Tariny Kumar Ghosh comes into his shoes. It has been proposed to have one such Collector for Calcutta, the 24-Pergunnah and the E. B. S. Railway.

AS another measure of economy, Sir Charles Elliott sent up a proposition for a provident fund in lieu of pensions for clerks. The Government of India, however, is not for such a change.

CHOLERA of a virulent type has broken out at Delhi. There is at present a regular panic among the inhabitants of the old capital of India. We find this old city is getting worse and worse almost every year as regards its sanitation.

WE are glad to hear that Sir Nawab Abdul Ghani's health has much improved and that he is now able to receive visitors during the usual hours.

The alarming account of Dewan Jai Prakash Lal of Dumraon's illness was a mere newspaper sensation. He was never so seriously unwell, and now he is improving.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN'S ADDRESS TO THE MAHOMEDANS AT ALLAHABAD.

SIR Auckland Colvin could not have accepted the invitation to lay the foundation-stone of the Mahomedan Boarding House at Allahabad with quite a light heart. Knowing as he did the difficulty of the position to which he was called, feeling, as he could not help feeling, the extreme delicacy of the function he would have to perform, his first impulse, we suspect, was to have nothing to do with it. Remembering, as he could not forget, the personnel of the rival parties, or the points of the quarrel, culminating in the strong and wide agitation which had brought the House into existence, he must naturally have felt some hesitation in patronizing the institution and accepting the most respectfully signed, and most respectful, invitation. Whatever reluctance he might have felt on private grounds, for the sake of some of his oldest and best friends, however,—neither as a true Englishman, as a friend of the Mahomedans, nor as a statesman of mark, could he discourage a movement influentially supported and strongly backed by all Mussalmans of light and leading, whether in the United Provinces or in the Punjab. He must have been surprised to see the array of distinguished Mahomedan gentlemen, many of whom were not long ago the staunchest supporters and admirers of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, under the flag of once his eminent coadjutor, fellow-worker and chief supporter—the old and veteran Samiullah Khan—but now his declared opponent and the leader of the opposition. The conspicuous absence from the scene of the venerable Syed, his distinguished and honorable son, and his special protégés belonging to the staff of the Muir College, must have shown Sir Auckland very unmistakably how the principles of tolerance on which he lays so much stress, is practised by those who seem to be his ideals of that noble quality among the Mahomedans of the Province over which he presides.

The importance of the occasion was obvious—its significance was thoroughly appreciated by Sir Auckland Colvin of all Englishmen. Accordingly, the Lieutenant-Governor came well prepared with a sermon for the Mahomedans as a body, but which was especially intended for and directed to the gathering whose guest he was that day. The address was dressed in very rich crimson, interlaced with bright gold, so as to dazzle the eye and scarcely allow it to see clearly through the tissue. Few outside the United Provinces are likely to fully understand the practical aims of the eloquent discourse, or catch the personal allusions interspersed therein, but those who have carefully watched the course of the unfortunate differences between Sir Ahmed Khan and his best friends and the stormy controversy which followed them and the bitter end to which the matters in dispute were driven, can easily read it between the lines. To the immediate congregation it was plain as noonday. Nor did the stern homily come with the shock of surprise. The blow was distributed by time, or at any rate, the objects were not wholly unprepared for the impact. The prologue had already been pronounced at another place on a similar occasion. It was as if a Wickliffe had preceded the Luther in the attack on the old régime of papal supremacy. A scarcely less influential dignitary had before preached to the same text. The Lieutenant-Governor's advent on the field had been heralded by a Judge of the High Court. The ice was broken by Mr. Justice Straight. The well-conceived utterances of the accomplished Judge at Aligarh, in the same strain, a few days earlier, formed an appropriate introduction to the impressive address of the satrap. If concerted, all this, it must be confessed, was well managed as it was well meant. If, as is more likely, it was a mere coincidence, it was a happy accident. The religious Mussulman with his belief in the hand of God in every serious transaction, may well regard it as providential. Historically, the two speeches, the one delivered at Aligarh, followed shortly after by that at Allahabad, stand complementary to one another.

The founders of the Boarding House were all intelligent men experienced in the business of life and a few even men of distinction. They showed themselves fully equal to the situation. With the adroitness of men of the world they suppressed all personal feeling on this great public occasion. They provoked no petty differences, raised no minor issues, and indeed steered clear, as far as possible, of all controversial topics. With one stroke of business they placed themselves in perfect rapprochement with their eminent visitor. Anticipating Sir Auckland, they commenced their address by praising the Aligarh College (which they do not honestly believe to be a safe and proper place for the education and training of their young men). This admirable diplomacy at once put the addressee in good humour and facilitated the well directed endeavours of the Governor to bring about a reconciliation between the two parties. If those endeavours do not succeed the failure cannot be laid on their head.

But although on a ceremonial occasion, face to face with the Governor of the land, the Committee of the Mahomedan Boarding House were driven to self-suppression, to ignore the truth and hide their wounds, the Press is under no such obligation. The periodical chronicler cannot, without offence, burk the facts, and the journalist, even though no Mussulman himself, may be permitted to sympathise with bleeding fellow citizens of that faith compelled to silence in public. Not from a morbid hankering after sensation or a maudlin desire to cherish pathos, but in the public interest, the tumultuous and unhappy circumstances of the origin of the Boarding House of which Sir Auckland so calmly and philosophically laid the foundation-stone, should not be entirely lost. It is right and expedient that the world should know, not darkly through Sir Auckland Colvin's sounding periods of high counsel but in explicit terms, that the new institution is the first step of a great conflict. How few have realised that the Boarding House of Allahabad is the Bull's Run of Secession from Aligarh!

A Boarding House for Mahomedan students is on the face of it a small affair. Were it not for the wide sweep of the Lieutenant-Governor's incisive utterance in the connection, no one would suspect that it was anything better. But there was one passage in the address of the Committee which faintly adumbrated the truth. "We regret," said the Committee,

"We regret to learn that some of the existing national institutions in India are opposed to our view, but we are convinced that it is only the abuse of time and opportunities in England which should be checked, and not education there under proper supervision. We propose with the grace of God to put fresh life in the movement, and our Committee will act as an advising body with which parents may consult, and from which students may take help before proceeding to England. We will not rest contented with only looking after and advising young men while in India, but intend to safeguard their interests in England by placing them under proper guardianship there."

That was an unmistakable sign that the gentlemen in question were embarked in a considerable movement.

It was the general character of the movement that made Sir Auckland Colvin's thought and language all the more appropriate. True and apposite as were his remarks, however, we suspect the Mahomedan part of his audience after listening to him scarcely went away with a feeling of complete satisfaction.

Much was said by the Lieutenant-Governor about the virtue of tolerance, and some examples also were held out, directly and indirectly. Toleration is a lesson we all stand in need of, more or less. But the Mahomedan gentlemen assembled at Allahabad may be excused for thinking that the lesson was still more needed at another place. It is not unlikely that if he had known all, or even if he had simply seen the language and spirit in which Samiullah Khan and his supporters were attacked from different quarters in the Aligarh Institute Gazette, Sir Auckland Colvin's opinion would have undergone a material change. The memorable article—memorable if not for anything else, at least for its lamentable violence and most objectionable indiscretion of language—in which the Syed challenged his opponent to a duel in France ("that paradise of the world"), employing most threatening and contemptuous expressions, was so far from tolerance, good sense, or prudence, that even the worst boy of the Surrender Not School in Bengal would blush to think of such a mode of repelling an attack. Therein the "Grand Old Man" brought himself for ever down to a very small man. All at once the halo was gone—the veil was uplifted—and the world discovered the poor fetish which had been set up for its adoration. This article did that in a few months which it would have taken Samiullah Khan and the Punjab opponents of the Aligarh Raj years, if the controversy were continued. The staunchest friends of the Syed were in a fix. All they could do was to mutter, with lowered heads, that they were extremely sorry to read it. They have up to this time not been able to find any explanation for it. If that is the example of tolerance which the Aligarh reformer has to set for the younger generations of Mahomedans, then we trust his coreligionists are not prepared to follow it. They can not hope to benefit by it.

It is all very good to talk of petty jealousies and private and personal motives and quarrels in order to make a respectable impression upon the general public unposted in the points in dispute. There is no such ignoble issue between the Syed and his present opponents, as far as we know. The difference is fundamental. It is a question of principles that divides them. These principles are interwoven with the Mahomedan faith as well as social and educational systems, and it was on these only that so many of the best men cut off their connection with the Aligarh College and its founder. They knew what was best for the education and advancement of their co-religionists, but they were not able to pursue those legitimate objects under the yoke of their stern task-master. Accordingly, instead of frittering away their efforts and energies in incessant and useless struggle, or of blindly following a leader, whose object is self-aggrandizement at the expense of the public and under the veil of patriotism and reform, they have set up shop on their own account, far from their old senior partner. These are not men who can be branded with the charge of petty jealousies. They have shown to the world of what stuff they are made. Notwithstanding the tooth and nail opposition of the Syed's powerful organization, they have successfully established a Boarding House on their own principles, to be managed entirely according to their own views.

The Punjab "Anjumani Hemayati Islam" have also made arrangements to start a Mahomedan college of their own at Lahore which will be a fait accompli in a few months. Their proposal is also being severely attacked from all sides by the protégés and friends of Sir Ahmed and is discouraged in every way, but it has the support and sympathy of all good and impartial leading Mahomedans in India. The whole orthodox world of Mahomedan India, embracing all the out-and-out denouncers of the anti-Islamite principles and proclivities of the great Knight, now beholds with astonished gratification the battle which is being fought by the mutineer generals and troops of his own army. That mutiny carries the blessings of the pious, who are glad to think that it is for a just and good cause. The mutineers are gradually enlisting the sympathies of all their fellow-Mussalmans, outside the influential but microscopic minority of the Aligarh party.

We have exceeded our limits, but we are loath to part without one general word, which is pertinent to the Mahomedan controversies of the day. Englishmen are too apt to think that those Mahomedans who dress in their costume and freely drink and eat with them, are the most tolerant and enlightened members of their creed. But genuine tolerance and enlightenment are not to be tested by ones dress, food, or what he talks to please Europeans. It is not even tested by what a man writes in pamphlets for circulation in private to a chosen few, but one must be judged from his public and private life, his political and social acts and his public writings and dealings with people. There are men who though they do not care to look hideous as imitation Europeans or who would not eat with Europeans at the risk of their self respect, nevertheless are most tolerant and enlightened (according to their lights and also European and Western lights.) They are not a whit inferior in ability, knowledge, information, character, political sagacity, strength of character and public spirit to any anglicized Mahomedan gentlemen, and who are ready to compete, as they have competed—not unsuccessfully but with advantage—with many enlightened and admired gentlemen of other communities.

THE PATRIOT OF CHANDERNAGORE.

WE have lost an honoured relation and friend, and the French Republic her most eminent native subject in Bengal. Baboo Prankissen Chaudhuri is dead. Of late years, his health had broken down. His heart had become affected. One evening he left us abruptly to fall down insensible in his coach—the effect, as he afterwards said, of the strong pull of tobacco he took at our place. He placed himself under an eminent member of the Faculty, who treated him for weeks without effect. Meanwhile, dropsy supervened and he was hastening to dissolution when Hindu Medicine was tried as a last resource, with wonderful success. The patient was brought round. He was on his legs again—he again drove out and came to see us, and on one or two occasions went out to transact business, but he was an altered man. He was marked. Only the greatest care could give him another long lease. That care, we are afraid, he failed to take and he was seized again. This time there was no escape. The Kaviraj who had saved him before, said so from the outset of the second attack. He lingered through three weeks, latterly in an unconscious state, and then died.

He came of a historic though fallen family. His ancestors were the patrons and chief native servants of the French in this Province. During the revolutions and wars of the middle of the 18th century, they remained true to the French, and with the French they went to the wall and were crushed under British jealousy and vengeance. Nevertheless Chandernagore will not soon forget her old Chaudhurs. They are a poor lot, however, with all the pride of the Spaniard without worldly possessions to sustain it. Prankissen's father Ramnarain left him, as he used to relate, besides a little house to live in, ten annas, in cash—about 1s. 3d. but with the obligation to perform the expensive obsequial ceremonies, and maintain the family, and give himself education. He performed the ceremonies and discharged the other duties as well as a boy of fourteen, under the guidance of an only sister, elder than him, could be expected to do, by selling such little effects as he possessed. The wolf did not permit him to pursue his studies. With the little education that he had received at the Free Kirk school at Hoogly, he was glad to secure a small teachership which was the beginning of one of the most successful lives in our community. With native energy he went on step by step until he earned wealth and distinction. It is a remarkable trait of character that though an "educated Baboo" and for all his poverty an undoubted gentleman by birth, he quietly abandoned the respectability of a teachership to accept the kicks and cuffs seasoned with perquisites of the humbler and almost menial employment of a Bazaar Sircar. That was the turning point of his career. He had no cuffs or kicks to endure, as he would never give any pretext for them. His lowly occupation was his school of commercial education, making him acquainted with the geography and economic products of the market, the ways of the dealers and of the brokers, the wants of different classes and of the different European houses, and so on. His skill and trustworthiness recommended him, his devotion brought him forward. His employers were astonished at the proofs of education given by their Sircar. His self-restraint no doubt told upon these Scotchmen. He was at once lifted up and made an accountant, and then a still superior assistant, and not long after he was advanced to the highest office in their gift—that of Banian, to hold it, as no Banian before had held it, on honor.

For many years he was the chief native officer in the establishment of Messrs. George, Henderson & Co. with authority extending over the Borneo Co.'s, since Baranagar Jute Manufacturing Company's, great factories. He had already learnt by the example of his master Mr. Knowles (senior partner of Messrs. George, Henderson & Co.) to speculate in the stocks. Proceeding warily in this tempting game, he had made some money by it, while he had from the first saved from his scanty earnings as much as he could. So when, after the departure of his old masters, new men who had formerly deferred to him, rose to the head and exhibited then jealousy of him, he could afford to retire on a fine competence. He had always kept two houses, one in Calcutta and another at Chandernagore. The latter he had improved into a spacious sumptuous residence. He thought it was time for him to enjoy home life. But it was more easy to retire from an office than to stop the lifelong habit of work. He now turned his attention to the public good. He became one of the most active public spirited citizens of the French settlement. Whether it was a famine or an epidemic that scourged the inhabitants, he was to the fore. On the establishment of the commune, he came forward to assist in making self-government a reality. He was the only native Indian who has yet been elected Mayor of Chandernagore, and he left a distinguished record of his term of office in better roads and better conservancy. In view of events looming in the future, he advocated the cultivation of the French language by the Indian people, and delivered on the subject a lecture in French which was noticed at length in our columns. He started a self-acting scheme of medical education in Europe for a limited but ever increasing number of native youths, and with this view expended several thousand Rupees. Two gentlemen are already back under the system. He tried also to send Bengalis to France for technical education. Nor was he an unsympathetic observer of the politics of his fellow-Indians in British territory. He took part in more than one movement to which he was invited. He offered a prize on a history of the imprisonment of Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee and the great agitation thereupon. Unfortunately, no adequate and deserving account was presented.

These numerous services could not go unrecognised, the more so as he was in communication with many eminent Frenchmen. As the most intellectual of the principal natives of Chandernagore, he was necessarily thrown in contact not only with every Chef of the Settlement, but also with distinguished travellers from Europe. M. Rouvier and other French politicians and literary men knew and appreciated him. In 1880 he received a gold medal for devotion to public good from the French Republic. In 1887 the Republic honoured him with the title of an Officer de Academie and sent him the gold medal of the distinction. In 1889 the Association Universelle sent him a gold medal for philanthropy and again in 1890 they made him an Academie des Palmiers.

Babu Prankissen Chaudhuri was born on January 1, 1834, and died at 3 O'clock in the afternoon of the 18th April 1892.

He was something more than a benevolent public spirited citizen. He was a man of singular individuality. He was not an amiable man, perhaps, and had serious weaknesses due to his origin and early troubles and associations as well as his later surroundings, but he was unquestionably a remarkable character. He had enormous momentum. Under happier circumstances he might have done wonders. As it was, his life, if it could be adequately written, would be more valuable to our people than the biographies of many of our princes and politicians.

SIMULTANEOUS ADOPTION.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the Appeal of Surendrakeshav Roy v. Doorgasundari Dasse and another, and, by order of Revivor, v. Khettar Kristo Mitter, from the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal; delivered 6th February 1891.

Present: Lord Watson, Lord Hobhouse, Lord Morris, Sir Richard Couch.

[Delivered by Lord Hobhouse.]

On the 19th April 1879 Rajah Bejoykeshav Roy, being at the point of death, made his will in the following terms:—

"I am now ill. God forbid it, but if any mishap occur therefrom, and from fear thereof, I do while of sound mind dedicate and give to Sree Sree Isshur Annapurna Thakooranee, the Thakoor established by my deceased father, all the ancestral and self-acquired moveable and immoveable properties, zemindaries, and Putnee, &c., whether in my own name or banamee, to which I am entitled and of which I am in possession. I have no sons or daughters of my loins. I have two wives living, viz., Sreemutty Rance Nobo Doorga the elder and Sreemutty Rance Doorgasundari the younger. Each of the two Rances will adopt one son. God forbid it, but if the son adopted by either Rance should die, or be unfit for duty by reason of illness of any kind, then in such a case she will be competent to take in adoption a second son, and so on to a third. The two adopted sons of both wives shall remain the shebaites of the whole of the moveable and immoveable property dedicated to Annopoornah Thakoorance aforesaid. They will carry out the supervision and the improvement of the said property. But they will do everything according to the advice of all the principal officers appointed by me. They will not be competent to make gift or sale of the different properties. Up to the time that the said two adopted sons do not attain their majority, my aforesaid two wives will exercise the care and control of all the said properties, and in carrying out these duties they shall take the advice of all the principal officers which have been appointed by me. They will not be competent to act otherwise. When the two adopted sons shall have attained their majority, and shall have acquired sufficient knowledge for the preservation of the property, my two wives shall make over to them as shabaets, to their satisfaction, all the property dedicated to the Issur Deb sheba. Out of the income of the property dedicated to the Deb sheba, &c., after performing the sheba of the above-mentioned Annopoorna Thakoorance, and the Sree Sree Issurs established by my ancestors and myself, and after meeting the prescribed monthly allowances, and after performing the daily and fixed rites and ceremonies, as they are now performed and met, out of the profits which shall remain, each adopted son shall receive at the rate of 1,000 (one thousand) rupees monthly. Therefore, while of sound mind and understanding, I execute this instrument of will. Finis, date 7th Bysack 1286."

The next day the Rajah died, and the two Rances mentioned in his will became his heirs-at-law. The estate is a large one. There is no precise evidence of its amount, but it is stated that the yearly income is not less than a lac of rupees. The elder Rance appears to have relied for advice mainly upon her brother Kaliprosono, and a pleader named Tarrucknauth; the younger upon her father Bhubodaini Mitter, and a pleader named Upendra Bose. There was a long delay in obtaining probate of the will, which, however, was granted to the Rances on the 30th December 1880.

Very soon after the Rajah's death, Tarrucknauth expressed an opinion that a simultaneous adoption of two boys, such as the Rajah contemplated, was not lawful, and after some discussion within the walls of the Rajbari, a case was prepared by Tarrucknauth for an eminent barrister, Mr. Phillips, to advise both the Rances as to their position. On the point of adoption, Mr. Phillips's opinion was to the effect that, though the law was not completely settled, a double adoption would not be valid, and that the will did not authorize any adoption other than a double one.

The ladies determined to make a double adoption. How far they were guided by legal advice, how far by a pious desire to fulfil the directions of their husband, we cannot tell. They and their advisers certainly knew of the legal doubts and difficulties attending a double adoption. But one thing was quite clear. If they were to procure sons for their husband at all, it must be by the simultaneous adoption of two, for the will authorized no other course. It was impossible even to try the question whether their husband's wishes could be fulfilled, unless two boys were found whose parents were willing to give them in adoption one for each Rance.

The boys were found. On the 20th May 1879, one month after the Rajah's death, and the day of his shradh, the double adoption was made. The elder Rance adopted the Plaintiff, who is the natural son of one Mirtunjoy, and was then a boy of less than nine years. The younger Rance adopted a child about a year old, the natural son of her cousin Hurrydass Ghose. She and her adopted boy are the Defendants in the suit.

No long time elapsed before there occurred the familiar incident of quarrels between the two wives. Some argument has turned upon these quarrels; but we do not know what they were about, or what was their duration, or when there was peace, and when war. Pearymohun, who was Kaliprosono's man of business, and went often to the Rajbari with communications to the Rances, tells us (Rec., p. 218).—"The ladies were on good terms with each other for some time. . . . They were not on good terms at the time of the adoption; they had fallen out three or four days before. I heard there was a quarrel. I did not hear what it was about. They had made up, and were on good terms for ten and fourteen days, and then there was a quarrel, and this way it went on. When there are two co-wives these quarrels occur." That is a probable statement of the case. But whether in the intervals of peace, or notwithstanding quarrels, they managed to do business together.

On the 5th July 1879 they executed a document of great importance, viz., an ikrar relating to their management and enjoyment of the estate. After referring to the Rajah's will, and stating that "he had made over to both of us as shebaites the responsibility of looking after the property," and after mentioning the direction to adopt, they continue thus:—

"In accordance therewith on the 7th Joistee last we have together, at the same time and with reciprocal consent, each taken a son in adoption in accordance with the Shasters and general usage; that is to say, I, Sreemutty Rance Nobodoorga, have taken as a son Sree Keshav Lall Dutt third son of Sree Mirtunjoy Dutt inhabitant of Hautkhola in the town of Calcutta, by changing his former name and naming him Sreeman Coomar Surendrakeshav Roy; and I, Sreemutty Rance Doorgasundari, have taken as a son the third son of Sreejoot Baboo Hurrydass Ghose inhabitant of Senhat in the district of Hooghly, and have had him named Sreeman Coomar Annoda Persaud Roy alias Coomar Norendrakeshav Roy. The said two Coomars have become the heirs and representatives of our deceased husband, in the same way as if they had been sons born of his loins. During the present minority of the two sons we as their mothers and guardians will continue to rear and take care of them. With regard to the rights of the said two sons, neither we nor any of our heirs will ever be competent to raise any objection."

They then state that it is necessary to make rules for the preservation and supervision of the property, and covenant that they will in equal shares as shebaites of the Thakoorance continue in possession of and preserve the debuttur property; paying in equal shares the various charges on it; and that if either does not pay her share she shall be liable to indemnify the other. Then they go on:—

"After the debts of the estate have been liquidated, then after meeting the fixed expenditure we will both of us divide and take in equal shares the money which shall be left in the joint tool (till). And out of that money, meeting our respective necessary expenses and the expenses of the maintenance and education of our respective adopted sons, whatever surplus money remains, we will keep the same in our respective custody; and when our respective adopted son attains his majority we will make the same over to him to his satisfaction. Besides this we will not be liable to any one else for an account of the said money. In order that the collections and supervision of the zemindaries and putnee talooks and mokruree and lakhraj mehals, and all the other immoveable property left by our husband, may be performed without any hindrance, keeping a few of the properties in khas usbat, we have given Izarah of all the rest of the property. The expenditure which has been fixed for the performance of the Debseba and the daily and fixed ceremonies, &c., as well as all that will have to be performed in accordance with the will of our husband, the money for the said expenses, we will both of us provide in equal shares. And so that there may be no dispute in respect of the performance of the said Debseba, and the daily and fixed ceremonies, &c., each of us will for one year at a time in rotation take upon herself the whole responsibility of the Debseba, and the daily and fixed ceremonies, &c. And I, Sreemutty Rance Nobodoorga, being the elder, have taken the first turn."

The Izarah mentioned in this ikrar was effected by two contemporaneous deeds. By one of them 13 mehals were demised for five years to Kaliprosono, and by the other 10 mehals were demised for a like term to Bhubodaini. The rents are reserved to the two Rances in equal shares. The Appellate Court below has thought that this transaction throws light on the object of the ikrar; but their Lordships can hardly appreciate its bearing on the case.

The two boys were taken into the Rajbari, and were there treated as adopted sons till after the death of the elder Rance. That event happened on the 28th July 1884. Almost immediately afterwards disputes arose between the younger Rance and the Plaintiff or his friends, and this suit was commenced on the 20th August in that year.

The suit is in effect one for the administration of the Rajah's will, but with an addition which was made by amendment for the purpose of raising a claim under the ikrar. At the hearing in the original Court it was contended on the Plaintiff's behalf, first, that his adoption was prior in point of time to that of the younger boy and valid on that ground; secondly, that a simultaneous adoption was valid in law; and, thirdly, that the will carried the shebaitship to any one who was adopted according to its terms, whether his adoption was or was not good in law. The Judge of the Original Court, Mr. Justice Norris, decided against the Plaintiff on the first two points, and in his favour on the third.

Both parties appealed, and the Court of Appeal agreed with the Original Court on the first two points, about which there is now no longer any question. On the third point they differed from the Original Court. But they considered that there were still questions arising on the acts of the Defendant, the younger Rance, and on the 19th March 1886 they made an order of remand in the following terms:—

"It is ordered that this suit be remanded to the Court below to try the following issue, that is to say,--whether the said Defendant (Appellant) had so acted as to be estopped from denying the Plaintiff's title, or to have made herself a trustee for him to the extent of the interest which he claims. And that the said Court do take any additional evidence that may be adduced by either party for that purpose, and do return its finding upon such issue to this Court, together with the evidence taken."

Upon this remand the case was again tried before Mr. Justice Norris, and a great quantity of evidence was taken, of which some is relevant to show the knowledge possessed by the Ranees of their position in May and July 1879, and also to show the connection between the adoption and the ikrar. The Original Court concluded "that the Ranees agreed to execute the ikrar to preserve the rights of their adopted sons," and formally found the issue in favour of the Plaintiff.

The Defendant, the younger Ranees, then appealed, when the Appellate Court reserved the finding of the Original Court, and dismissed the suit. Their views are expressed in a full and elaborate judgment, but, so far as they have been relied on by the younger Ranees at this bar, may be briefly summarized. It is not denied that both the Ranees knew of the invalidity, or doubtful validity, of the adoption they made. But it is said that the ikrar was not thought of before the adoption; that it was not made in consequence of the legal difficulty about the adoption, but to settle quarrels, to provide for the management of the estate, and to enable the brother of one Ranees and the father of the other to get the leases which they did get. It was therefore a separate contract between the Ranees, to which the boys were strangers, and which they could not enforce.

The Plaintiff now appeals from the decree dismissing his suit, and the whole case is thus opened. It seems to their Lordships that the issue which was tried on remand is not conceived in very apt terms, because there may be no estoppel binding the younger Ranees, and no trust except in a somewhat strained use of the term, and yet she may have entered into a bargain which she is bound to make good to the extent of her interest in the estate. But their Lordships, having the whole case before them, are at liberty to draw such conclusions as the allegations and proofs warrant. If the Plaintiff has a good claim under the ikrar, he is entitled to enforce it in this suit. The points substantially urged on his behalf at the bar are, first, that he takes as sufficiently described by the will, and, secondly, that he can sustain a claim against the younger Ranees personally by virtue of the ikrar. It is not now contended that his adoption is valid in law, as indeed it clearly is settled that it is not.

Their Lordships concur with the Appellate Court in the opinion that the Plaintiff can take nothing under the will. They do not find it necessary to give any opinion on the question whether a gift to persons whose description does not import that they should be born in the donor's lifetime can be valid, because they think the case rests on a clearer ground. There is no gift to the adopted sons except in the character of shebaites. And it would require very strong and clear expressions indeed to show that a Hindoo gentleman contemplated introducing as shebaites of his family Thakoor, two persons unknown to himself and strangers to his family. There is not a trace in this will to show any such intention, or to show that the testator doubted the legality of his scheme, or thought of any adoption but a legal one.

The original Court decided in favour of the Plaintiff on this point, in reliance on the authority of Dey v. Dey (2 Indian Jurist N. S. 24). But in that case the testator had himself made a double adoption, and the boys lived with him and were called and treated as his adopted sons. As regarded them, there was strong ground for saying, as the Judges all agreed in saying, that a gift to his "adopted sons" was meant to go to the two boys whom he actually knew as such. Then the question arose as to another boy, who was substituted on the death of one of the original two, in pursuance of a power given by the testator to his widow. Was he too sufficiently described? The Court, though not unanimously, held that he was, on the ground that he answered the same description which was applicable to the boy for whom he was substituted, and fell within the same intention of the testator to give his property in moieties to the two who had gone through the form of adoption. Their Lordships need not say whether they would decide that case the same way if it were before them. It is sufficient that it differs from the present case in an essential circumstance which governed the decision.

Adopted sons then being out of the question, what becomes of the property? The younger Ranees says that nothing can be more simple. All is given to the Thakoor, the heirs become shebaites, and manage the property in the usual way. But the matter is not quite so simple. It is true that by the first sentence of the will all is given to the Thakoor; and though in the plaint the question is mooted whether the gift is made bonâ fide (and of course such gifts may be a mere scheme for making the family property inalienable) it has not been really disputed. Nor indeed could it well be disputed in this case. For the last part of the will shows clearly enough that the income was to be applied first in performing the sheba of the Thakoor who is mentioned as the object of the gift, and of other family Thakoors, and in meeting the prescribed monthly allowances, and in performing the daily and fixed rites and ceremonies "as they are now performed and met." The testator must have been well aware that after all these charges had been met there would be a very large surplus. In fact he directs that out of the surplus each adopted son shall receive Rs. 1,000 monthly; but of the residue after that he says nothing.

There is no indication that the testator intended any extension of the worship of the family Thakoors. He does not, as is sometimes done, admit others to the benefit of the worship. He does not direct any additional ceremonies. He shows no intention save that which may be reasonably attributed to a devout Hindoo gentleman, viz., to secure that his family worship shall be conducted in the accustomed way, by giving his property to one of the Thakoors whom he venerates most. But the effect of that, when the estate is large, is to leave some beneficial interest undisposed of, and that interest must be subject to the legal incidents of property.

In this case the Ranees were the testator's heirs. As heirs they would take the shebaitship. In some cases doubts have been expressed whether women ought to be shebaites; but whatever may be the force of those doubts, they can hardly apply to this case, seeing that the Rajah appoints nobody but his wives to perform the duties which his sons cannot perform by reason of nonage. Neither in this case can any question arise between the shebait and the heir, for they are the same persons. It appears to their Lordships that after performing their prescribed duties as shebaites, the Ranees became entitled to the beneficial interest in the surplus for the widow's estate. If that is so, each of them could contract so as to bind her own interest. The question now is whether the younger Ranees has done so.

It was earnestly urged at the bar that the younger Ranees is estopped from denying the Plaintiff's claim. Their Lordships cannot assent to that. They observe that the word "estop" is often used in Indian cases very loosely to denote obligations which do not rest on estoppel at all. Such uses of the word are not countenanced by the definition of estoppel in Section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act. It would indeed be difficult to see how the younger Ranees, who represents the whole inheritance in an administration suit, could be prevented from pleading anything but the true state of the case. However that may be, it is not the fact that she has caused anybody to believe something to be true which she now alleges not to be true. She is entitled to raise any defence which the facts of the case will support.

The arguments to show that she has undertaken a trust appear to their Lordships to be verbal rather than substantial. The younger Ranees has not, by her dealings with the elder or with the boys, possessed herself of any property which she would not have got otherwise. The adoption indeed would, if it were legal, deprive her of property. There is no trust independently of the contract she has made. If that binds her to give the Plaintiff certain benefits she must give them; if it does not, she is not bound in any other way. The essential question in this case is one of contract.

To solve this question, let us first see what the position of the parties was. It is quite clear that, though aware of the risk of illegality, the Ranees were determined on a literal execution of their husband's wishes. For that purpose it was necessary, not only that they should act in combination together, but that they should procure two boys to take part in the operations. It is no slight matter for a boy to be passed from one family into another. Even in England such a thing cannot be done without a serious effect, for good or ill, on the boy's welfare. In India the ties of family life are far stricter, and if a boy has been transplanted from his own family into another by a de facto adoption, and then the adoption turns out to be invalid in law, and he is rejected out of his adopted family, his relations to his natural family must be seriously disturbed. Whether his previously existing legal status would be taken away is a point not calling for any opinion. Assuming that the Plaintiff could return after an absence of five years, and so resume his legal position, it is impossible that his personal position should be the same as if the tie to his family had never been broken.

Is then the ikrar a transaction standing entirely by itself, a mere arrangement for the convenience of the two Ranees, or is it the latest in a series of transactions, beginning with the resolve of the Ranees to make a double adoption? Tarrucknath, who prepared the draft, died before the remand, and therefore has given no evidence as to the connection between the adoption and the ikrar. His bill of costs is in evidence, which shows only that the ikrar was for control and management of the estate, and for effecting an amicable settlement between the Ranees. Kaliprosono says that, when the question of adoption was discussed before the adoption, it was first suggested that the ikrar should be executed; that the suggestion emanated from Tarrucknath, and Mr. Phillips's opinion had then been received. Pearymohun says that he explained the opinion to the Ranees, and communicated to them Tarrucknath's advice to take two boys in adoption, and afterwards execute an ikrar, and that the rights of the adopted sons would be preserved. He adds that the elder Rance assented to that personally, and that Bhobodaini assented for the younger. Gobind Chunder, one of the amla, says that he was present on that occasion; and he confirms Pearymohun in essentials. He differs however in saying that the younger Rance expressed her assent, whereas Pearymohun says that she did not, but her father did. Hurrydass Ghose, the natural father of the younger boy, speaks to a conversation with the younger Rance, in which she stated that "We two Rances have agreed between us that we will take two boys, on each, according to the terms of the will of our husband, and after taking two boys in adoption we will give them such a pucca writing that their interest will not be jeopardized, and even if such adoption should not be held valid, we will by the document we intend to give make over our respective rights to those boys." The same assurance, he says, was repeated by her in her father's presence on another occasion before the adoption. Answering questions in cross-examination he says, "When she said she would give a writing I consented. I said, 'I will give you the child, and you can do what you think proper.' I did not make it a condition, but when she said she would give a writing I was quite satisfied." This witness is commended and relied on by the original Judge.

On the other hand, the younger Rance and Bhobodaini deny the whole story; but they were so entirely discredited before the Original Court that their denials are of no value, nor does the Appellate Court rely on them. They rest principally on Tarrucknauth's bill of costs, and on statements of Upendra Bose, who, though advising one of the parties, states that "nothing was said as to securing the rights of the adopted sons," and contradicts some statements made by Pearymohun respecting Mr. Phillips's opinion. They also rely on the fact that Mirtunjoy, the father of the Plaintiff, and several members of the household, either knew nothing about the matter or have not been called as witnesses. It appears to their Lordships that the sole evidence of any weight against the connection between the adoption and the ikrar is that of Upendra Bose, who certainly might be expected to have known the facts. The quantity of evidence, and, as the Judge who heard it thought, the quality of it, is in favour of that connection; and the Appellate Court think it clear that the two things were connected, but not in consequence of the invalidity of the adoption.

But after all the main evidence is that of the ikrar itself. How can it be explained? The views of the two Courts have been before stated. Their Lordships quite concur with the Appellate Court thus far, that it may have been an object of the ikrar to settle quarrels between the Rances, though it does not seem to have been efficacious for that purpose, nor particularly well adapted for it. They might still quarrel over every item of joint expenditure, and over the division of the surplus, as effectually as when their interests remained joint. But their Lordships cannot understand how the ikrar facilitated the grants made to the relatives of the Rances, nor how those grants tended to settle quarrels, seeing that it was not provided that the elder Rance should take the whole rent reserved on Kaliproson's lease, and the younger the whole reserved on Bhobodaini's, but the rents reserved on each lease were made payable to the two Rances in equal shares. Nor are they able to understand in what way the ikrar was connected with the adoption, as the Appellate Court think it clearly was, unless it were for the purpose of conferring an interest on the boys.

It is true that the document does not say outright that the adoption may be invalid, and that it is intended in that event to give the boys an interest in the widows' estate. Perhaps the framer of it did not choose to put on record the misgivings of the parties as to the legality of their action. Neither does it say that quarrels have arisen, and are to be settled in this way. The bolder course of stating the real motives and intentions would also have been the safer; but it is not followed. The deed does not on the face of it express either the motives supposed by the Original Court or those supposed by the Appellate Court. But those supposed by the Appellate Court do not account for the introduction of the boys, who on their theory have no place or part in the arrangement at all.

Nothing can be more explicit or precise than the recognition of the rights of the boys to nurture and to the enjoyment of the estate while it is remarkable that they are not mentioned at all in the character of shebais. According to the ikrar, the Rances are shebais. The boys are "heirs and representatives" of the Rajah. During their minority "we, as their mothers and guardians, will continue to rear and take care of them." With regard to their rights, "neither we nor any of our heirs will ever be competent to raise any objection." Furthermore, the Rances go on to effect a partition, not only between themselves, but between the boys until the younger attained majority. The surplus of each moiety is to be accumulated and handed over by each widow to her own son when he comes of age. If the boys were really heirs, such an arrangement as that would be futile; they would be joint heirs, and their property would be joint property. It could only take effect out of the widow's interest, and on the footing that the boys were not the owners. And all this is done by persons who are advised that there has been no legal adoption, and who are stated by credible witnesses to have agreed to give a writing for the protection of the boys. The Rances wished to make the boys the heirs of the Rajah. In form they did so; they could not do it in substance. But they could, so far as their own interest would go, give them the same benefit out of the property as if they had actually been heirs. Their Lordships hold that the deed expresses this intention, and that by it the Rances became bound to one another and to the boys to carry it into effect. It is a startling thing to be told that the Rances could immediately afterwards turn the boys adrift, or that the survivor of them can do so after the arrangement has been in force for five years.

But it was strongly urged at the bar that the boys cannot enforce a contract to which they are not parties. It is true that they are not parties to the ikrar considered as an isolated transaction; nor could they be, by reason of their tender age. But if, as above shown, it is true that the ikrar is one of a series of transactions, that it is closely connected with the adoption, that the use of the boys was a necessary part of the attempt to accomplish the Rajah's wishes, and that their position in life was substantially altered by taking them away from their natural families for an indefinite time, it seems to their Lordships impossible to maintain that they are strangers in the matter, and that they cannot insist on the performance of the contract by which each Rance bound herself to the other to deal with the estate in their favour.

The decree of the Appellate Court dismissing the suit should be discharged. The decree of the Original Court cannot be restored, partly because it proceeds on the ground that the boys take under the will, and partly because the accounts directed by it are not applicable under the circumstances. Their Lordships think that the decree should take the following form:—

Declare that, according to the true construction of the testator's will, the property thereby given to the Thakoor therein mentioned was given for the purpose of securing the proper performance of the sheba of the said Thakoor and the other family Thakoors in the will mentioned, and the prescribed monthly allowances, and the proper performance of the daily and fixed rites and ceremonies as they were performed and met in the testator's lifetime.

Declare that the other dispositions of the will are inoperative, and that on the testator's death his two widows were his heirs-at-law, and as such became shebais of the Thakoor, and entitled for the widows' estate to such interests in the testator's property as remained undisposed of by the will.

Declare that according to the true construction of the ikrar, and in the events which have happened, the Plaintiff on attaining his majority became entitled to the accumulations of one moiety of the surplus income of the testator's property after answering the various charges and outgoings in the ikrar in that behalf mentioned.

Declare that, upon attaining his majority, the Plaintiff became entitled to receive one moiety of such surplus income during the life of the Defendant Doorgasundari.

Declare that the Defendant Annadaprasad Roy, also called Norendrokeshav Roy, is entitled to the other moiety of such surplus income during the life of the Defendant Doorgasundari, and to the accumulations thereof.

Direct the Court below to order an account to be taken of the testator's property at his death, and of all the income thereof which has come to the hands of his widows, or of either of them, or of any person by their order or on their behalf or for their use during the life of the Defendant Doorgasundari.

Also an account of what has been properly expended upon the sheba, and monthly allowances, and the daily and fixed rites and ceremonies mentioned in the will, and upon the several outgoings and charges mentioned in the ikrar as precedent to the division of the property between the two widows, and of the respective necessary expenses of the widows, and of the maintenance and education of their respective adopted sons.

Any other questions arising out of the relief granted must be reserved for further directions by the Court below.

As regards costs, their Lordships consider that these unhappy disputes have arisen mainly out of the testator's will, and the apparently quite honest attempt of his widows and heirs to fulfil his intentions. It is only just that the costs of the parties in both the Courts below, including the costs of this appeal, should be defrayed out of the corpus of his estate.

They will humbly advise Her Majesty accordingly.

After this case had been argued, their Lordships received an intimation that the Defendant Doorgasundari had died. This death made the suit defective in two respects; first, by the death of the then heir the inheritance ceased to be represented; secondly, there was no person in whose presence the accounts directed against the widows could properly be taken. The proceedings were suspended, in order that these defects might be cured; but though the Rajah's heir has been brought into the suit, there is still no representative of the widows. Their Lordships, however, think that it is not necessary on account of this defect to delay the decree any longer. It rests with the Plaintiff to apply to the Court below for all such parties as are necessary for this purpose to be brought upon the record.

VISIONS OF THE PAST.

(A FRAGMENT.)

BY THE LATE MICHAEL M. S. DUTT,

Author of "The Captive Ladie," "Meghnathvada" (Bengali epic), &c., &c.

[Concluded from page 193]

X.

I look'd—it came that fulgent vision bright
In splendour which no human tongue may name!
Millions and millions of bright beings enshrin'd
On cars of wing'd radiancy and crown'd
In diadems all lustrous—sheening far,
Came thronging round a throne of purest ray,
Zon'd by the rain-bow brighter far than when Upon yon blue expanse it once unful'd
Its gorgeous wings of purple and of gold,
To tell sad Nature, trembling still in awe,
Of dove-eyed Peace and everlasting rest—
Awful it was that throne and round it play'd
Flashes of vivid lightning—and methought
The æry beings which around it throng'd
Submiss and minstrant, veiled with starry wings
Their eyes before its fulgence—dazzling all,—
And on that throne I saw what once the Son
Of Buzi, by thee, Chebar I lucid stream—
When with thy liquid murmurs there he came
To mingle his sad plaint—a captive lone!
Th' unutterable Majesty Eterne! †

I look'd—it came that fulgent vision bright—
A fleet of light upon a crystal sea!
And as it came the shadowy beings which throng'd
And hung around that bow'r of loveliness
Like misty curtains, fled speed-wing'd and fast,
—As when, Bengala! on thy sultry plains
Beneath the pillar'd and high arched shade
Of some proud Banyan—slumberous haunt and cool—
Echo in mimic accents 'mong the flocks,
Couch'd there in noon-tide rest and soft repose,
Repeats the dentening and deep-thunder'd roar
Of him—the royal wanderer of thy woods!
They fled—that darksome crew and as they fled
I saw that bow'r of beauty—but how chang'd—
How chang'd, alas! from primal loveliness!
As if some desolation-breathing blast
Had wing'd in blighting sweeps its dark career
Over its fairy beauty—withering all!
But where were they, the gentle beings and fair

I erst beheld within that blushing bow'r—
Pent in each other's arms in balmy rest?
Methought I saw them stand with pallid brow
Eclips'd—as when from out the starless realm
Of the dark Grave—by Fancy fondly woo'd—
In mid-night resurrection, the pale shade
Of what was once ador'd and beautiful,
Stands by the mourner's pillow—silently!
But as they saw that æry vision bright,
They fled like Guilt behind a leafy tree.—
I stood as one entranced and sight and sense
Slumber'd in deep oblivion and dark.

XII.

I woke—that vision of ethereal ray
Had melted—and 'twas night again and dark,
With stars of sickly smile and pallid brow:—
I look'd tow'rd that fair bow'r and as I look'd
I saw a sword of flame and fiery gleam
Wav'd round it by some viewless hand and fierce!
And on the silent plain that gentle pair—
Its tenants—wander in dim solitude.
They wept—but were those tears which gently flow'd,
Oh! were they tears which dark despair will wake
—'T' embalm the memory of our blasted hopes?
They wept—but not in dark despair—they wept
As Guilt—all penitent—when, Mercy! thou
Dost plead—nor plead in vain—in gentle strains
To justice stern to win redeeming grace!

THE antiquated Zemindari Dak Cess in Bengal is not to be abolished. Government has, however, been so far moved that the cess, instead of being a variable charge, is to be fixed for at least five years, beginning with January 1893. It should, besides, be in tolerably round figures, if possible, such as eight annas, twelve annas, one rupee, one rupee four annas, and so on, and in any case there should be no pias and no decimals. The kist, also, should be a single one only, and its date should agree with the date of one of the land revenue kists, probably the largest one of the year.

ANOTHER jewel robbery scandal involving the honour of a gentlewoman is promised from England. The story as given by the London Correspondent of a Yorkshire newspaper is, that a lady of good position unaccountably missed a valuable brooch which she months after chanced to see exposed for sale as she passed a shop. She immediately claimed her own. The jeweller said he had purchased the brooch from a lady, mentioning her name. That lady was her dear friend—the wife of an officer in India—whom she remembered having assisted in packing for a journey and whose departure was followed by the discovery of her own loss. She did not care to make a fuss about the jewel, even though it was her pet ornament, but she could not have any further communications with her. So she wrote to her in India to that effect, stating the cause. That lady—the writee, if we may use such a word—denied the serious charge and in token of earnestness has gone to court against her old friend.

Cornhill contains some reminiscences of the late Frederick Lehmann from the pen of his son. There are in the article several capital stories about Lord Chief Justice Cockburn. The old man eloquent was a fine specimen of the British bear. Sir John Millais once said of him,

"You should never have that man on your premises without having the fire engines ready to act." One day Sir Alexander Cockburn and Sir Edwin Landseer were dining at Mr. Lehmann's house at Muswell-hill:—"When the ladies had left the table some one spoke of Shakespeare, and Landseer remarked that even Shakespeare had made mistakes, for in 'As You Like It' he makes 'a poor sequestered stag' shed 'big round tears.' 'Now,' said Landseer, 'I have made stags my especial study, and I know for a fact that it is quite impossible for them to shed tears.' Most of us were inclined to accept this statement as a curious and innocent Shakespearean commentary, but Cockburn suddenly startled us by turning upon Landseer and asking him in a loud voice, 'And don't you think you are committing a most unwarrantable impertinence in criticising Shakespeare?' A bomb exploding in our midst could not have created more dismay than this violent and unexpected exclamation."

HERE is a glimpse of the Lushais, from Mr. McCabe, Political among them :—

"I have regularly paid the Lushai coolies at the rate of 4 annas a day, and it was very amusing to note the manner in which they regarded the 4-anna piece. As a rule, they looked at it laughingly, and said it was a very small rupee; but some bestowed it ostentatiously on their children, implying that it was beneath their dignity to retain it. As soon, however, as they found that I was prepared to exchange a rupee for four 4-anna bits, the assumed indifference vanished, and I had to sit for some time imparting the elementary lesson that four quarters make one whole."

Notwithstanding all the nonsense about the "noble savage," savagery seems to be akin to simplicity of a particularly weak kind. We knew a poor demented fellow who was done out of his money by a dishonest neighbour with whom he deposited his Rupees and who afterwards returned him only the same number of two anna pieces, saying that the Rupees had been reduced to that condition, the depositor having made no timely provision for their feed.

M. CARNOT, son of the President of the French Republic, is on a visit to Calcutta.

OUR friend—the truest and best, if not the only true—Bahoo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee has received from America, the Continent which made him a Doctor under the rather forbidding and jaw-breaking name of Sambul Mukhopadhyaya, a cordial invitation to attend the Annual Convention of the National American Institute of Homoeopathy which will be this year held at the seat of Federal Government in the United States.

Accompanying the letter of President Kinne, is a circular which is interesting as revealing the pride of the citizens of the great Republic in their capital and some of the sources of that pride. Accordingly, we give it entire for the benefit of our readers :—

"AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF HOMOEOPATHY.

Local Committee of Arrangements :

J. B. G. Custis, M. D., Chairman, 110 East Capitol Street.
Wm. R. King, M. D., Secretary, 812 Eleventh Street N. W.

Washington, D. C., January, 1892.

DEAR DOCTOR :

As you know, the Institute will meet here June 13th; the Local Committee is anxious that the meeting shall be well attended and hopes that you will decide to come; take what you advise for your patients—a vacation, which can not be taken at a better time than between the winter and summer diseases. This meeting of the Institute will not be of advantage to you in a professional way alone, but the social relaxation and the many places of interest in the city will make the visit one of special interest; the sessions of Congress and all the activity that pertains to them, the Executive Departments, the Medical Museum with innumerable pathological specimens, and a medical library of nearly one hundred thousand volumes, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing where the paper money is produced, the largest Printing Office in the world, the Gun Factory, Mount Vernon, the Government Hospital for the Insane, and many other places of interest will all contribute to make attendance at the coming meeting memorable.

"What so rare as a day in June?" applies to Washington as well as to Massachusetts; the temperature is not excessive, comparing favorably with more northern cities, and many years it is quite cool for the season; vegetation is at its height; flowers are in full bloom—roses everywhere; the perfume of the honeysuckle fills the balmy evening air and the stroller is tempted far beyond the usual hour for retiring; the chill of the mountain and the dampness of the shore that come with nightfall are lacking here; the wide streets allow a free circulation of air, while abundant shade modifies the daily heat.

The Committee desires to see the wives and daughters and will make special provision for their entertainment.

Washington is the banner city in its representation in the Institute, more than three-quarters of her medical society being members; but we hope that you will do your best to make your town or county surpass us next year; if you can not bring the applicants with you bring their applications for membership and thus keep up last year's memorable record of admissions; let Unity and Fraternity be the motto of our meeting.

From Washington you can reach many points of interest: Old Point Comfort, Richmond, the battlefields, the mountain and seashore resorts, the Luray Caverns, and any northern or southern point quickly, easily and at moderate expense. The Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio, the Chesapeake & Ohio, and the Atlantic Coast Lines all concentrate here, with an unsurpassed car service.

The hotel arrangements will be ample and, the Committee thinks, satisfactory.

An excursion to Mount Vernon will be made a pleasant feature of the meeting.

In short, the Committee will do its best to help the visiting members enjoy their visit and urges you to come.

DR. SAMBUL MUKHOPADHYAYA,
Wellington Square, Calcutta, India."

THE two Mahomedans who were charged with having, in conjunction with others, outraged Ruttun Bai, a Bora girl, on the 15th February last, near Job's Circle in Mahaluxmi, were last week tried at the Bombay High Court Sessions. The common jury convicted them both, and the Judge agreeing sentenced them to transportation for life. Mr. Justice Bayley said that this was one of the worst case that had come to his notice and he extremely regretted that all the fellows concerned were not captured.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE House of Commons has rejected, at the second reading, by a majority of twenty-two votes, the Woman's Suffrage Bill. Mr. Gladstone spoke against it.

IT is said that Russia has offered to Persia a loan of half a million sterling at 6 per cent. interest to pay off Great Britain and the tobacco monopoly indemnity. How many millions does Russia herself borrow?

THE anarchists of Paris are avenging the arrest of Ravachol. The restaurant where he was arrested was completely wrecked on the 25th by the explosion of a bomb. The proprietor is seriously injured and is in a precarious condition.

THE trial of Ravachol and his four associates commenced on the 26th and concluded the next day. The trial was short and quiet. The chief culprit made a clean breast of the affair, narrating how he managed the explosions. The Public Prosecutor demanded a full verdict free from all pity. The Jury, however, found extenuating circumstances. Ravachol and Simon were sentenced to penal servitude for life and the remainder acquitted. There is public indignation at the sentences.

THE Standard's report of the fighting between Catholics and Protestants in Uganda, needs confirmation. It is not credited by the British Government.

MOWBRAY NICHOLL seems to be two different persons, Mowbray being the publisher and Nicholl, the editor of the anarchist paper the Commonweal. Both of them stand committed for trial.

THE American President's policy seems calculated to cheer up all who are suffering from the depreciation of silver.

In a message to the Senate regarding the Silver Conference, he expresses his belief that the full use of silver as a coin metal will promote the prosperity of peoples, at home and abroad. Accordingly, he will lose no opportunity to secure the largest use of silver.

ANOTHER unsavoury scandal! Another Honourable Roman in difficulty! The Hon'ble Mr. Patrick Nugent has been committed on the charge of indecent assault, on a girl, in a railway carriage, on the Brighton line. The accused strongly denies the charge.

TENDERS were invited by the Secretary of State for India for an Indian Railway loan of £1,300,000, at 3% interest with a minimum rate for tenders at 94. The list closed on the 29th. The tenders amounted to £4,050,000 at 96.13 and upwards. Those at the former figure received 10 per cent. and above in full.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL Sir Lewis Pelly, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., M.P., Bombay Staff Corps, who, in 1874, arrested Mulharao, is dead. He had some time back been reported ill, but with extraordinary elasticity he appeared at the Hamstead Constitutional Club on April 6, to deliver an address on "The Empire and its Responsibilities." It was a desperate feat, but death is not to be suppressed by pluck and endurance. It was on him on the 6th as a fortnight after when he expired. Pelly was the last of the grand old race of the Indian soldier-civilians. His death is a loss to the Empire.

It is curious that the announcement of the death of the old political, is followed by the news of the departure, next week, of the present Gaekwar accompanied by the Maharanee for England.

THE Indian Councils Bill is passing through Committee. On the 25th, Sir W. Plowden brought forward a series of amendments for adoption of elective principle, to be either withdrawn or rejected. Mr. Maclean's motion that the Viceroy should not adopt the elective principle without the consent of Parliament, too, found no favor. It was rejected by ninety-one votes against twenty-four. The amendment was opposed by Mr. Curzon who was of opinion that, besides creating friction, it assumed a danger which was neither here nor there. Mr. Maclean, with larger experience, contended that it was a mistake to suppose that no public opinion existed in India, as there was a free press which largely criticized Government action. And so much the better for it! This Member of Parliament was so terrified at the shadow of Parliamentary institutions for this country, that he was convinced that if representative government were granted, Great Britain must prepare to abandon India. Not yet—not so soon, Mr. Maclean! Referring to the Hume circulars, he thought that the writer deserved to be hanged or shot as a traitor. Hardly worth powder or rope, Mr. Mac. It would be taking him at his word, and giving him the pleasure of a new sensation. It would, perhaps, be just the thing he wants—just what he has been so long seeking to drive the public and Government to. It would be relief to the perturbed spirit. Martyrdom is the only chance left to the doubly disappointed man. Sober men would rather wish both writer and speaker safe within the walls of an asylum. Mr. Hume has replied to Mr. Maclean in a letter to the Times. He, of course, denies that he is a rebel. Except under Police pressure, few accused confess. But he is vain enough to regard himself as a Cassandra. He is certainly a horrible male vixen.

THE Indian Councils Bill has turned the head of Mr. Maclean, and drawn out the old Editor of the Bombay Gazette. He has taken to vilification of the Bengalis as the remote cause of the Congress and the Bill. The people of this part of the Indies are the veriest scum of the earth. By way of ecce signum, he offers Macaulay. He writes to the Globe :—

Sir,—I see that you have given a prominent place in the Globe to a letter from a number of Bengalee gentlemen residing in London, who propose to hold a public meeting in order to denounce me for having, as they think, slandered their race in certain passages of my speech on the Indian Councils Bill. So far as I am concerned, they are welcome to hold as many public meetings as they like. But I should wish them to have for their guidance a correct version of what I really said. I contended that the success or failure of representative government is a question of race, and that education affects national character far less than is commonly supposed. I went on to say : 'The barons who could not sign their names to Magna Charta were as wise and far-seeing statesmen as Burke and Macaulay, and the simplest and most unlettered English peasant, who belongs to a race that has the instinctive love of freedom in its life-blood, and that has practised self-government and respect for individual rights from before the dawn of history, is more capable of taking part in the administration of public affairs than the highly gifted Bengalee, who can discourse as fluently as Mr. Gladstone himself, but whose people have been slaves, nay, the bondsmen of slaves, for fifty generations.' This is not a reproach ; it is a mere statement of a physiological fact.

The expression 'slaves,—nay the bondsmen of slaves,' is, of course, a reminiscence of a line in Byron's description of the modern Greeks under Turkish rule, and it is strictly appropriate to the condition of the Bengalees under the sway of the Mogul Emperors of India. There may be a slight flourish of rhetoric in the phrase 'fifty generations,'—one can never be certain as to a year or two in calculations of this kind—but the substantial accuracy of the statement cannot be seriously disputed. Compare Macaulay, in the essay on Warren Hastings :—'The physical organisation of the Bengalee is feeble even to effeminacy. During many ages he has been trampled upon by men of bolder and more hardy breeds. Courage, independence, veracity are qualities to which his constitution and his situation are equally unfavourable. His mind bears a singular analogy to his body. It is weak even to helplessness for purposes of manly resistance ; but its suppleness and its tact move the children of sterner climates to admiration not unmingled with contempt. What the horns are to the buffalo, what the paw is to the tiger, what the sting is to the bee, what beauty, according to the old Greek song is to woman, deceit is to the Bengalee. . . . all those millions do not furnish one sepoy to the armies of the company.'

If we enable this effeminate, untrustworthy race, by means of an adroit manipulation of the 'elective principle' contained in the Kimberley clause of Lord Cross's Bill to obtain the balance of power in the Legislative Council of India, the fighting race of India on whom we so largely depend for the protection of the empire will spit upon and spurn our rule. When such a catastrophe is brought within the range of possibilities, it seems to me to be the duty of a member of Parliament to speak out even at the risk of hurting the feelings of the amiable gentlemen whose wrath I have aroused. I am Sir, your obedient servant,—J.M. Maclean."

There let that exhibition of the malice and folly of the two Macs.—hail-fellows-well-met—stand gibbeted in lasting infamy !

HASHIM ALI, the disturber of the Black Mountain, has apparently spent his quiver, and is believed to be preparing how to make his peace with our Government on the best terms.

ON Friday s'ennight there was a flutter, if not panic, at Darjeeling, from the unexpected news that the Raja of Sikkim had suddenly fled from the country with his family. The origin of this movement was unknown, but its importance was obvious. Goaded by British interference, the king had gone northwards, to Tibet, and it was naturally feared that the flight would be followed by a raid from that country. An immediate strengthening of the garrison at Gnatong was recommended.

Since then distinct information has been received from Sikkim. It appears that the Raja avoided the more difficult direct route through his own frontiers, intending to reach Tibet by the easier Nepal pass nearest to Sikkim. In thus crossing over, however, into Nepalese territory, with his Lares and Penates, in every sense, his traps and paraphernalia, the whole party was detained at the Nepalese outpost by the Durbar garrison, pending orders from Katmandu. The Raja's movements were doubtless much impeded by the severe weather. His Rancee and young children, all suffered, and one infant died from the cold. The Lamas who had accompanied him returned when his object was discovered, and the very coolies deserted him.

It is reported from the Hills that drinking water is being sold at Simla at four annas a skin, so serious is the scarcity. We are almost glad, as glad as Sydney Smith would have been had a fat Anglican bishop been locked up in a railway carriage when an alarm of "Fire !" was given—the nearest thing to a bishop being burned—the witty Dean's condition sine qua non of railway reform. In this country we can never expect a Member of Council to die of thirst.

So we must content ourselves with the next best thing at Simla. The severity of this water famine at the door of our Gods may rouse all Olympus to do its duty in this connection. From Hills to plains, the whole empire is suffering from this dire calamity. What ! is the difficulty beyond statesmanship ?

AT the late attack on the Tuichong Camp by the Lushais, a remarkable feat of heroism was performed by a native private. The sudden appearance of the enemy found the guard on duty wide awake and equal to the emergency. The savages were promptly challenged by Saligram Singh, of the 3rd Bengal Infantry, who stood sentry. He was met by a discharge of bullets, of which two hit him in the right thigh. The poor fellow called out for help as he dropped. He dropped not flat on the ground, however, but only on his knee, to maintain the battle himself till the rest of his party came. This was not before he had expended ten rounds of ammunition. Of course, he received many wounds : his whole uniform, belt and all, was found riddled with shot. We hope the Commander-in-Chief will lose no time to show his appreciation of such soldierly conduct.

THE present French Republic seems as particular in its sumptuary regulations as the proudest Bourbon. Its urzbeghi—master of ceremonies—for introducing the foreign Ambassadors, is Comte d'Ormeson, a scion of an ancient house, who would have nothing to say to the flippant moderns who do not believe in the etiquette of costume. He has been waging resolute war against looseness of habit. According to an oft-quoted mot of his,

"That Government is in a bad way which cannot afford to buy a uniform for the Premier and his Minister."

He has succeeded in sending back the flaunting overcoat to its original obscurity. The British in Paris are specially unhappy at this. As a French paper says :—

"You can imagine that the English are rather surprised at having to appear in uniform or dress coat—the English, who even marry in an overcoat and grey trousers."

THE new British Ambassador is, of course, an exception to the rule of British barbarism. Lord Dufferin, indeed, is a citizen of the world, and is certainly more at home in Paris than he would be in London. Polished in manners, soft in voice and sweet in speech, and altogether fascinating, he is scrupulous, though not vain, in dress. He maintains the dignity of the embassy by exacting in his guests attention to propriety of costume as well as of conduct. Of late years, "politicals" and Civilians generally had been accustomed to appear at afternoon parties in morning dress or mufti. No such irregularities now. At the very first afternoon reception held by Her Britannic Majesty's Representative at the Court of the Republic, the rule was observed of uniform for those entitled to it and frockcoat and white cravat for the rest.

All that is quite in keeping with his Lordship's antecedents. Lord Dufferin's attention to sumptuary details was observed in his viceroyalty in the Far East. His argus eye could scarcely help noticing the looseness, in this particular, to which the native gentlemen were fast lapsing, and he naturally wished to arrest, if possible, their progress in an undesirable path. But he got small thanks for his solicitude in their behalf. His fine artistic sense, in especial, was shocked at the unfortunate taste of our countrymen to dress themselves up in the at once awkward and inconvenient habiliments of Europeans. One would have thought that the deliberate and politely worded advice of a cosmopolitan statesman, distinguished for his sympathy with Orientals and his admiration for the picturesque side of the Orient would not hurt the amour propre of our friends but rather lead them to see the error of their way. Not in the least ! The only effect of the well meant remark was burning indignation. Many of the Indian gentlemen never again showed their faces in viceregal presence, so long at least as the offending nobleman ruled. Nor was that all. Instead of brooding at home in silence over their wrong, they communicated their resentment to their people and agitated against him and vilified his administration. Here was the real secret of the crusade against Lord Dufferin by the Congress Camp and the Radical part of the native Press.

VICEADMIRAL Don Jose Maria Beranger who has returned to the charge of the ministry of the Marine, is a thorough Spanish knight and a true Hidalgo. He resigned in November last to save his honor.

And how was his honor in jeopardy, the reader fancies? He threw up the service of his country and left the cabinet simply to—fight a duel, with a literary man—the editor of the Resumen. The meeting took place in the suburbs of Madrid on the 6th November, at half past ten in the morning. The weather was forbidding, but the two Iberians were too dreadfully in earnest in their bloody resolution to brook delay. So under pelting rain they met. The word was given to fire but only one pistol—the admiral's—was discharged, without hurting. The knight of the quill's instrument would not go off. One would have thought that there would be an end of it and the two gentlemen would now part as friends. But the nicety of Peninsular honour was not yet satisfied. The bull-fight patronising Spaniard was not to be defrauded even by an accident out of his scene of blood. The Don had not given up the highest office in his profession to be content with a stage fight. He meant business. "I have not," cried he, "I have not come here for nothing." So they had another encounter. This time both pistols were properly discharged, though luckily without touching either belligerent. Honour was now declared to be satisfied.

We of the East can only wonder at all this. The Spaniards are of course civilised and Christian, while we are semi-civilised at best, and Heathen, besides being the slaves of slaves for fifty generations certain, by a year or two more or less, as the physiologico-historian or historico-physiologist in the House of Commons has calculated.—Vide his letter to the Globe.

AMONG the duties of the King in the Hindu system is to preserve trees. The ruler is particularly warned against cutting down fruit-bearing trees, the value of which to the people is obvious. In Great Britain the law recognises the value of trees and woods as things of beauty, enhancing the prospect. For some time a domestic feud is going on in a noble house touching arboricide. Matters have gone so far that the heir of the dukedom of Sutherland has arraigned his father. Young Lord Stafford has sought the protection of Court for the leafy patriarchs on the estate against the devastating policy or rather propensity of the present holder of the property. Our sympathies are entirely with the young nobleman. It is vandalism of the worst kind to demolish or injure trees. They are among the most important as well as most interesting of God's handiwork. They not only please the eye but also afford food and fuel, shelter and even raiment, to man and beast. Indeed, besides their direct benefit to man, they support and sustain countless beings which are indirectly more or less useful to him. All this is obvious, but there are other truths not so obvious but scarcely less important. The connection of arboriculture with climatology and meteorology has been recognised in our day. We remember when trees and woods were regarded as pests—the source and haunt indeed of pests—of disease and death. Under this lamentable delusion, venerable monarchs of the botanical kingdom—monumental cocoanuts and even worshipful banyans were ruthlessly cut down in this country by a foreign magistracy proud of their pseudo-science. Within the last twenty or twenty-five years, however, a change came over the spirit of their dream and the work of God was spared. Plant life came to be regarded with more respect and even affection. But the mischief perpetrated could not be rectified. The felled cocoanut, mango and bair trees could not be restored. Much as science had advanced even to the accomplishing of marvels hitherto un contemplated, we cannot make anything like a tree, or so much as a leaf of the meanest plant. Hence the responsibility of respecting tree life all the greater.

Trentham with its fine pieces of water and its "leafy labyrinths" is a paradise in the midst of the hideous gaping coal-pits and pottery kilns and chimneys of Staffordshire. What a pity to disestablish the woods of such a bower! The "king of kings" was so struck with the magnificence of Trentham and the evidence of wealth all about the place as well as the cost of his reception there, that he expressed his wonder to the Prince of Wales how the monarchy permitted such a powerful subject. The Imperial visitor went so far as to advise the beheading of the Duke for all the pains his Grace took to entertain his Majesty in a right sumptuous style. What a perversity that the Duke should now himself try to denude his own palace and pleasure-grounds and deface and destroy the work of generations!

REGARDING the leader in our last "Sir Auckland Colvin's Address to the Mahomedans at Allahabad," a Mahomedan under date Lucknow,

April 27, writes to us:—

The Mahomedan community cannot be sufficiently thankful to you for your able and disinterested advocacy of their cause. I have read with great pleasure and interest your very just and sound remarks on the historical speech of Sir Auckland Colvin, and can assure you that the article in question is being greatly admired and eagerly read by all English-knowing and educated Mahomedans of these provinces. If you had not, with your usual fearlessness and independence, explained the bearing and the true meaning and the delicate and hazy references made in that address, it would have remained a puzzle for ever to such of the public who were not fully aware of the history of the Trustees Bill quarrel and the unfortunate stormy controversy, mostly in the Urdu journals of the Punjab and the North-Western Provinces, which followed. The attacks against Samiullah Khan and his party were directed from many directions in which the Surmore Gazette took a most leading part. It is an open secret that this paper was started under the patronage of the Aligarh party by a protégé of Sir Ahmed Khan in some obscure place in the Panjab (as the name indicates) for the sole purpose of dislodging Samiullah Khan from his strong position by somewhat a flank attack and diverting the attention of the public from the centre of the battle field and its main issues. For months and months it went on pouring all sorts of bullets on the heads of the Syud's opponents without any regard for their position or past services. Other friendly Urdu papers of Delhi and Lucknow, including the Aligarh Gazette, fired at the enemy under the cover of this fire from their high position.

The lamentable young minister Munirul Mulk, younger brother of Sir Salar Jung II, was also utilised for this purpose, and a long article appeared in his name supporting Sir Ahmed Khan, although a glance at it would show that it was not written by him and that it bore unmistakable marks of the fingers of some experienced and staunch friend of the Syud's. Hyderabad nobles and officials are not seldom used in that fashion, as you must have seen.

Had Sir Auckland Colvin seen all that and known the dodges employed for defeating Samiullah Khan and his friends, he would have been satisfied as to the just cause of the opposition of these gentlemen. The committee which passed the so-called Trustee Bill was a packed jury. Every right-minded and well-informed man knows it to be a hole and corner business, all prearranged.

The object was to deprive Samiullah Khan or some other able man of the secretaryship and to make the Aligarh college a sort of personal property (to remain for generations under the control and administration of the family of its founder,) and that object was gained somehow or other. This is the long and short of the whole thing, and this has alienated from the Syud his best and true friends, even many of those who do not look upon him as anti-Islamite. The old Knight may well exclaim "my friends have fallen from me as leaves in autumn from a tree."

There is no native journal in these provinces which would have dared to throw so much light on the subject, and there is hardly any powerful pen like your's which we could command. The European journals do not take much interest in our affairs, and it was next to impossible to expect such an advocacy from them.

THE Indian Daily News has promptly pulled the long ears extended to it by its next door neighbour in British Indian Street, in his capacity of ostensible Editor of the Hindoo Patriot. Says our contemporary:—

"The system of foreshadowing honours seems ineradicable in some portions of the Press. The Friend of India used to be the greatest sinner in this respect, and had always some one in pickle for ever office from the Viceroy to the chuprassies. The Patriot seems to have taken charge of the honours nominations."

Then the News quotes from the Hindoo Patriot, which gravely says, "Among the recipients of Birthday Honours, we hope to find the name of Baboo——, Personal Assistant to——. Baboo—— has been, for several years, successfully discharging the duties," &c.

With equal gravity, the Indian Daily News adds a scarcely less interesting piece of intelligence, mingled with a hope similarly officious, if not equally official:—

"There is an excellent duftry in the Government Printing office. It is hoped he will not be overlooked."

That is one of the richest retorts we have seen in the Indian press for many a day. It dishes the pretender completely, though it is doubtful whether the victim will recognise its effect. Verbum sat, to be sure. But then it requires the condition of sap—an unwarrantable presumption in the present case. Anyhow, it is not a case calling for sympathy, except for the victim of the victim. The Bengali editor himself invited the castigation. But the other Baboo, who is a respectable man and deserving officer, is really to be pitied.

THE death is announced of Miss Amelia Betham Edwards, the well known lady novelist. Some of her stories and travelling sketches are charming reading. Latterly, however, she turned a new leaf. In an evil hour for her as well as the world, she took to antiquities, and of all things in the universe Egyptian archæology. It was a great mistake. She lost the public ear in her wonted line, without gaining it in another. By dint of exertion, she soon enough mastered the rudiments of her new department, but there she stuck. In Egyptology she remained a tyro to the last. Her scholarship and attainments were not equal to making new conquests. She could not possibly compete with the savants who occupied the field and had devoted their lives to the subject. A woman of uncommon energy as well as fine parts and accomplishments, she made desperate efforts. It was all Love's Labour Lost. She could at best take rank as a populariser of Egyptology. At last, dissatisfied with herself she started and organized an Egyptian Exploration, which, by its excavations at Abou-Simbel, forty miles below the second Cataract, made important contributions to our knowledge. After all, Miss Edwards will be best remembered in connection with Egypt by her capital book, A Thousand Miles up the Nile, published in 1877.

MR. PRICE's party has killed at last one man-eater which is believed to be the notorious Bhut—ghost. It is about 8 feet in length. It is very difficult to positively identify the animal, but the probability is that the man-eater in question has been killed. Just as the party with their elephants were beating the jungles at some place in search of the enemy, a man came running and informed Mr. Price that he had seen the terrible man-eater just a few minutes before and would be able to recognise it, as only a few days before it had killed his wife. The party at once followed this man and searched for the leopard in the jungles, but no trace of it could be found. They then divided and went in different directions, when Mr. Caxton's party saw the man-eater on a tree where it was either hiding itself or sitting in ambush waiting for an opportunity to pounce upon some poor unsuspecting villager. As the elephant went nearer, it charged the huge tusker with a jump from the tree but fell to Mr. Caxton's shot. Mr. Price has also seen a female in the neighbourhood and believes that she has two cubs also. He thinks that this is the family of the man-eater, and unless all three are destroyed the people would not be safe. The Hindu Ranjika wrongly gave out that the leopard in question was killed by Kumar Gopalendra Narayan Roy, of Putia, who was all this time at head-quarters and never went out for shikar.

THE sudden and mysterious transfer of Babu Dhonesh Chunder Roy, 1st Personal Assistant to the Commissioner of Patna, to Monghyr, in the general line, has taken many by surprise. He served in that post since Babu D. G. Banerji came to Calcutta and did tolerably well in office and was able to please his superiors. A Mahomedan officer has been taken from Jessore to his place, of whose antecedents we do not know much. The late Moulvi Daliluddin was the first Mahomedan who acted in that post for a short time under Sir Steuart Bayley while Commissioner of Patna. The position is a most difficult and rather dangerous one, and especially so for a Mahomedan. As it was, we know it requires great tact, much experience, political sagacity, much strength of character and ability enough to do the current duties. It is very good to have a Mahomedan for such a position in a place where the Mahomedan element is predominant and supreme, but we doubt the wisdom of the selection by the new Commissioner who himself knows little or nothing of the Division over which he presides. Such an officer in the first place must command the respect of the Mahomedans of that historic city as an educated man, in the sense in which the words are understood by the polished and educated Mahomedans well versed in their own languages, and by his other personal and social qualifications, otherwise he would be quite useless out of his office, and not always efficient in it.

ON Friday at evening dusk, the annual meeting of the Calcutta Reading Rooms and Literary Institute was held at the lofty colonaded and arched hall of the Oriental Seminary—by the kindness of whose authorities the institution is housed free. In the absence of the President, the Hon'ble H. J. S. Cotton, routed from town by the heat, the Vice-President, Dr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee, took the chair. At the end of the business there was some speaking. Baboo Mohini Mohan Chatterjee, one of the Honorary Secretaries, delivered interesting remarks, seasoned with his recollections of the American Athens. The Chairman concluded with a long address. The usual business of the evening over, the Chairman again rose and said that a body of Bengali citizens could not well part without some expression of their opinion on the outrage just committed in England on their whole race by a member of Parliament. He noticed at length with natural warmth Mr. Maclean's letter. Mr. Mohini Mohan Chatterjee followed and moved a condemnatory Resolution on Mr. Maclean which was carried by acclamation.

THE ASTRONOMY OF FAMINE.

THE connection, yet inexplicable but long since demonstrated by facts, which exists between the sun and terrestrial magnetism, received a further brilliant confirmation on the evening of the 13th February last. A gigantic solar spot, as has not been seen within the last few years, was visible on the 5th February, 1892, on the east side of the sun. It traversed the disc by virtue of the movement of solar rotation and disappeared on the 18th by the west side. It traversed the central meridian on the 12th. This enormous spot was composed of a large number of adjacent ones, all clearly defined. It attained about one-sixth of the solar diameter, and was visible to the naked eye ten hours consecutively from the 7th to the 16th. On the 9th, this immense group included not less than 142 spots. The movements of the spots were considerably cyclonic. The largest spot was six times and a half larger than our planet, and the whole group covered a surface equal to a hundred times the earth. If so, what then? it may be asked. The sun is far away from us. Notwithstanding the distance, on the 13th, a great magnetic perturbation was observed in almost all the magnetic observatories of the globe.

This extraordinary disturbance was almost unprecedented. At any rate, nothing at all equal to it has been observed within the last 10 years. It began abruptly towards the morning and was repeated the following night. This magnetic trepidation subsided on the evening of the 14th.

In Canada and the United States, on the nights of the 13th and the 14th, a magnificent Aurora Borealis was visible from the Atlantic coast to the State of Iowa, extending on the northern celestial hemisphere all entire. It was also equally visible this side the Ocean, the sky being clear, in many parts of Europe, especially in Switzerland, France and Italy.

These extraordinary celestial phenomena have something more than a merely academic interest. Without believing in the superstitions of astrology, it must be admitted that the great worlds floating about in space, not in wild confusion but in settled order, each with its appointed course, have a distinct influence on the earth which is such a humble member of their society. The connection between tides and the phases of the moon are known and admitted throughout the world. The influence of the earth's satellite on the health of man, though not acknowledged by European science, is a matter of common experience in India. The influence of the seasons and of the different divisions of the day, is admitted even in Europe, however reluctantly. Of late years, it must be admitted, from the more extended intercourse between Europe and Asia, the film is vanishing from European eyes, the old dogmatism is passing away, the prejudice of orthodox science is being less and less, and there is a better disposition to receive, or at least to consider, the truths verified by long ages of experience in the East and familiar to the meanest in these countries.

Indeed, there is already in some quarters a disposition to the extravagance of neophytes. Some Europeans are prepared to receive with open arms and unquestioning faith, everything from Eastern sources, while others show themselves more Oriental than the Orientals themselves. That can of course be but a temporary aberration, or at least one confined within the narrowest limits or an insignificant circle. Meanwhile, the general effect of Eastern thought and experience upon the European mind has been distinctly broadening and deepening. It has enlightened the conservatism of the learned and dissipated the prejudices of the scientific. Paradoxical as it may sound, science has been its worst enemy. The history of the progress of the human mind is, in great part, but the history of the struggles of truths with prescription, science with dogma. It is a record of the desperate conflicts of discoverers with Old Knowledge—oftentimes mere Old Ignorance—enthroned in Faculties. That over-confidence of the dons and experts have been shaken and their mischievous bigotry impaired. The vanity of the possession of the final gospel is far from being abandoned, as may be seen in the attitude of orthodox science to the truths of Phrenology, Mesmerism and Homœopathy. But there is now rather more humility, and towards this the light from the East has contributed much. A new spirit of earnestness and reverence is now observable, leading to the most extraordinary discoveries and important conclusions therefrom in regions hitherto supposed to be either barren or exhausted. It is thus that a new light has been thrown upon the meteorology of agriculture. The go-ahead Americans have gone to the length of trying to bring down showers from heaven by artificial thundering. However desperate the game, it is a most interesting experiment, in which other nations are following the trans-Atlantic pioneers. India, which is periodically scourged by scarcity and decimated by famine resulting from drought, has an intimate interest in all prescriptions against these visitations. No wonder, that in our country the idea of controlling the atmosphere has been taken up with avidity, and trials with dynamite are being made in different parts. For our part, we would rather rest our hopes upon the discovery of the laws which govern earth and air, so as to be able to avoid danger, without pretending to govern them ourselves. We refer to such theories as that of Professor Blanford who holds that the rainfall of a year is dependent upon deficient snowfall in the mountains. Another notable theory which was popularised by Sir William Hunter was the sun-spot theory of famine, of which we have been reminded by the facts hereinbefore stated. It had been started by the well-known astronomers, Messrs. Meldrum and Lockyer, who propounded the simultaneity of the greatest rainfall with the period of maximum solar spots. Dr. (now Sir W. W.) Hunter, on the authority of Mr. Robinson's observations, came to a different conclusion. It was this eminent publicist who rescued the subject from the dust and cobwebs of scientific societies and Philosophical Transactions to make it a topic of, if you will, dilettanti discussion and general human interest. Taking a long record of sun-spots and comparing it with the meteorological and agricultural record, Sir W. Hunter saw a curious correlation between the solar phenomena and terrestrial drought and distress. The periodicity of the one coincided with the periodicity of the other. In plain terms, whenever the spots appeared least in the sun, there was deficient rainfall and poor crops. That theory has been applauded by some as a master-piece of generalization and run down by others as a chimera without scientific basis, until it became popularly discredited. It has again met with a turn of luck, we believe, in some measure. But we are by no means sanguine. It will be difficult for the theory to recover completely from the effects of the blow struck at it by Professor Blanford's facts and figures. He has shown "that the worst famine during the present century, that of 1837-38, was produced by deficient rainfall of two consecutive years of maximum sun spots, and the famine of 1861 in the North-Western Provinces followed on the maximum sun spot year 1860." The year 1891 and 92 also coincides with the period of the maximum solar spots and the comparative scarcity we are now undergoing. It is only a guess work at present and it will take some time to come to a definite conclusion about the relation of famine to maximum or minimum sun spots. The subject certainly deserves careful study, specially in a vast agricultural continent like this, which is subject to periodic calamity for want of moisture in the soil.

THE FIRST MEETING OF THE NEW CORPORATION.

THE first meeting of the new Calcutta Corporation was held on Thursday the 21st. It was originally announced for the previous Thursday, but on account of the Easter holidays commencing the next day, it was postponed by order of the Chairman. There were present, besides the Chairman and Vice-Chairman, 66 Commissioners, out of the 75 forming the body corporate, composed of 50 elected by the general body of ratepayers, 15 nominated by Government, 4 elected by the Chamber of Commerce, 4 by the Trades Association and 2 by the Port Commissioners. The chief business was the election of the General Committee, the ruling body of the Corporation. It is by law "the Budget and Finance Committee of the Corporation" and empowered to "transact such other business as may be expressly referred to it by the Corporation or as may not be referred to any other standing or Special Committee." Though subject to the Commissioners-in-meeting and bound by any resolution passed by them, the Committee has an independent existence of its own, its word being supreme, for "when the Chairman and the majority of the General Committee are in accord, and inconvenience is likely to result from delay, it shall not be necessary before action is taken to wait for the confirmation of the Commissioners in meeting, but if the Commissioners in meeting do not confirm the action of the General Committee, such steps shall be taken to carry out the orders of the Commissioners as may still be practicable." It was natural, therefore, that the formation of the General Committee should excite the utmost and general interest.

The General Committee is elected annually. It consists of eighteen Commissioners. Twelve are elected by the Commissioners elected by the general body of ratepayers "in such manner as the Commissioners in meeting may direct," that is the whole body of Commissioners. The remaining six are supplied by the Government Commissioners and delegates of other bodies corporate, "in accordance with such rules as the Local Government may prescribe." These rules, as Gazetted in 1889, are:—

1. The Chairman shall, previous to the appointment of the General Committee in each year, write to each of the Commissioners nominated under section 7 and elected under the last clause of section 8, and ask whether he desires to serve on the General Committee.

2. At the meeting, whether ordinary or special, at which the General Committee is to be appointed, the Chairman shall circulate a list of the Commissioners referred to in the last rule who have announced their desire to serve on the General Committee.

3. Each of the Commissioners nominated under section 7 and elected under the last clause of section 8, who is present at the general meeting, shall thereupon write down the names of six Commissioners out of the 25 nominated and elected as aforesaid, and hand them to the Chairman, who shall count the votes, and the six Commissioners who obtain the largest number of votes shall be appointed members of the General Committee."

The elected Commissioners distributed the number over the town proper and the suburbs in the proportion of 9 and 3, thus:—

ELECTED COMMISSIONERS.

	Votes.
Baboo Nolin Behary Sircar ...	35
Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee ...	32
Baboo Narendro Nath Sen ...	30
Baboo Kally Nath Mitter ...	27
Moulvie Budruddin Haider ...	27
Baboo Bhoopendro Nath Bose ...	26
Mr. J. Ghosal ...	25
Baboo Lall Behary Bysack ...	20
Baboo Sew Bux Bogla ...	20

SUBURBAN COMMISSIONERS.

	Votes.
Baboo Pran Nath Pundit ...	32
Baboo Preo Nath Mullick ...	24
Baboo Kanti Chunder Banerjee ...	22

An error has since been discovered. There will be another meeting next Thursday to "rectify the error that has occurred in the return of members to the General Committee at the election which took place on the 21st instant. The Chairman to announce that Kumar Dinendro Narain Roy secured more votes than Baboo Sewbux Bogla and Baboo Lall Behary Bysack, who tied with 20 votes. The elected Commissioners to vote again on the tie."

The nominated Commissioners returned, are:—

NOMINATED COMMISSIONERS.

	Votes.
Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur ...	19
Dr. R. C. Sanders ...	18
Maharajah Sir Narendra Krishna ...	17
Mr. H. M. Rustomjee ...	15
Mr. E. F. Longley ...	12
Baboo Joy Gobind Law ...	11

There was a tie between Baboo Joygobind Law, Nawab Syed Ameer Hossein and Baboo Doorgagutty Banerjee. The Chairman gave his casting vote in favor of Baboo Law. This exercise of power by the Chairman has been objected to as not legal. The rules plainly do not give him any authority to interfere in the election, which is left entirely to the other than general Commissioners themselves. The proper course, it seems, would have been to put up the three names again, for election. But the Chairman was advised that he had the power to decide the matter at once. He was told that though the rules excluded all but those who were to return the six members, he as the Chief of the Corporation had his casting vote, and he at once declared Baboo Joygobind Law as duly elected by his extraneous vote.

The law, we find, gives the Chairman casting vote at the general election by ratepayers. Thus:—

"Whenever an equal number of votes is given to two or more candidates at any election under this Act, the candidate for whom the greatest number of rate-payers have voted shall be held to be elected and in case of an equality of votes in this respect, the Chairman shall give a casting vote, and the candidate to whom such vote is given shall be held to be elected."

We are not sure how far Mr. Lee was justified in importing his power in the election of the General Committee. It is a question which might fitly be taken up by the Commissioners themselves. It is peculiarly the province of the nominated Commissioners. The rate-payers of Calcutta are equally interested, and we hope their representatives in the Corporation will not neglect them in the present instance.

THE ANDOOL RAJ.

Andul is a small but prosperous village, about eight miles west of the City of Palaces. Its gigantic Rajbatee spontaneously strikes the mind with the idea of grandeur and excites curiosity. Unlike the lowly mansions in other parts of the country which are generally dedicated to frivolity and mirth, revelries and orgies, its classic pillars give no umbrage to Apollo and the muses. Situated as it is on the north side of the Saraswati, it to all intents and purposes seem to be closely associated with ideas that breathe ambrosial odour and fill the atmosphere with moral freshness.

Fortunately for the use which had contained within its walls an illustrious family who by their liberal gifts and noble deeds had won the heart of all and spread peace and comfort all around; fortunately for Andul that like a fond mother glories in the success of her darlings; and fortunately for the inhabitants whose power of appreciation and regard for the interests of those who had cast in their lot with theirs; all parties combined and all sorts of people without distinction speak highly of the noble stock which was the ornament of the locality and of this stately mansion, the recipient thereof. The history of the Raj Family originated with its patriarch Dewan Ram Charan Roy, who, while Clive was struggling hard for laying the foundation of this vast Indian empire, having rendered the East India Company valuable service as Clerk, obtained for his reward the office of Dewan, in which he made his vast fortune. He was succeeded by his worthy son Raja Ram Lochan Roy, who, to make himself more conspicuous, commenced a bright career of gentleness and charity, by which he ingratiated himself into the favour of the Marquis of Cornwallis; when the hero of Brandywine and the vanquisher of Tipu Sahib conferred on him the title of Raja Bahadoor.

Then came by the law of inheritance Raja Kasee Nath the wise. Possessed of soft manners and a melting heart, he lost no opportunity to relieve distress and alleviate the sufferings of the poor. Besides these, he was a patron of education, whose cause he had espoused with all a patriot's zeal; and men of letters gathered around him as the bees with their humming noise hover over the water-lily.

Times rolled on and in due course his beloved son Raja Raj Narayan occupied the seat of his revered parent, and, following in the latter's footsteps gained universal applause. Curiously enough, a tinge of military spirit diversified the character of this young ambitious Raja, which, in absence of opportunity for cultivation, sought expression in hunting excursions and keeping a race stud at a heavy cost. It was an interesting period. Occidental civilisation had for sometime already embraced India within the sphere of its influence. Latterly her sons had begun to be indoctrinated in the mysteries of the learning of the West. Among the sons of wealth and scions of nobility, Raj Narayan was the first to be anointed with its oil, whose balmy influence soothed his restless spirit. The slightest such lubrication was never to go for nothing, even in its initiatory rite, and as wealthy men began to understand its value they came forward with eleemosynary grants for the support of schools and colleges. Nor was the munificence confined to the service of education; but embraced all kinds of good works. This was altogether a novel custom and experience in the land. Raj Narayan was one of those whose example served to keep up the enlightened departure. Thus, along with other munificent donors (the Paikpara family and others) for the erection of the Fever Hospital, he contributed a round sum of rupees twenty thousand.

His private gifts kept pace with his public donations and endeared him to all. His patriotic deeds and private virtues moved our benign Government which was not slow at the recognition of merit, and, accordingly, not merely the title of Raja Bahadoor but the military distinction of a sword, shield and a Khelat, was bestowed upon him by the Governor-General. Thus passed away the vesper of Andul to make room for the Lucifer. Raja Bejoy Keshub was "The Last of the Mohicans"—the last of the direct line. He was in nonage when his father died. On account of which Babu Pran Krishna, the elder brother of Khetra Krishna Mitter, both of them grandsons of Raja Kasee Nath by their mother's side, reared him up.

Naturally as cousins to each other and more so for their being his sole guides in young age, Raja Bejoy Keshub had the highest regard for his cousins, and their feelings were brotherly. Ushered into the world on tapestry, it was usual to suppose that enjoyments and pleasures would predominate over his mind, but mysterious Nature sometimes seems to grow in antithesis and a religious bent of mind and the life of a recluse marked him for their own. This surprise shed additional lustre on his exalted position. Honest in his dealings, moral in principles and devout in his thoughts, he ran a godly, not to say godly, course of life, neglecting to look after his affairs. This was a source of great concern to his family and a large number of people interested in his welfare. Their hearty good will led them to see him turned into a worldly man, but no amount of logic could persuade him to leave the path of rectitude, and God, who loves his dutiful sons, relieved the worldly pangs of his beloved. He married two wives by whom he had no issue. His untimely death changed the whole aspect of affairs, inasmuch as it gave a high opportunity to many to alienate the mind of the two widows from Babu Kheta Krishna who has since succeeded to the property. With a view to deprive him of his legitimate claim and frustrate the ends of justice, nefarious means had been adopted and schemes set on foot by ingenious men maddened with greed of gain, who are never wanting at such conjunctures, to intrigue for the consummation of their purposes. This jumbo by their machinations for a while retarded the natural course of things and, strange to say, Heaven seemed to favour their prospects. People in general were anxious enough to see truth come out triumphant, but they were long disappointed. However, at last the hour came. Now that the cloud of obscurity is over from the horizon, it affords pleasure to all disinterested observers to find the sun emanate his radiance all around.

Babu Kheta is now the absolute master of the vast property which comes down to him by the hand of Providence. He is descended from the noted Konnagar Mittra Family, whose bounty and hospitality are too well known to be enumerated here. Kind and affable as he is, his bewitching manners like the mimosa invite and attract people to him. Unassumingness and conviviality qualify him to make friends. Easy to forgive and ready to befriend characteristically point him out. Kind Nature always partial to her favourites, has been simply prodigal of her gift to him. Noble at heart, his magnanimity on one particular occasion stood the fiery ordeal. One of his bitterest enemies, who had all through life used harsh words and sneering taunts to him at length, by the turn of the wheel of fortune, came within his clutches, but without paying him in his own coin (as retaliation is brutal), he gave him a very cordial treatment, and when the people, recollecting how the rogue had dealt with him, were ready to a man, out of regard for, and attachment to, the Babu, to fall on him, he and his sons, Babus Upendra Nath and Nogendra Nath, forgetting for the time their own position, entreated them not to wreak their vengeance on their behalf on him. While as an additional testimony of high morale, both the sons escorted him up to Mauri. Truly, Babu Khetra commands admiration and picks up the good will of all. He intends to construct a separate building for the Benevolent Institution founded after his name, whose permanency has been one of his life's chief care. A charitable dispensary to distribute medicine to the poor, a thorough repair of the Rajgunge Road and the bridge over the Saraswati, are in contemplation, and we hail the day when these will be accomplished facts. In conclusion, I must give all due credit, and it is not small, to the manager, Babu Shib Chandra Mullick, who, like Sada Siva, is quickly propitiable and bears an exemplary character. As secretary to the school, he shows the teaching staff a paternal fondness and gives them every legitimate indulgence. Nothing as an honest soul is further from his mind than the idea to offend and oppress others. It is a great pleasure to see the right man in the right place.

Letters to Local Governments and Administrations, dated the 14th February 1890, forwarding a copy of the Secretary of State's Despatch, and making suggestions as to the manner in which its decisions may best be given effect to.

Replies from the Local Governments and Administrations consulted.

The Despatch of the Government of India to the Secretary of State, No. 9, dated the 10th February 1892, stating the conclusions arrived at by the Governor General in Council on the subject.

The reply of the Secretary of State, No. 30, dated the 24th March 1892, concurring in the conclusions set forth by the Government of India.

RESOLUTION.

In his Despatch No. 104, dated 12th September 1889, the Secretary of State for India in Council announced the decision at which he had arrived on the recommendations made in the Report of the Commission appointed in 1886 to consider the question of the admission of Natives of India to higher and more extensive employment in the Civil administration of the country.

2. The Secretary of State's Despatch having been communicated to the Local Governments and Administrations for consideration, and their replies having been received, the Governor-General in Council is now in a position to pass orders upon the most important points calling for determination.

3. The following appointments in each province shall for the present be entered in the list as open to the Provincial Service:--

Madras.--Heads of Districts 2, District Judges 4, Sub-Collectors, Head Assistants, and Assistant Collectors 7. Secretary to the Board of Revenue 1, Under Secretary to Government 1---Total 15.

Bombay.--Heads of Districts 2, Judges 2, Joint Judge 1, Assistant Judges 2, Assistant Collectors 9, Talukdari Settlement Officer 1, Registrar of the High Court 1---Total 18.

Bengal.--Heads of Districts 4, District Judges 6, Joint and Assistant Magistrates 8, Secretary to the Board of Revenue 1, Under Secretary to Government 1---Total 20.

North-Western Provinces and Oudh.--Heads of Districts 2, District and Sessions Judges 4, Joint and Assistant Magistrates 9, Junior Secretary, Board of Revenue, 1, Assistant Settlement officers 2, Assistant Director of Land Records and Agriculture 1, Small Cause Court Judges, Allahabad and Lucknow, 2---Total 21.

Punjab.--Heads of Districts 2, Divisional Judges 2, District Judges 2, Assistant Commissioners 3, Junior Secretary to Financial Commissioner 1, Settlement Collectorships 2---Total 12.

4. Before passing orders as to the Central Provinces, His Excellency will await a further expression of Mr. MacDonnell's views on the question. And the Government of India is constrained to agree in the opinion expressed by successive Chief Commissioners of Assam that that province is not yet ripe for the admission of provincial officers to any of the reserved posts. It appears that the Provincial Service in Assam is largely recruited from Bengal, and that it would be almost, if not quite, impossible, in view of the progress in education and the administrative aptitudes of the people, to find within any time which can now be foreseen an indigenous officer who could be utilized in one of these posts. Assam must, therefore, like Burma, for the present remain outside the scope of the present orders.

5. Dealing in the first instance only with the superior appointments, and reserving for the next paragraph the case of Joint and Assistant Magistrates and Collectors, the following are the rates of pay for officers of the Provincial Service in each grade, which the Secretary of State has sanctioned:--

Madras.--Judicial---Judge, 1st Grade, Rs. 1,600; Judge, 2nd Grade, Rs. 1,200;

Executive---Collector, 1st Grade, Rs. 1,600; Collector, 2nd Grade, Rs. 1,200; Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Rs. 1,000; Under Secretary to Government, Rs. 700.

6. The Government of India have determined, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to amalgamate the scheduled posts on the Executive side subordinate to the headship of a district with the existing grades of Deputy Magistrates and Collectors.

These posts are the following:--Madras 7, Bombay 9, Bengal 8, North-Western Provinces and Oudh 9, Punjab 3.

In all these Provinces the majority of them are at present held by Statutory Civilians appointed under the rules of 1879, while in some they are still occupied by officers of the Civil Service of India or Commissions appointed before 1882. Until these Statutory Civil Servants are provided for, either by promotion or by amalgamation with the new Provincial Service, the posts which they hold cannot be thrown into the general cadre of the latter service; but when that happens, and when the prior claims of officers of the Civil Service of India and Commissions have been satisfied, the posts now specified should be distributed as follows among the existing grades of Deputy Magistrates and Collectors and Extra Assistant Commissioners :—

Madras.—Two posts in the 1st Grade on Rs. 700 (corresponding to Sub-Collector); four posts in the 3rd Grade on Rs. 500 (corresponding to Head Assistant); one post in the 5th Grade on Rs. 300 (corresponding to passed Assistant).

Bengal.—Two posts in the 3rd Grade on Rs. 600 (corresponding to Joint Magistrate, 1st Grade); two posts in the 4th Grade on Rs. 500, (corresponding to Joint Magistrate, 2nd Grade); two posts in the 5th Grade on Rs. 400; two posts in the 6th Grade on Rs. 300 (corresponding to Assistant Magistrates on Rs. 500 and Rs. 450, respectively).

Bombay.—Three posts in the 3rd Grade on Rs. 600, (corresponding to First Assistant); four posts in the 4th Grade on Rs. 500 (corresponding to Second Assistant); two posts in the 6th Grade on Rs. 300 (corresponding to passed Assistant).

North-Western Provinces and Oudh.—Four posts in the 5th Grade on Rs. 600 (corresponding to Joint Magistrates and Assistant Commissioners, 1st Grade); five posts in the 3rd Grade on Rs. 400, (corresponding to Joint Magistrates and Assistant Commissioners, 2nd Grade).

Punjab.—One post of Extra Assistant Commissioner, 3rd Grade, on Rs. 600 (corresponding to Assistant Commissioner, 1st Grade); one post of Extra Assistant Commissioner, 5th Grade, on Rs. 400 (corresponding to Assistant Commissioner, 2nd Grade); one post of Extra Assistant Commissioner, 6th Grade, on Rs. 300 (corresponding to Assistant Commissioner, 3rd Grade).

7. The addition of these posts to the cadre of the Provincial Service will necessitate recruitment in the lower grades to supply the place of those who will be moved up to fill them; and this can take place at once where the condition of the Service demands it. Those Statutory Civilians who were appointed in the various provinces in 1889 and 1890 on the understanding that they would be transferred to the Provincial Service when it was constituted should now be gazetted to their appropriate places in that Service. In accordance with the decision of the Secretary of State, they will, like other Statutory Civil Servants who join the Provincial Service, be understood to have a preferential claim for promotion to the scheduled posts (subject, of course, to the special claims of members of the Civil Service of India and officers of the Commissions appointed before 1882) over the other members of that Service.

8. The Statutory rules of 1879 now require the approval and sanction of the Governor General in Council to all nominations made by Local Governments. These nominations are at present ordinarily to offices in the subordinate ranks of the Covenanted Civil Service. The subordinate posts included in the list being thrown open to the Provincial Service, the Local Government will no longer require the sanction of the Government of India to appointments to them. His Excellency in Council, however, thinks that for the present it will be necessary to retain the rule requiring such sanction in the case of appointments (whether permanent or officiating for a period exceeding three months) under the Statute to Headships of Districts and District Judgeships in Madras, Bombay, Bengal, and the North-Western Provinces and Oudh, and to Headships of Districts, Divisional Judgeships, and Settlement Collectorships in the Punjab. He is willing that in the case of all other scheduled appointments the Local Government should nominate without reference to him. He is also willing that in the case of officiating appointments of Provincial Officers for short vacancies, not exceeding three months at a time, to Headships of Districts and the other posts mentioned above, such reference should be dispensed with. Such short vacancies will afford the means of testing an officer's fitness for more extended employment in those posts; and, in reporting for sanction nominations for longer periods, it should always be stated whether an officer has been tried in this manner, and with what result. As a general rule the Governor General in Council thinks that it will be prudent to take every suitable opportunity of thus ascertaining an officer's capacity before proposing to employ him permanently in these important and responsible posts. His Excellency in Council also desires to correct the impression which appears to have prevailed in some quarters that it will be necessary for a Provincial Civil Servant to go through the whole succession of subordinate grades in the Executive or Judicial Service before he can be selected for a scheduled post. On the contrary, it will always be desirable to select persons for higher executive office who, while they have given proof of distinguished ability by sufficiently long service, are still comparatively young, and possess that bodily activity which is a sine qua non for such employment. Every appointment of the kind must be based wholly upon fitness and merit, seniority being regarded only when the claims of two or more officers who are equally fit come into competition. Nor does the Governor General in Council intend that selection should be less absolute or more restricted to the higher grades of the Provincial Service in the case of Judicial appointments. It has been much the custom to regard promotion from grade to grade of the Subordinate Executive and Judicial Services as a mere matter of seniority; and it should be made publicly known that every Government and Administration reserves liberty to make promotions in these grades without regard to seniority.

9. In Appendix A attached to this Resolution will be found an example of the form in which the Government of India think that the list of appointments open to the Provincial Service should be published by the Local Government. Each Local Government should frame and issue its list accordingly. In the Quarterly Provincial Civil List this form should, with the omission of the last paragraph, be prefixed to that division of the list which exhibits the appointments held by members of the Provincial Service. In lieu of the last paragraph a note should be entered in the list of subordinate offices against each grade to which additions have been made referring to the notification, and stating that "To this grade.....appointments have been added as representing the same number of appointments of.....now treated as open to the.....Civil Service."

10. The Government of India recently directed that each Statutory Civilian appointed before the close of 1889 might be called upon to choose whether he would retain his present position or be transferred to the Provincial Service with an acknowledgment of his preferential claims to promotion to scheduled appointments before other members of the Provincial Service. As regards Bengal, Madras, the North-West Provinces, and Central Provinces, only one Statutory Civilian has elected to enter the Provincial Service. In Bombay and the Punjab they have not yet made their election. But as it is not improbable that some obscurity may still remain in the minds of the officers who were called upon to make their election in regard to the advantages and disadvantages to them of the transfer, a further opportunity ought to be afforded these gentlemen of reconsidering the decision at which they have provisionally arrived. The Governor General in Council will address Local Governments and Administrations again on this subject in a separate communication.

11. The present Uncovenanted Service Leave and Pension Rules, or, in other words, the provisions of Part III, Chapter XIV, of the Civil Service Regulations regarding leave, and of Part IV, Chapters XV to XIX, regarding pension, will be applied to the Provincial Service. But the present Statutory Civilians, whether they enter that Service or not, will continue to be governed by the Leave and Pension Rules now applicable to them.

12. After considering the suggestions made by the Local Governments and Administrations, the Governor General in Council has prepared a revised draft of Rules for the appointment of Natives of India to offices reserved under the Statute of 1861, which will be submitted in due course for the sanction of the Secretary of State for India in Council, and, if approved by him, will be published for general information.

13. As regards the rules for admission to the Provincial Service in each Province, and the precise place where the line should be drawn between the Provincial and Subordinate Services, the Government of India propose to address the Local Governments and Administrations separately, as there are great differences in the circumstances of the several Provinces and the classes from which the local officials must be drawn.

Order.—Ordered, that this Resolution be communicated to Local Governments and Administrations, and that it be published in the Gazette of India for general information. [True Extract.] C. J. Lyall, Secretary to the Government of India.

APPENDIX A. (REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH 9.)

With the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, the Governor in Council is pleased to notify that the following appointments in the Madras Presidency, to fill which members of the Civil Service of India have hitherto been recruited, shall be appointments to which members of the Madras Civil Service can properly be appointed, subject to the rules for the time being in force under 33 Vict., Cap. 3, Section 6:—

Four posts of District and Sessions Judge; two posts of Collector and Magistrate of a District; one post of Secretary to the Board of Revenue; one post of Under-Secretary to Government.

2. When these posts are held by members of the Madras Civil Service their pay shall be as follows:—

District and Sessions Judge—If in the 1st Grade Rs. 1,600, if in the 2nd Grade Rs. 1,200, Collector and Magistrates—If in the 1st Grade Rs. 1,600, if in the 2nd Grade Rs. 1,200; Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Rs. 1,000; Under-Secretary to Government Rs. 700.

3. In addition to these appointments the following appointments, for which recruitment has hitherto been made in the Civil Service of India, have been thrown open to the Madras Civil Service, and added to the existing grades of that Service:—

Two posts of Sub-Collector and Joint-Magistrate, four posts of Head Assistant to the Collector and Magistrate, one post of Assistant Collector and Magistrate, converted into—two posts of Deputy Magistrate and Collector, 1st Grade, on Rs. 700, four posts of Deputy Magistrate and Collector, 3rd Grade, on Rs. 500, one post of Deputy Magistrate and Collector, 5th Grade, on Rs. 300.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Sure Relief.—The weak and enervated suffer severely from nervous affections when storms or electric disturbances agitate the atmosphere. Neuralgia, gouty pangs, and flying pains, very distressing to a delicate system, may be readily removed by rubbing this Ointment upon the affected part after it has been fomented with warm water. The Pills taken occasionally in the doses prescribed by the instructions keep the digestion in order, excite a free flow of healthy bile, and regenerate the impoverished blood with richer materials, resulting from thoroughly assimilated food, wanting which, the strongest must inevitably soon sink into feebleness, and the delicate find it difficult to maintain existence. Holloway's Ointment and Pills are infallible remedies.

INTRODUCTION TO THE CAPTIVE LADIE.*

BY THE LATE MICHAEL M. S. DUTT,

Author of "Sermista," (a drama in Bengali and in English,) "Meghnathvada" (Bengali epic), &c.

Being Stanzas addressed to the Poet's wife.

To—

I.

Come, list thee, gentle one!—and whilst the lyre
Breathes softer melody for thee, mine own!
I'll weave the sunny dreams, those eyes inspire,
In wreathes to consecrate to thee alone,—
Love's offering, gentle one!—to Beauty's queenly throne.

II.

'Tis sweet to gaze upon those eyes where Love
Has treasur'd all his rays of softest beam;—
'Tis sweet to see thee smile as from above
Some child of Light,—such as we often dream
Doth dwell on planet pale,—or star of golden gleam.

III.

The heart which once has sigh'd in solitude,
And yearn'd to unlock the fount where softly lie
Its gentlest feelings,—well may shun the mood
Of grief—so cold—when thou, dear one! art nigh,
To sun it with thy smile,—Love's lustrous radiancy!

IV.

The home of youth, 'tis far,—oh! far away,—
The hopes of youth, they've fled and taught to weep,—
The friends of youth, e'en they,—oh! where are they?
Ask memory and the dreams which haunt in sleep,— Wing'd messengers and sweet, from Past! thy Donjon keep!

V.

But must I weep e'en now as once I wept,
Midst life's gay—crowded scenes, unmark'd and lone,
Where bitterest thoughts of solitude oft crept
To chill the bosom's glow,—when thou, mine own!
Dost smile in tranquil joy like star on sapphire throne?

VI.

Yes,—like that star which, on the wilderness
Of vasty ocean, woos the anxious eye
Of lonely mariner,—and woos to bless,—
For there be Hope writ on her brow on high:
He recks not darkling waves,—nor fears the lightless sky!

VII.

Oh! beautiful as Inspiration, when
She fills the Poet's breast,—her fairy shrine—
Wood'd by melodious worship!—welcome then,—
Thou'rt the home of Want,—I ne'er repine,
Art thou not there—e'en thou—a priceless gem and mine?

VIII. *

Life hath its dreams to beautify its scene,—
And sun-light for its desert;—but there be None softer in its store—of brighter sheen—
Than Love—than gentle Love: and thou to me
Art that sweet dream, mine own! in glad reality!

IX.

Though bitter be the echo of the tale
Of my youth's wither'd spring—I sigh not now;
For I am as a tree when some sweet gale
Doth sweep away the sere leaves from each bough,
And wake far greener charms to re-adorn its brow!

Then come and list thee to the minstrel-lyre
And Lay of Eld of this my father-land,
When first, as unchain'd demons, breathing fire,
Wild, stranger foe-men trod her sunny strand,
And pluck'd her brightest gems with rude, unsparing land.

The world's dark frowns may damp,—its coldness chill
The kindling altar which the Heart hath rear'd
For deep—devoted—life-long worship,—still
Be thine the soothing smile by Love endear'd:—
Eve's dew must heal the flow'r by day's hot breathings sear'd!

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE result of the last Entrance Examination of the Calcutta University, exclusive of the Patna Circle, is, First Division, 398, Second, 876, Third, 592, or a total of 1,866 passed students.

THE Calcutta Gazette of May 4, notifies the new rules under the Indian Factories Act, 1881. Among them occur the following:—

"8. The occupier of a factory shall cause a sufficient supply of good water to be kept at a suitable place or places on the factory premises for the use of the operatives. A tap or taps connected with any public water-works, from which a sufficient quantity of water can at all times be drawn as required, shall be deemed a sufficient supply for the purpose of this rule. When the operatives cannot leave their places, the occupier shall cause the water to be carried to them as required or at reasonable intervals.

9. Every factory shall be provided with sufficient accommodation in respect of latrines and urinals, which shall be kept in a cleanly state. The accommodation for male and female operatives shall be separate.

10. Every factory shall be kept in a clean state and free from effluvia arising from any drain, privy, or other nuisance. All refuse likely to be injurious to health shall be removed with as little delay as possible.

11. Every factory shall be ventilated in such manner as to render harmless, as far as is practicable, the gases, vapours, dust, or other impurities generated in the course of the processes carried on therein that may be injurious to health.

12. All the inside walls of the rooms of a factory, and all the ceilings or tops of such rooms, and all the passages and staircases shall be lime-washed at least once in two years, dating from the time of last lime-washing.

* The Captive Ladie (An Indian Tale). In Two Cantos. By M. M. S. Dutt. Madras: Printed at the Advertiser Press, 1849.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

13. All the beams, rafters, doors and other wood-work shall be painted or varnished once in six years, and shall be kept in a cleanly state.

14. A factory shall not be so overcrowded while work is carried on therein as to be injurious to the health of the persons employed therein."

These regulations might well be applied to native dwelling houses. But what a hubbub would be raised if the Calcutta Corporation attempted the sanitary reform!

The rules, we find, allow an appeal to the Commissioner of the Division, and in Calcutta to the Commissioner of Police, from every order of an Inspector under section 12, clause C. of the Act, or under certain others of the rules. "The appeal shall be in the form of a memorandum of appeal similar to that contained in the 4th schedule of the Civil Procedure Code, No. 173, and shall bear a stamp the value of which should be regulated by article 11, Schedule II of the Court-fees Act." The rules thus give the Commissioner of Police judicial powers—the first attempt of the kind, we believe. We are not also sure that any rules under an Act can legally bind her Majesty's subjects to pay any stamp duty where it is not sanctioned by the legislature itself.

WHO was the wealthy Mahomedan gentleman of advanced age who recently died at Ootacamund, of whom it is reported that he lay nightly on chests of specie amounting to no less than eight lacs of rupees?

THE Morning Post summarises the reports of violent crimes by the last mail.

"A father near Oswestry killed one of his children, attacked two others, and then made an attempt upon his own life. A man confessed to the murder of his wife and two children in Belfast. A man at Melksham, Wiltshire, shot dead the uncle of a girl who had refused to marry him after the banns had been published. He was at large for several days, and when some constables discovered his whereabouts and proceeded to arrest him, he shot one of them dead. He said his intention was to have shot his sweetheart, could he have found her. At Blaenavon, Wales, a man murdered his wife and then cut his own throat. A mother in Edinburgh murdered her child and then attempted her own life. A man murdered his wife at High Wycombe and then committed suicide."

THE sensation of the Rajabai Tower Tragedy is still being kept up in Bombay. The Committee have prepared a monster petition for presentation to the Secretary of State for India in Council. In the words of the Committee, the memorial,

"after referring to the facts of the case and the strong prima facie circumstantial evidence of an actual or attempted outrage supplied by the peculiar injuries on the bodies and the condition of the clothes of the deceased ladies and the verdict of the Coroner's jury, adverts to the monster memorial presented to the Bombay Government for the appointment of an independent commission of inquiry and for ensuring justice in Aslaj's case. Referring to the trial of Aslaj, the memorial points out the very unsatisfactory conditions under which, owing to technical rules of procedure and the conduct and attitude of the police, the trial was conducted, and how important witnesses like Dr. Smith and Superintendent MacDermott, who were subjected to satisfactory cross-examination before the Coroner, escaped all cross-examination before the Sessions Court, and their evidence passed unchallenged, and how witnesses who had given evidence practically in favour of the accused were called, not by the accused but by the Crown and thus avoided cross-examination,—a proceeding which the learned Judge himself characterised as an act of 'mistaken kindness' to the accused. The memorial proceeds to explain the utter unsuitability of such a trial to discover the truth or to throw any light on the proceedings of the police in reference to the inquiry. It is complained that evidence corroborative of the important evidence of Mr. Enty, though brought to the notice of the prosecution, was not called, and it is said that certain evidence having an important bearing on the case and explaining how the police hampered and misdirected the inquiry, has not yet seen the light. The memorial comments strongly on the acts and omissions of the police, and charges that the failure to unearth the crime and discover the truth has been due to its antagonistic attitude. Commenting on the medical evidence recorded in the case, the memorial shows, that Dr. Smith's evidence consists of mere surmises, and that under cross-examination he was obliged to modify his original confident opinion against the theory of outrage almost into harmony with the evidence of the other doctors, who confidently asserted that it was a case of outrage. It quotes the valuable testimony of the Lancet and the British Medical Journal which appeared in those papers after the conclusion of the Sessions trial, which strongly supports the popular theory of outrage, and which is confirmed by the unaccountable and unexplained disappearance of the spectacles, the head-dress and, among other items of evidence, sacred thread of one of the ladies, and the peculiar condition of the clothes of the other. Reference is made to the story of the bundle of clothes, and the failure of the police to follow up the important clue for 56 hours, and to Mr. Marzban's unequivocal contradiction of the police version of that incident. Exception is taken to the opinion expressed by Government that the theory of outrage had been thoroughly examined and discredited, that there was a lack of data for an inquiry such as was demanded of Government, and that the appointment of a commission would argue prima facie distrust of the police. It is emphatically asserted that there has been no inquiry at all into the popular theory, that on Superintendent MacDermott's own admission all inquiry in that direction was finally stopped within a few hours of the occurrence of the tragedy, that the real issues have not been raised or determined, that sufficient data have already been furnished by private enterprise and more information would be forthcoming before a strong and properly constituted tribunal, that distrust of the police already exists, and that it would be intensified by an omission to hold the necessary inquiry. It is submitted that the Police in this case has grossly neglected and disregarded its duty and generally exposed itself to serious criticism, and that the public safety and interests of justice alike demand the holding of a full and independent inquiry, which the memorial prays for, not on any personal grounds, but for reasons of public policy."

The memorial has been prepared by Mr. Eardley Norton of Madras at a cost of Rs. 2,500 as his fee and Rs. 500 as remuneration to the gentleman who went to Madras to give Mr. Norton his instructions. The memorial has been adopted at a public meeting. The Sheriff refused to call the meeting, as there was a counter application. The leaders of the Parsee community, it seems, keep away from this fresh demonstration.

Besides the said Rs. 2,500, the Committee have sanctioned another like sum for other expenses.

A HIGHLY revolting conduct of a Jemadar of the Lahore Central Jail is being enquired into. On the 18th April, for disobedience of order and neglect of duty, he abused and thrashed with a baton a convict. The convict retaliated by splashing dirty water on his assailant's face. This was highly unbecoming on the part of a prisoner in a jail and deserved adequate punishment. The form of discipline determined upon by the Daroga and executed by the Jemadar with the assistance of two mehters, was to put dirt into the mouth of the impertinent convict. The other inmates of the jail resented this treatment of one of them, refused food for two days and threatened to kill the Jemadar and the Daroga if they were not properly punished for breaking the caste of their brother convict. Before there was any outbreak, the matter was reported to the authorities, and it is being enquired into by the Assistant Commissioner.

GENERAL Kodolitsch, a retired cavalry officer in the Austro-Hungarian Army, while touring in India with his wife, last touring season, came to Calcutta and lived in the Spence's Hotel. They attended the Vice-regal State ball in January. On their return to their quarters in the Hotel, they found the door of their room on the second floor locked, the key left by their butler Mahadoo Limbajee Bundsaday, an old man, on the ground floor, and Rs. 1,600 in currency notes missing. Suspicion falling on Mahadoo, he was arrested in Poona and his property, consisting of ornaments, bank deposits, &c.,—seized. They are detained in court under section 523 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and the accused released without being pronounced guilty or otherwise. The property is to remain in the magistrate's court, until the contending parties established their claim to it in a civil court.

DEATH is announced of the Rev. William Edward Buckley, who was, for several years, Professor of Anglo-Saxon at Oxford, and afterwards filled the chair of classical literature in the old East India College at Haileybury with distinguished success.

MR. Oertel, who had been deputed from Upper India by the Supreme Government to report on the antiquities of Burmah, has completed his investigations. With Captain Temple, he visited Mandalay, Sagaing, Pagan, Prome, Rangoon, Pegu and Moulmain, and took a large number of photographs of the Budhistic temples and remains of those places.

THE Raja of Manda, in a letter from his Superintendent Nagendra Nath Kar, to the Pioneer, has offered to join a movement, if set on foot, to keep alive the memory of the retired Mr. Justice Straight, "whose kind and genial disposition, whose simplicity and whose unreserved intercourse with natives who had the honour of his acquaintance, are not to be easily forgotten."

AT the Madras High Court Criminal Sessions, on the 26th April, Mr. Justice Parker, for misappropriation of Rs. 528, which the accused admitted, sentenced E. L. M. Baber, Deputy Superintendent, Revenue Survey Department, to three months' simple imprisonment. Mr. Wedderburn, on his behalf, had argued that "Mr. Baber did not intend to deprive the Government of money. He practically borrowed money from the public purse, hoping to pay it back, and he did repay a large sum, and the public purse did not suffer, because the pension Mr. Baber would have earned, but had now forfeited, would have amounted to £10,000, and more than covered the actual and alleged defalcations." Besides, his client had already been in jail for three months. These considerations weighed with the presiding Judge, who thought the prisoner had already been punished sufficiently by the loss of his position in the Government service and society and the disaster to his family.

Baber's Brahman clerk, charged with aiding and abetting him, was, on confession, sentenced to two months' simple imprisonment.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

HER Majesty has returned to Windsor. The Prince and Princess of Wales too have come back to England.

THE Czar pays a long visit to the Emperor William this month, arriving at Berlin on the 21st.

THE first of May saw a monster Labour demonstration in London. The number present is estimated at three hundred thousand, including Socialists and Anarchists. A contingent assembled on the Thames Embankment at noon and marched in procession to Hyde Park with banners flying and bands playing. At the Park, sixteen platforms were erected at which resolutions were passed supporting an international eight hours' working day. There were many foreign delegates such as Poles and Russians. The proceedings were peaceful and orderly. The chief provincial towns had also their displays.

BUT for Police precautions, May Day would have been a day of blood and woe on the continent. Such was the general consternation. And the consternation was the safety of Europe. Paris was peaceful the whole day. At Tours, a bomb exploded near the barracks blowing up the hands of a man and slightly damaging the property. Two bombs were exploded at Liege with little or no damage.

THE House of Commons has rejected, by 74 votes against 54, a motion by Mr. Clark for a separate Parliament for Ireland, Scotland and Wales. It argues ill for English wisdom that so many as 54 in a house of 124 were ready to support so insane a proposition. Home Rule for Ireland is intelligible and practicable, But a severance of Ireland from Great Britain to form a new coalition between Wales, Scotland and Ireland, is simply nonsense.

SPEAKING at Birmingham, on the 30th April, Mr. Chamberlain, in view of the approaching dissolution of Parliament, suggested a huge demonstration at Ulster on Whitsuntide to pass resolutions to pay no taxes imposed by an Irish Parliament.

THE Manchester Chamber of Commerce have passed a resolution that the bad state of trade being due to violent fluctuations in silver, the Government should be urged to promote an International Bimetallic League.

AT Bolton, a conference of spinners decided to work four days in the week.

THE cotton strike in Lancashire has ended, the masters and men both conceding. Work will be resumed on Monday.

THERE is again a ministerial crisis in Italy. The Marquis de Rudin and his colleagues have resigned, being defeated on a motion of confidence in the finances of the Government by a majority of five votes. The French press are jubilant, saying that Italy must now choose between quitting the Triple Alliance and bankruptcy. Has it come to this?

IN an interim report, the English Commission on Vaccination advise against repeated punishment of those who refuse to conform to the Act. Such vindictiveness, they say, only strengthens the opposition to the law. We suspect that the Commission are slowly realising the fact that the opposition is not all unreasonable.

MRS. Osborne has been restored to liberty. There was no ground for visiting her sins on the little stranger with whose introduction to the world she had been charged.

MR. Maclean has moderated his ire against Mr. Hume. In reply to the latter's letter in the Times, he compares Mr. Hume's conduct to that of the Clanna-Gael leaders, who advised resort to arms on failure of redress of their grievances.

THE cashier, Mr. Jalger, of Messrs. Rothschild of Frankfort, is accused of fraud to the extent of two millions of marks. He has absconded, having sailed for Colombo.

SIR Charles Elliott opened the local Legislative Council on Saturday the 23rd April. The three new members, Messrs. Woodroffe and Risley and Babu Gonesh Chunder Chunder took their seats. The President made a statement of the Course of Business. Among other things, he said, "We, however, are not confined, like the Supreme Council, to the short period of the cold weather for carrying on our legislation, but we are able to conduct it all through the year." Does that account for the summoning of the Council immediately before the departure of the Lieutenant-Governor for the hills? But we forget. "I trust, however, that we shall meet again in July." Notwithstanding the boasted advantage of the Bengal Chamber, the Rules of Business were suspended, and two ordinary, not to say trifling, Bills—one to further amend the Village Chaukidari Act, 1870, and another for the regulation of Warehouses and the maintenance of a Fire-brigade—were introduced, and referred to Select Committee.

That does not look like a full session.

The Bill to amend the Bengal Municipal Act, not being ready, will be introduced at the July sitting and passed and completed "in that session or else, if necessary, postponed for a month or two later, but at any rate carried through before the end of the calendar year."

The object of the Chaukidari Bill is to transfer from the Panchayet to the Magistrate the power to determine the number of Chaukidars to be employed, and to fix the salary of the Chaukidars within certain limits. The Panchayet will no longer have the power of appointing them, but the appointment will be made by the Magistrate on the nomination of the Panchayet. The village Chaukidar will have more power than he now exercises. The Chaukidari Village Fund is to be abolished or rather converted into a District Chaukidari Reward Fund under the control of the Magistrate. Indeed, it is a further attempt to assimilate the village with the general Police system.

The Licensed Warehouse and Fire-Brigade Bill proposes the "apportionment of the cost of the Fire-Brigade between the owners of hazardous buildings and the general body of tax-payers by laying down that sixty per cent. of the estimated annual expenditure shall be levied from the former and forty per cent. from the latter; this forty per cent. being again distributed between the Municipalities of Calcutta, Howrah, Cossipore-Chitpur, Manicktola and the South Suburbs in proportion to their assessable valuation."

The Municipal Commissioners will realize the license fees—upon their own valuation, the scale of fees will be fixed by the Local Government, the Commissioner of Police will appoint inspecting officers, and have power to cancel licenses.

Here is a fine plan of division of labour, to be sure, and of responsibility too, unto whittling it down to nothing!

A MISUNDERSTANDING is visible between our Government and the Ameer. There is evidently more at bottom than appears on the surface, and the end must be disagreeable and may turn out serious. The Ameer is undoubtedly showing vigour in administration all round. In his military policy he is strengthening his frontiers. He is trying to extend his influence with the tribes on the East. One would suppose that his British ally would rejoice at such activity and pray for success of his efforts in this direction. These tribes are ugly customers. They have never paid willing deference to the rulers on either side of them. They have often been a thorn in their side and always a source of anxiety. If either the authorities of India or those of Afghanistan can keep them well in hand, repressing their lawless propensities, so much the better for the cause of order, and the security and prosperity of the frontier districts of both states. But the British do not care to conceal their jealousy at the proceedings of the Ameer. It is reported that General Ghulam Hyder, Commander-in-Chief of Afghanistan, has pushed into the Kanar Valley and already occupied Asmar as a base of operations against Bajour. According to the traditional policy, British or Afghan, he has set the tribes against one another. The latest news from Peshawar is that the chief of Jhadom, Omra Khan, has been hard pressed. He has doubtless sought the good offices of our frontier officers, and doubtless at their recommendation and according to its habit of jealousy and meddling, the Government of India has protested against the Ameer's progress to Asman and his designs on Bajour. The tribes on that frontier are pronounced to be beyond the pale of his political influence. They are a sacred preserve for the practice of British sportsmen—a reserve for British bungling. It is a pity that Abdur Rahman Khan's very laudable exertions to put his house in order and clear its objectionable surroundings should meet with such scant appreciation. All the more because the leading spirit in Bajour is a potential danger not only to Afghanistan but also under certain contingencies to India. It is nothing to the purpose that he has up to this shown a friendly disposition to the British. That is a necessary policy with this astute chief to enable him to defy his true suzerain of Cabul.

THE Dnyan Prakash of Poona seems to be under a great illusion as to the way the question of sea-voyage is being settled by some busy no-bodies in Hindoo society in Bengal. Our contemporary thus describes the vista of his enchantment:—

"Our countrymen in Bengal and other Provinces are engaged in solving the question of sea-voyage, and from the constant agitation of the question they have kept up, it seems that they will come to a satisfactory conclusion by the time the Congress comes to be held in London."

'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view, and the question of sea-voyage, despite the fitful and hysterical talk of some pseudo reformers, scarcely advanced a stage further than what it had attained at the time of Raja Ram Mohun Roy or Dwarkanath Tagore.

THE Chief Court at Lahore has upheld the conviction by the Sessions Judge of a Mahomedan, under section 342, I. P. C., for wrongful restraint, in not allowing his wife—a pardah lady—according to the custom in the family, to visit her parents on Fridays.

"The Judges were of opinion that sitting, as a Court of Revision in this case, they should accept the findings on the facts come to by the Sessions Judge as substantially correct. The Chief Court, after full consideration of the facts, held that the offence within the meaning of section 342, I. P. C., was established. The offence of wrongful confinement was complete when a person was wrongfully restrained in such a manner as to be prevented from proceeding beyond certain circumscribed limits, and a person was wrongfully restrained when he was voluntarily obstructed so as to be prevented from proceeding in any direction in which he had a right to proceed. But in the present case, the Judges said, the facts were peculiar. Though, no doubt, there were faults on both sides, and they were not prepared to say that the complainant and her relatives were not to a great extent responsible for the strained relations which existed between the accused and his wife, still there were also circumstances which rendered it incumbent upon the accused to show some consideration to his wife in the matter of her intercourse with the outer world and her own relatives, and on the finding that the accused had overstepped the limits of lawful restraint, which his position as husband warranted, and as in addition, he failed to act up to his undertaking and the custom of exchanging visits between his wife and her relatives on Fridays, the Judges considered that the conclusion that the accused had prevented his wife from proceeding where she had 'a right to proceed' was sound in law and should be upheld. As to the question of punishment, they considered that as no positive act of cruelty was proved, a fine of Rs. 500 would meet the merits of the case."

It is very much to be regretted that our countrymen should be kept straight in the path of the commonest duties of life—in their social and domestic relations—by judicial coercion. But the courts are scarcely to blame. Complaints being preferred, courts are bound to adjudicate. And if there be a failure of justice from defect in the law, the Government will stir and the Legislature will supply the want and make the law required, as on a memorable occasion about two years ago. It is no use complaining. Courts and Governments have their duties no less than we have ours. The misfortune is that such complaints are made. Hindus and Mussulmans are so sensitive to foreign interference, that they may well be expected to keep themselves out of courts. But the obstinacy of one man may defeat the best laid plan, while the very existence of foreigners in authority and of foreign courts, paralyzes indigenous society. It is a dark prospect for these races, but the cheering fact is that foreigners use their power with great moderation and wisdom or leave the natives to their own devices.

It is interesting and not a little useful—as conducive to correct thinking and universal sympathy—to mark the identity of man through all his varied guises or disguises of clime, color, creed, class, and fifty other things besides. It is only by intellectual obstinacy that nations can give other nations bad characters. Thus when foreigners delight to vilify the natives of India or the people of Russia as incurably addicted to fraud and falsehood, they unconsciously for the moment forget the practices of their own tradesmen and the hard swearing that daily goes on in their own courts. Reading the Anglo-Indian papers, one would suppose that the vocation of the Native Press was to deal in fables. Yet the Anglo-Indian Press itself has times out of number been caught in the act. Nor are the journals of Europe above the common frailty of news-mongering humanity. The best of them are from time to time found not unwilling to make a point or create a sensation with the help of contemporary mythology. The greatest men and women are not safe—not even Royalty—from the art of these newsmen.

ABOUT three months back, a paragraph went round the Indian press to the effect that, while the Viceroy and the Commander-in-Chief were reviewing the troops at Delhi, a rain storm burst on the scene and the English officers put on their rain cloaks, at which a Russian officer present laughed at the unsoldierly readiness for comfort, but Lord Dufferin immediately let fall his cloak, followed by his staff. It was added that Lord Tennyson's son, who was of the party, was in consequence drenched to the skin, got cold, which soon turned to fever, and died. Thus the proximate cause of the death of Lionel Tennyson in his visit to India was a Russian joke and Lord Dufferin's sensitiveness.

That story was given by the well-known journalist Mr. Stead, on the authority of the prince of journalists Sir Edwin Arnold. It was improbable on the face of it. At any rate, the Morning Post of Allahabad, which knows the trick of the trade, at once condemned it, as a pure fabrication. It has now been authoritatively exposed, not indeed by the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava but by the next best man—Colonel F. Rowan Hamilton, who, it will be remembered, was aide-de-camp in waiting to this Lordship when Viceroy.

Writing to the Review of Reviews, Colonel Hamilton, who was present on the scene, says that

"Lord Dufferin wore a plain frock coat on the occasion and never put on a cloak of any sort or description from the beginning to the end of the day; secondly, that neither Lord Dufferin's staff nor the Commander-in-Chief's staff wore cloaks on the occasion; thirdly, that Mr. Lionel Tennyson was not at the time Lord Dufferin's guest, that he did not accompany His Excellency to the field, that he did not form part of the staff, that he did not wear uniform, and that he was consequently at liberty to protect himself from the weather in whatever manner might have been requisite. 'I do not even believe,' adds Colonel Hamilton, 'that he was on horseback, but he was staying with Sir Euan Smith at the time and was not in our vicinity. The fact is the whole story about the rain cloaks, the Russian officer and his criticisms, is a myth from beginning to end.'

ON Friday, the 29th April, an auspicious day according to the Hindoo Calendar, Chhura Chand of Manipur was presented with the Sanad which made him Raja of Manipur. The Polo Ground was for the nonce converted into a Durbar Hall. All the civil and military officers in Manipur were present. The leading ministers were grouped behind the Raja. The Raja's mother supported by a group of Manipuri ladies lent grace to the scene. Major Maxwell, the Political Agent and Superintendent of the State, made a speech, reviewing the late disasters, and advising the Raja as to the way he should go. He next gave the programme of his own reform in the State. The first measure, he said, would be the abolition of Lallup, or ten days' free labor in every forty, which would cease from that date. Instead, there would be a house tax of two rupees a house per annum. The next measure would be the gradual abolition of slavery, the slaves being redeemed in five years, but with immediate prohibition of sale of minors. As regards land, tenure holders would be secured in their property on an annual rental of Rs. 5 a pari.

WE regret to learn that, after a long course of model management, the good name of the great Cossimbazar Estate is threatened—not successfully, let us hope. For sometime past, the relations between the Zemindar and the tenantry at one village have been strained. We refer to Beldanga, in the Southern skirts of the Moorshedabad District, not many miles distant from Berhampore, the District head-quarters, or from Cossimbazar, the residence of the Maharani. Beldanga originally belonged to the Rajput Baboos of Nakasipara. In the fall of the Nakasipara family, it passed to other hands, until in course of time it came to the Cossimbazar Raj. It is a large township rather than village, with a prosperous population and a considerable trade. The tenants claim permanent rights and with their wealth and by combination, aided doubtless by collusion with the Amla, during several regimes, manage to defy the landlord. The recent activity of the Maharani's agents in asserting her rights has been met by well-concerted resistance. The usual rows have been followed by the usual complaints in the criminal courts from both sides. Mr. Mano Mohan Ghose has gone up from Calcutta in the landlord's behalf. He is watching the depositions in support of the prosecution against the Maharani's people, reserving his cross-examination.

THE British Indian Association have elected Maharaja Doorga Churn Law as their President for the current year. They would not accept a proposition to elect the Maharaja of Durbhanga or any of the Behar Chiefs or landlords for the place. An amendment to that effect had not even a seconder. This is an insult not only to the Maharaja of Durbhanga and his brother Chiefs but to the whole Province. If the historic Houses which won their possessions by their good swords and enjoyed them by the grants of successive sovereigns, before the English Company became the Dewan of the Mogul,—houses, too, which the Baboos who have by favour of impecunious British officials been dubbed Rajas and Maharajas and what not besides, and their fathers and uncles were yesterday only too glad to serve—can be thus summarily suppressed, what hope for any minor fry? The reason given for non-acceptance of the amendment was that arrangements for the year had been complete. A lame excuse or one more discreditable, could not have been put forth. If everything was prearranged, what was the necessity for the meeting? The members outside the clique might have been saved a drive to the close closet in this grilling weather. We wonder the gentlemen present did not resent the insult offered to them by the plea. It was a distinct suggestion that they were a packed set got together to register the decrees of the ruling Clique. The plea was true, however, that all arrangements had been made before the suggestion about the Maharaja of Durbhanga was made. Only it was not the whole truth. The complete truth is that all arrangements had been made from the beginning of the Association, and indeed the whole hierarchy settled for the first century of its existence. And there is no room in it for the Duke of Durbhanga or Babu Jadu Lal Mullick—An spite of the latter's unaccountable weakness on the last occasion—or for anybody else out of the charmed circle.—In point of fact, Rai Shib Chunder Banerjee did not spring a mine. He gave notice of his amendment before the commencement of the meeting, which was, in consequence, opened long after the appointed hour. Great efforts were made to dissuade the Baboo from his intention. When he was found to be resolute, the ruling Associationites wanted time to marshal their forces for defeating him. His persistency was due to the fact that his proposition was not a new one at all. The Behar members had long been complaining of not receiving justice, and of their Chiefs being systematically left in the shade. The amendment was Behar's ultimatum.

CHOLERA is reported from Benares, Patna and Chittagong. In the first, they are burning sulphur to check the spread of the disease. A correspondent in the Indian Daily News complains that the Municipal Commissioners are quite apathetic in the second. In the last, Sir Henry Harrison and one of his daughters have fallen victims. Both the members of the Board of Revenue had been to Chittagong on tour. On account of the virulence of the disease, Mr. Stevens who had preceded him, advised Sir Henry Harrison not to go there, but Sir Henry chose to go. He has paid the penalty of his rashness with his life, dragging along with him his poor daughter, scarcely budded into life.

The news was published in some of the morning papers of Friday. The Board of Revenue, the Port Commissioner's office and the municipal office were closed that day in memory of the deceased. The municipal office remains closed this day too.

Sir Henry Harrison had some grave weaknesses, but all the same his death is a loss to all Calcutta and the entire Bengal Civil Service. A brilliant penman and a formidable controvertist, a fluent speaker and adroit debater, who often rose to the heights of persuasive eloquence, his place will not be easily filled. He had a wonderful tact in dealing with men, and specially the natives of this country. He served in various lines of the administration, with distinction in each. He has been equally successful as a criminal magistrate and a civil judge, an educational officer and a Secretary, in the Legislative Council and in the Board of Revenue,—though his success in every instance was more of the intellectual kind than the active. His greatest achievement was to save the Calcutta Corporation and the right of self-government of the citizens from the uplifted hand of violence of the then Governor of Bengal, Sir Rivers Thompson. Take him all in all, we shall not look upon his like again.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE MARTYR TO DUTY AND VICTIM OF AN OFFICIAL "FAD."

By the will of God, a Bishop has been burned sooner than we had reason to hope for, and we may now, we suppose, expect a reform. A senior Divinity of the Board of Revenue and his lovely daughter into the bargain have perished—as a sacrifice to the Moloch of Irrational Symmetry and Steadfastness of Rule—and we suspect the credit of the shrine itself is in jeopardy. Men must now begin to perceive not only the worthlessness, but the wickedness also, of the idol set up for our adoration. Kali-ghat is sacred, and respected even by strangers, and the hecatombs of goats slaughtered there only adds to the clat of the goddess. But human sacrifices cannot be permitted in favor of any idol however exalted. Still less the sacrifice of an English chief and an accomplished English lady. If the latter offering was a mere mishap, there ought to be no possibilities for such accidents. Down, therefore, down with Kali! Down with the whole Pantheon, if need be.

However deeply we may deplore the sudden and premature death of Sir Henry Harrison, we cannot but take consolation from the prospect of compensation which the event offers. Nor can we conceal from ourselves the fact which is the talk of every respectable native and every European house in the Province. It goes without saying that the disastrous event is sure to open the eyes of the present Ruler of Bengal to the great danger, to which his recent circulars on the subject of tours of inspection are exposing the executive officers under his Government from the top to the bottom. The hard and fast rule which he has prescribed, makes no allowance whatever for the age, position and health of the officers, or for the time of the year when the tours are to be undertaken. It takes no notice of the means of travelling available, whether in the shape of boat or steamer, whether by palki or horse dak, by riding or walking. It ignores the state of public health at stations, which must be visited on certain dates. The result of such a cynical institution was foreseen. This stern barbarity has from the outset proved very disastrous to many an executive officer; but being mostly natives no notice has hitherto been taken of their woes by the Head of the Government.

On the principle of great abuses attracting the notice of the authorities, only when a great magnitude of the Church or the State becomes a victim thereto, and being then rectified,—we have no doubt that the present catastrophe will lead to the annulment of the inhuman rule in question.

The work of inspection used to be carried on, under former régimes, in the most practicable manner, and no harm of any description ever resulted from the modest practice. The present Ruler of Bengal, however, early came to the conclusion that the system of inspection, which was in vogue in the time of his predecessors since 1853, when Bengal was formed into a separate Lieutenant-Government, was a faulty one; and the only way to rectify it was by prescribing rules with an iron hand, whereby all executive officers from the members of the Board of Revenue to the smallest hospital assistant and pound-keeper, might be harrassed out of their lives, without the least commensurate advantage. Such has been the corrective applied, and such has been the result. Who shall dispute with that King? The misfortune is that the present Lieutenant-Governor has no experience of Bengal, and has no respect for the opinions of those eminent administrators who have gone before him. He thinks that the panacea of all evils is to be found in constant inspections, in and out of season; but he forgets the large amount of serious and delicate thinking his officers have to go through, requiring leisure and repose. Thus, real efficiency in the administration is sacrificed to the necessity, the different officers are under, of carrying out his instructions, detailed in the various circulars which he has been firing off ever since he has ascended the musnad. Sir Henry Harrison has evidently fallen a martyr to this disastrous system of inspection.

He had lately been inspecting in Midnapore. At Contai, the cholera was raging, and he was warned off, but he could not help it, said he; he must obey orders. He next took steamer to Chittagong. There too was the cholera. The natives were dying in large numbers. His colleague at the Board had preceded him there and prudently ran away to inspect another time if need be. He advised Sir Henry against risking a visit to such a place. But the loyal servant of the state thought he was bound to proceed. He went only to die of cholera.

GOVERNMENT PROTECTION TO OFFICIAL WRONG AND JUDICIAL WRONG-DOERS.

OUR readers can scarcely have forgotten our article headed, "An administrative blunder, or, the story of a sacrifice," published on the 30th January last. Such a story is not easy to forget. It is once in a generation only that one comes upon such triumphant official wrong-doing. Adverting to our account, the Times of India observed, "the whole story is an incomprehensible one, but at the same time it is one that, told in the calm language of Reis and Rayyet, and left uncontradicted and unexplained, will do the Government infinitely more harm than the wild vapourings of journals like the Bangabashi type. Whatever be the facts, the case demands enquiry." And so will say every respectable man in the universe. There is one journal, however, which thinks and feels differently. Yet we are not surprised at an effort made by the Hindoo Patriot for screening the accused Sub-Judge. That journal is not now what it was. It has reached a depth of degradation at the hands of its present conductors that is truly pitiable. It indulges copiously in all the tricks of inferior journalism. In almost every new work it reviews, it discovers a genius. It congratulates Sally of the alley if that good girl becomes housekeeper to Mr. Gorge Augustus Russel D'Cruz of Chunam Gully, sheds tears of bitter grief at the death of the favorite parrot of a Famine Rajah, and finds itself in transports of delight if the major domo of a landed house receives a ten rupee note as bukseesh from his master on the occasion of a marriage, and girds up its loins for defending the most rotten cases if the accused happen to command wealth and power. The numerical strength of its clientele,—of men, that is, whom it seeks to serve but practically injures by its advocacy,—bears an inverse ratio to its regular readers. Perfectly unconscious of the figure it cuts, it rushes to heights where sober men feel a diffidence to tread. Having reduced the business of editing to a work of scissors and paste, it surveys its own labours with perfect complacency, never doubting that its pretensions would not be admitted. Itself a stranger to the graces of style, the ability of literary presentation in others provokes in its bosom an eunuch's spite. That the great organ of Hurris Chunder Mookerjee should sink into such a depth, is, perhaps, a national calamity. The case, however, is desperate. Gentle remedies can no longer be of any effect. Literary cautery itself, without curing, can only assist the poor decrepit in moving amongst men with tolerable decency, without, that is, exposing its gangrenous wounds and leprous festers. It is only for this that we have resolved for once to notice its last escapade.

It concerns the public still more. It concerns the purity of the judiciary and the efficiency of the judicial administration. It concerns that reputation of British Justice which is the foundation of Indian Loyalty. Considering the serious nature of the charges made against the Subordinate Judge by his chief ministerial

The stress laid by the Patriotic journalist on the delay that has occurred in explaining the real origin of the case, discloses the utter weakness of the defence. The charges brought against the Sub-Judge are grave. If true, his retention in service is an insult to his fellow-judges, and a wrong to the subjects of the crown. Every newspaper that has noticed the case has in no uncertain tones called for an enquiry. Only the Sub-Judge's gallant defender in the Patriot is for quietly hushing the matter up. The charges are either true or false. On either supposition to be no Sub-Judge ought to whip away from his therefore such a friend as the writer in the Patriot. A powerless enemy could not possibly have discovered a better way of convincing the public that, grave though the charges are, they are all incontestably true. The advisers of the Sheristadar knew that there is no limit to which the stupidity of individuals might go. They, therefore, took the greatest care in explaining the cause of the delay. In the memorial addressed to the Viceroy but withheld by the Local Government, the Sheristadar observes, "with your Excellency's permission, your petitioner will advert to them [the leading facts of the case including its origin] for the first time in the following paragraphs, being convinced by the severe logic of experience that the reticence he had observed about the origin of the case, and the consideration he had shown for the late Subordinate Judge of—, have brought about his ruin by preventing the Local Government from viewing the accusations against your petitioner in their true light, viz., as trumpery charges dictated by malice and accepted by superior authority under the influence of prejudice and haste." In his last representation to the Lieutenant-Governor, the poor man observes, "My accuser being such, (and there are many graver charges against him, which if opportunity be given me, I am prepared to prove), and my own character having been such, it behoves the superior authorities to give their best attention to the case instead of evading investigation on purely technical grounds. My unwillingness at the outset to disclose the secret history of my case was, like that of Mr. Burchell in the story, the result of my confidence that the reasons openly assigned by me against the propriety of my sentence would prove sufficient and incontrovertible. I acted with delicacy and consideration towards the person who had injured me. I refused to be a party to the formal publication of a grave scandal. When, however, I found to my misfortune, that the trumpery charges preferred against me led to such serious consequences against myself, I had no longer any option left to me about the disclosure of the real history of the case, and the real character of the officer who chose to proceed against me and play the rôle, for the time being, of a hater of ministerial corruption."

As a matter of fact, again, although these serious charges were for the first time brought in a clear and formal way in the Sheristadar's memorial addressed to the Viceroy and withheld by the Local Government, yet they are not perfectly new. Intelligible indications occur in the third petition to the Government of Bengal, dated 4th December 1890 and in the host of certificates and other expressions of opinion from almost all the eminent men of the District connected with the courts. The existence of ill-feeling, though not its cause, had also been alluded to in the very first petition presented to the District Judge on the 16th September 1887.

Voluminous as the record of the case is, the leading facts lie within a nutshell. The Sheristadar has been dismissed informally and unheard. The charges against him had never been drawn up and his defence had never been called for. A portion of the case came up before the District Judge upon a petition made by the Sheristadar himself. The Judge, who was not in a frame of mind to do justice, disposed of the case summarily without granting full opportunities to the petitioner to clear his character. The Local Government has rejected his first and second appeals and refused to admit the third.

The unfortunate man's petition to the Viceroy, praying for a full enquiry with liberty to him to prove his own innocence and the grave charges he has preferred against his immediate superior, is sought to be withheld on technical reasons. While all the respectable organs of public opinion and hundreds of eminent men belonging to the District where the case arose loudly call for a proper enquiry, the Sub-Judge's solitary defender in the columns of a third-rate journal beseeches the Government to hush up the matter. The papers of the case had very lately been examined by a gentleman who while in service was regarded as one of the brightest ornaments of the subordinate judicial service and who for sometime had officiated as a puisne Judge of the Calcutta High Court. His written opinion freely granted to the dismissed ministerial officer for whatever use the latter might make of it, is that "upon reading the papers of his case, I am of opinion that Babu * * * has been unjustly thrown out of Government employ." So far as the public is concerned, can there be a doubt that, as the case stands at present, it affects the Sub-Judge more than the Sheristadar?

DEBATE ON THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

Mr. Curzon, in moving the second reading of this Bill in the House of Commons, said that he was glad, at this early period of the Session, to be able to introduce to the notice of the House a Bill which, if carried into law, would, he believed, be fraught with advantage to the interests of our fellow-subjects in India. It was sometimes said that the House showed but a scant and reluctant concern in the interests of the millions of India, and yet he was sure that this alleged indifference of the many—even if it were true, which he did not altogether accept as a fact—was more than compensated for by the diligence and uncompromising attention of the few. He had heard it said that a greater interference of this House in the government of India might not be a source of unmixed benefit to that country. He hoped this Bill would be one that would commend itself to both sections of opinion in the House—to those members who might not have a direct and personal experience of India, and to that smaller section who, either from long residence or official experience, were emphatically entitled to speak on Indian questions. He might, perhaps, be permitted to take that opportunity of expressing the regret which was felt on both sides of the House at the disappearance from among them of the omnivorous intellect of the late hon. baronet the member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell). The object of this Bill was to widen the basis and expand the functions of the Government of India, to give further opportunities than at present existed to the non-official and native element in Indian society to take part in the work of government, and in that way to lend official recognition to that remarkable development both in political interest and capacity which had been visible among the higher classes of Indian society since the government was taken over by the Crown in 1858. In form this Bill was one to amend the Indian Councils Act of 1861. Legislative powers of some sort or other, but of a somewhat confused character, had existed in India for a very long time. They existed under the rule of the old East India Company; but the modern legislative system under which India at present existed owed its origin to Lord Canning when Viceroy, and Sir Charles Wood when Secretary of State in 1861, in which year the latter carried the Indian Councils Bill through the House. The Act of 1861 constituted three legislative Councils in India—the Supreme Council of the Viceroy and the Provincial Councils of Madras and Bombay. The Supreme Council of the Viceroy, or, as it was called the Council for the purpose of making laws and regulations only, consisted of the Governor-General and an executive Council of a minimum of six and a maximum of 12 members, nominated by the Governor-General. The legislative Councils of Madras and Bombay were also recruited by a minimum of four and a maximum of eight additional members nominated by the provincial Governor, of whom half, at least, must be non-official. Since the passing of the Act of 1861 Legislative Councils had also been called into existence in Bengal and in the North-West Provinces. In Bengal the Council consisted of the Lieutenant-Governor and 12 nominated Councillors, and in the North-West Provinces the Council consisted of the Lieutenant-Governor and nine nominated Councillors. In both cases one-third of the nominated members must be non-official. This system had undoubtedly worked well. It had justified itself and the antiicipation of its promoters. Operating to a very large extent through the agency of sub-committees, composed of experts, it had proved to be an efficient instrument for the evolution of law. The publicity which had attended its proceedings had had a good effect, a number of native gentlemen of capacity and public spirit had been persuaded to come forward and lend their services, and undoubtedly the standard of merit in these Councils had been high. At the same time these Councils had been subject to restrictions and limitations which were intentionally, and he thought wisely, imposed upon them. In the first place, they were in no sense of the term Parliamentary bodies. They were deliberative bodies with a comparatively narrow scope, inasmuch as they were assembled for the discussion of the immediate legislation which lay before them and were not permitted to travel outside that very circumscribed area. Under these circumstances it had been felt that there was wanting to the Government an opportunity for explaining policy and for replying to hostile criticism or attack, and at the same time that there was also wanting to the non-official element—to those who might legitimately call themselves the guardians of the public interest—an opportunity of asking for information, of stating their grievances, and of becoming acquainted with the policy of the Government. These feelings had been expressed in many memorials that had been addressed, over a large number of years to the Government of India by important public bodies and associations throughout the country. Lord Dufferin, in February, 1887, the occasion being the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee, spoke of the desirability of reconstituting the Supreme Legislative Council of the Viceroy on a broader basis and of enlarging its functions, and in November of the following year he sent home a despatch in which he recommended, in the first place, an early financial discussion in the Supreme Legislative Council of the Budget of the year. Lord Dufferin said in that despatch that he did not mean that votes should be taken in regard to the various items of the Budget, or that the heads of expenditure should be submitted in detail to the Council, but simply that the opportunity should be given for a full, free, and thorough criticism and examination of the financial policy of the Government. In the same despatch Lord Dufferin suggested that questions should be asked in the Supreme Legislative Council on matters dealing with native as opposed to Imperial interest. In 1888 Lord Dufferin left India, and early in the following year he was succeeded by the eminent statesman who now held the office of Viceroy. Since his accession to the Viceroyalty Lord Lansdowne had signified his approbation of the annual discussion of the Budget in the manner suggested and also of the right of addressing questions to the Government on matters of public interest. Both these propositions were treated of in a despatch by the Secretary of State in August, 1889, and he dealt with them in relation to the Legislative Council of the Viceroy and also to the Provincial Councils. In the same despatch the noble lord signified his desire for the enlargement of the representation of the public in India by an addition to the number of members of the Council and by some extension of the present system of nomination. Inasmuch as this could not be carried into effect without legislation, the noble lord had enclosed in the despatch a draft Bill, upon which he invited the opinions of the Central and the Provincial Governments of India. These and other criticisms and suggestions were found to be eminently favourable to the contemplated measure, and from these germs sprung the Indian Councils Bill of which he now moved the second reading. A few words as to the Parliamentary history of the measure. It had been in no ordinary degree the victim of Parliamentary vicissitudes, and up to the present its career had been one of mingled success and disappointment. It was introduced for the first time in the House of Lords in 1890, and a most important discussion—a model of what such a discussion should be—took place on the second reading. In Committee a number of important and valuable amendments were made by noble lords who had had experience in the government of India. So amended, the Bill passed and came down to the House of Commons, where it did not succeed in getting beyond the first reading. In 1891 it was introduced in the House of Commons and fell a victim to hardship of fortune or the immoderate interest displayed by the Opposition in other topics of Parliamentary interest. In the present year the Bill was again introduced in the House of Lords in its amended form of 1890, and it had passed through its various stages without alteration, but supported by expressions of strong approval from several noble lords. The delay in passing the Bill had naturally been a source of regret to the Government at home, and regret had been equally felt in India, where there was a good deal of disappointment at the tardy arrival of a long-promised reform and at the apparent willingness of this House to postpone the consideration of a non-controversial and constitutional change for India to the perennial and unprofitable discussion of constitutional changes of a highly controversial character for other parts of the United Kingdom nearer home, which, from an Indian point of view, were infinitesimally small and comparatively unimportant. This disappointment in India had been legitimate, and undoubtedly it had been felt by the present Viceroy, who, having inaugurated his term of office by signifying his hearty approval of this Bill, had naturally looked forward to being able to carry it into execution before his term of office expired. These feelings were shared by members of the House, if he might judge from questions addressed to his predecessor, and also by those who held extreme opinions, and who, while regarding the Bill as inadequate, were yet desirous that it should pass into law. In July of last year the British Committee of the Indian National Congress, who might be supposed to represent the more extreme views on this subject addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, in which they expressed their deep regret at the withdrawal of the Bill, which would cause such bitter disappointment in India. In the present year Lord Kimberley, who had been Secretary of State for India, had spoken in the same sense, adding—"I echo most sincerely the hope that this measure will be pressed by her Majesty's Government and will pass into law. It is really a misfortune that a measure of this kind should be hung up Session after Session. However important to us may be our domestic legislation, let us not forget that we have an immense responsibility in the government of that great Empire in India, and that it is not well for us to palter long with questions of this kind. And I am the more desirous that this measure should be dealt with because I have observed with great pleasure that in India the tone has much moderated in dealing with this subject, and that very sensible views have been expressed at meetings held in India; and there is now a reasonable promise that there will be an agreement as to a tentative and commencing measure upon this subject. We must not look for it all at once; but if we can make a beginning I believe we shall lay the foundation for what may be a real benefit and a real security to our Indian Empire."

It was a legitimate inference from these expressions of opinion that the Bill would be welcomed on both sides of the House, and that even those who held advanced views would facilitate its passing. (Hear, hear.) The changes which it was proposed to make by the Bill were, broadly speaking, three in number. The first was the concession of the privilege of financial criticism in both the Supreme and the Provincial Councils; the second was the concession of the privilege of interpellation; the third was the addition to the number of members in both classes of Councils. First as regarded financial discussion, he had already pointed out that under the existing law this was possible only when the Finance Minister proposed a new tax. At other times the Budget in India was circulated in the form of pamphlet, and no discussion could take place upon it. During the 30 years since the Councils Act of 1861 there had been 16 occasions upon which new legislation had been called for and such discussion had taken place and there had been 14 on which there had been no discussion at all. By this Bill power would be given to discuss the Budget annually in both the Supreme and the Provincial Councils. It was not contemplated, as the extracts he had read from the despatch of Lord Dufferin would show, to vote the Budget in India item by item, as was done in that House, and to subject it to all the obstacles and delays Parliamentary ingenuity could suggest; but it was proposed to give opportunity to the members of the Councils to indulge in a full and free criticism of the financial policy of the Government, and he thought that all parties would be in favour of such a discussion. The Government would gain, because they would have the opportunity of explaining their financial policy, of removing misapprehension, and of answering criticism and attack; and they would profit by criticism delivered on a public occasion with a due sense of responsibility and by the most competent representatives of unofficial India. The native community would gain, because they would have the opportunity of reviewing the financial situation independently of the mere accident of legislation being required for any particular year, and also because criticism upon the financial policy of the Government, which now found vent in anonymous and even scurrilous papers in India, would be uttered by responsible persons in a public position. Lastly, the interests of finance would gain by this increased publicity and the stimulus of a vigorous and instructive scrutiny. These discussions could have no other result than to promote sound economical administration in India. It was now 20 years since Lord Mayo, that wise and enlightened Viceroy, first proposed the submission of provincial Budgets to Provincial Councils. At that time he was overruled by the Government at home, which he believed was one of the Governments of the right hon. gentleman opposite; at any rate he hoped both sides of the House would now co-operate in making a change which spoke for itself. The second change introduced by the Bill was the concession of the right of interpellation or of asking questions. It was proposed to give to members of both Councils, the Supreme and the Provincial Councils, this right of asking questions on matters of public interest. But both this privilege and the one to which he had previously alluded would be subject, under the terms of the Act, to such conditions and restrictions (an ironical cheer) as might be prescribed in rules made by the Governor-General or the provincial Governors. In answer to the hon. gentleman who cheered somewhat ironically, they were not altogether unfamiliar with such rules and restrictions in this House (hear, hear,) and if these were found necessary here, where we had the most perfect and elaborated system of Parliamentary government ever known, how much more were they needed in India, where Parliamentary institutions could not as yet be said to exist? (Cheers.) The merits of the proposal, he thought, were obvious. It was desirable, in the first place, in the interests of the Government, which at the present moment was without the means of making known its policy or of answering the criticisms or animadversions or of silencing calumny. And it was also desirable in the interests of the public of India who, in the absence of official information, were apt to be misled to form erroneous apprehensions, and to entertain unjust ideas. The third proposal was to add to the number of members upon the Councils. The Supreme legislative Council consisted at present, in addition to its ex-officio members, who number seven, of minimum of six and a maximum of 12 nominated members; under the Bill the minimum would be raised to ten and the maximum to 16. The Madras and Bombay Councils consisted, in addition to their four ex-officio members, of a minimum of four and a maximum of eight nominated members, of whom half were non-official; under the Bill the minimum would be eight and the maximum 20. The Council of Bengal consisted at present of 12 nominated members, of whom one-third were non-official; under the Bill the number would be increased to 20. The Council of the North-West Provinces at present consisted of nine nominated members, of whom also one-third must be non-official; under the Bill they would be raised to 15. The object of these additions was easily stated and would be as easily understood. It was simply, by extending the area of selection in each case, to add to the strength and representative character of the Councils. The late Mr. Bradlaugh, who at different times introduced two Bills dealing with the reform of the Indian Councils into the House, proposed in those measures to swell the numbers to quite impracticable and unmanageable proportions. Under his first Bill their totals would have amounted to 260 and under the second to 230.

Mr. Schwann asked whether the figures just quoted referred to the Councils altogether or to each separately?

Mr. Curzon replied that he was speaking of the five Councils he had mentioned, and the totals for those five Councils. Any one who had any practical acquaintance with India must be aware that the number of persons both competent and willing to take part in the functions of those Councils was nothing like adequate to supply those ambitious totals. At the same time the number of persons so available was sufficient to justify an addition, and, perhaps, a not inconsiderable addition, to the present totals. Every year most fortunately the number of native gentlemen who were both qualified and willing to take part in the work of government was increasing, and every year the advantage of their co-operation in government increased in the same ratio. More especially in the case of the Provincial Councils had it been thought that more effectual means were wanted to reinforce in those Councils unofficial and native opinion. The Government believed that the moderate extension of the numbers which they proposed would have the effect which they contemplated, and at the same time would be compatible with efficiency. Coming to the concluding question, the mode in which those additional members were to be appointed, he noticed that the hon. member for North Manchester had on the paper an amendment declaring that no reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle would prove satisfactory. But the Bill, he had to point out, does not exclude some such principle, be the method election, or selection of delegation, or whatever particular phrase they liked to employ. The 4th subsection of Clause I runs as follows:—"The Governor-General in Council may from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council, make such regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations, or any of them, shall be made by the Governor-General, Governors, and Lieutenant-Governors respectively, and prescribe the manner in which such regulations shall be carried into effect." Lord Kimberley himself had elsewhere, in an earlier state of this Bill, expressed himself with reference to this clause as follows:—"I am bound to say that I express my own satisfaction because I regard this as, to a certain extent, an admission of the elective principle," and upon another occasion—"I myself believe that under this clause it would be possible for the Governor-General to make arrangements by which certain persons may be presented to him, having been chosen by election, if the Governor-General should find that such a system can be established."

Mr. Maclean.—Does the Government accept that view of Lord Kimberley?

Mr. Curzon.—Undoubtedly, Sir, the opinions expressed by Lord Kimberley are also shared by the Secretary of State. Under this Act it would be in the power of the Viceroy to invite representative bodies in India to elect or select or delegate representatives of themselves and of their opinions to be nominated to those Houses, and thus by slow degrees, by tentative measures—and measures like this could not be otherwise than tentative (hear, hear)—they should perhaps approximate to the ideal which the hon. member for Manchester had in view. He might mention as indicating nothing more—the character of the bodies and associations to which he alluded, such bodies as the association of the Zemindars of Bengal, the chambers of commerce of India, the municipalities of the great cities, the Universities and perhaps the various great religious denominations in that country. (Hear, hear.) He could not conceive anything more unfortunate than that this House should draw up and send out to India a hard-and-fast elective scheme within the four walls of which the Government of that country should find itself confined, and which if at some future period it proved inadequate or unsuitable, it would be impossible to alter without coming back to this House and experiencing all the obstacles and delays of Parliamentary government in this House. He was well aware the proposal of the Government might not altogether suit those hon. Gentlemen on the other side whose ideas of political progress had been formed in the breathless atmosphere of our life in the West and who were perhaps unable to accommodate their mood to the slower movement of life in the East. The hon. member opposite, for instance, was anxious to have the elective principle more clearly defined and more systematically enforced. He had put an amendment on the paper in which he asked the House to express the opinion that no reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle will prove satisfactory to the Indian people (hear, hear) or will be compatible with the good government of India. That amendment was vitiated by a two-fold fallacy. It affected to speak on behalf of the Indian people, and it ignored the primary conditions of Indian life (Ministerial cheers.) When the hon. member presumed to be the mouthpiece of the people of India he must, with all respect, decline to accept his credentials on that point. No system of representation ever devised, no system of representation that the ingenuity of the hon. member could suggest, no system of representation which would bear 24 hours' test of operation could possibly represent the people of India. The people of India were voiceless millions, who could neither read nor write their native tongue, who had no knowledge whatever of English, and who were not perhaps universally aware that the English were in their country as rulers. (Hear, hear.) The people of India were rayyets and peasants; and the plans and policies of the Congress party in India would leave this amorphous residuum absolutely untouched. He did not desire to speak in any other than respectful terms of the Congress party, which contained a number of intelligent, capable, and public-spirited men. They undoubtedly represented that part of the Indian population which had profited by the educational advantages we had placed at their doors; but the constituencies the Congress party represented could not be described otherwise than as a minute and microscopic minority of the population. According to the last census the population of British India was 221 millions, and of that total it was calculated that not more than three or four per cent. could read or write in any of their native tongues and only one-fourth or one-third per cent. could read or write in English. It appeared to him that we could as little judge of the feelings and political aspirations of the people of India—if, indeed, they had any aspirations outside the more material needs of their existence—from the plans and policies of the Congress party as we could judge of the physical configuration of a country which was wrapped in the mists of the early morn, though all its topmost peaks might happen to be touched by the sun. To people in this stage of development they might be at least premature and unwise; and even with such a scheme to speak of the representation of the people of India would be a misuse of terms. The Government assumed the responsibility of stating that in their opinion the time had not come when representative institutions, as we understood the term, could be extended to India. The idea of representation was alien to the Indian mind. We had ourselves only arrived at it by slow degrees, and it was only in the last 25 years that we had in this country entered into the full enjoyment of that system. While it was impossible so to remodel the Indian Councils as to give them the character of representative chambers, he would be sorry to deny the importance of criticism by gentlemen representing native society in India. At present the sole vent available for that opinion was in the native Press and in organized meetings such as the Indian National Congress. Everybody agreed that this knowledge and activity might be better utilized, and the Government believed that the subsection of Clause I. would provide means by which representatives of the most important sections of native society would be appointed to the councils. This Bill was, perhaps, not a great or an heroic measure, but at the same time it marked a decisive step, and a step in advance. As such it had been welcomed by every living Viceroy in India. It was foreshadowed by Lord Dufferin, it was earnestly asked for by Lord Lansdowne, and it had received the emphatic approval of Lord Northbrook not less than of Lord Ripon. There were two main objects which the House was entitled to require in new legislation for India—that it should in no sense impair the efficiency of government and that it should also promote the interests of India. (Hear, hear.) It was because he believed the measure would promote both these ends that he commended the Bill to the sympathetic attention of the House. (Cheers.)

A MOTHERLESS CHILD.

BY THE LATE BABOO SHAMA CHARAN DUTT.

1.

HE knew no speech, he spake no word ;
But who alas ! can say
What secret agony upon
His little heart did prey ?
The fresh rose on his cheek was pale,
The cherub smiled no more ;
Nor sparkled bright his violet eye—
Its radiance soft was o'er.

2.

"Why many a day he saw not once
Mamma's sweet smiling face ?
Why many a day she gave him not
Her wonted dear embrace ?"
So asked his wild uneasy air,
The hurried language of his eyes ;
So asked his endless discontent,
His fretful screams and frequent sighs.

3.

No comfort knew his little soul,
All cheering words were vain ;
Mamma ! Mamma ! ah where was she ?
He'd see her once again.
You saw him round his nurse to cling,
His ev'ry look demanding change ;
From place to place, impatience all,
His ev'ry motion bade her range.

4.

And oft with eager searching eyes,
He sought amid the female train
That smiling face on which he smiled,
And sorely sighed—the search was vain.
At ev'ry sound he started up,
But soon hung down, nor looked around :
It was not she, alas ! not she,
Whose footstep caused the sound.

5.

Poor babe ! at length he seemed convinced
His fond hopes all were vain ;
Convinced he could not see her more,
He asked not now to see again :
And patience now his manners marked,
And calm he looked and looked resigned ;
And other's kindness needing now,
Grew more, to all, than ever kind.

6.

They called to him—his upraised head
Replied to ev'ry friendly call ;
Tho' soon upon his nurse's breast
The drooping head again did fall.
They smiled to wake responsive joy ;
It were ungrateful not to smile,
And you saw on his clouded brow
The fitful sunshine burst awhile.

7.

They gave him toys, which he received ;
The sorrowing infant fain would try
If these would bring his heart relief ;
They would not, and he laid them by :
He laid them by, but gently so,
He'd shew no discontent ;
For tho' not pleased, he knew, who gave,
Did give with kind intent.

8.

In secret still the baby pined,
Deep on his face was painted care ;
You could trace in his "sad sweet eye"
The lines of placid, still despair :
Till like a primrose, day by day,
He waned and languished in his bloom ;
And to his sire's redoubled woe,
Re-met his mother in the tomb.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

CHOLERA has shewn itself at Cabool and Srinagar. At the former, one sowar of the escort of the British Agent has died. The Amir has removed himself from the capital to the Paghman hills. At the Hindoo capital, in three days, there were 27 attacks and 16 deaths.

THE sum raised in Quetta for the Sandeman Memorial amounts to Rs. 6,000. The chiefs and people of Baluchistan have already subscribed Rs. 22,000 for a "Jirga" Hall, and more is expected.

To induce them to extend their service in India, the Secretary of State has sanctioned bounties to men of the garrison artillery and six battalions of infantry. Soldiers of not less than six years' service and willing to extend their service for one year, will receive Rs. 70, double the amount for double extension or more.

THERE will be a war reserve in India of one thousand imported horses for British cavalry and artillery, to be collected as funds are available, and mostly kept at the Saharanpore depot.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

A DETACHMENT of troops has been told off to Nowgong to suppress the dacoits in that district.

ON his return to India, Lieutenant-Colonel W. H. Hughes, Commissary-General, Bombay Army, does not revert to his own, but goes to Madras in the same capacity, his place in Bombay being taken up by Lieutenant-Colonel Hobday from Bengal.

THE net salt revenue of India during the last official year was a little over 8¼ crores of rupees, against seven crores and twenty-nine lacs of the year before. Of this total, Bengal supplied 251 lacs, Northern India 184, Madras 204, Bombay 162, Siindh 6, and Burmah 16 lacs of rupees.

Woman descants on the truly womanly subject of Pearls.

"Pearls are very perishable. They cannot be considered a first-rate investment like diamonds. After a time they decay. Sometimes a fine specimen will lose its lustre and beauty within a few months, so that the possessor of such treasures does well to keep them put away in a sealed place. They are very delicately made, consisting of thin films overlaid one upon another, with more or less animal matter between the layers, and it is no wonder that they deteriorate. After being buried in the ground for a while they are found worthless. Those which are dug out of Indian graves—some of them of great size and doubtless of wonderful beauty when they were new—are utterly valueless, even when they are not pierced. Nevertheless, there is a pure and evanescent beauty about them which seems better to become the maiden than any other sort of jewel. Nothing varies so much in value as pearls. With them fashion affects the market constantly. Sometimes white ones are sought, while other times at intervals are in demand. For some years past black pearls have been the rage. A fine specimen worth £120 will fetch £200 perhaps, if another can be got to match it perfectly."

WE learn from the London Athenæum that Mr. F. C. Danvers, Registrar and Superintendent of Records at the India Office, is now on a second visit to Lisbon to examine the Portuguese Indian Records. In the course of his first visit, during last autumn, he took a full survey of the records from the sixteenth century to the year 1635. He will now take up the work from that date. These reports ought to be published.

THE Calcutta correspondent of the Rangoon Gazette passes a sweeping condemnation upon the entire native Press of the metropolis, for having made unkind and uncalled for reflections on the European officers of the Botanical Gardens, in connection with the Sadharan Brahma Samaj disturbance. The correspondent, whoever he may be, very properly does not include in the Native Press the daily Hindoo Patriot, which has become the sworn apologist of Government and which, so far from attacking the European officers of the Botanical Gardens, went to the opposite extreme of abusing the Brahmos. But he might have known that Reis and Rayyet kept studious silence over this ugly affair, which should never have been brought to the fierce light of the public gaze. To accuse, therefore, the entire native Press for the flippant and incoherent talk of the Surrender Nots and Norender Nots, is simply unfair.

THE old delusion of spontaneous human combustion has been revived in the columns of the Advocate of India. It comes, this time, however, in such a questionable shape that we must speak to it. Our contemporary does not pin his faith to the bullbeggar of the inveterate toppers, but notices a phenomenon of a very different kind. The unique case reported is most interesting, and deserving of scientific notice:—

"There is only one known condition of the body which admits of what is called 'spontaneous combustion' and that is in the moribund gin drinker. In such cases it is said by some that active chemical action takes place within the body somewhere in the chest or belly, and a flame is raised which consumes the tissues and causes death. Others say that combustion is not 'spontaneous,' but that the tissues of the body being fully saturated with gin, the breath becomes inflammable, and on the approach of the flame of lamp within the combustion area, the alcoholic vapour of the breath is ignited; the flame is conducted down the throat and combustion is set up. Marryat explains in 'Jacob Faithful' that this is how Jacob's mother came to an end. It is easy to understand how tissues saturated with alcohol come in time to possess an increased combustibility, but the gin drinking must have been practised for a very long time and the daily quantity of gin swallowed must have been enormous. The recorded cases of 'spontaneous combustion' as the result of inordinate spirit drinking are not as clear as would be wished. However there is a popular belief that persons may burn themselves to death by spirit drinking. A very lean body it is said cannot be burnt from chemical action beginning within. It is necessary that the body should be fat as well as saturated with alcohol before combustion will begin in it. The fat within keeps up the combustion and causes death. It now appears that the human body will sometimes burn without alcohol. It may occur in persons not addicted to alcohol. It has always been said that combustible people must be old, must be obese, must be women and must be great gin drinkers. But it is now discovered that there are persons presenting none of these characteristics whose flesh will burn and who will die from the combustion of their own flesh whenever it is fired by flame from without. Death by burns only destroys the true skin, the water of the tissues of the body put out the fire so to speak. The body is burnt but does not burn itself. It appears that there are persons whose flesh possesses an undue liability to burn. They may possess this peculiarity and, of course, be ignorant of it. An American Doctor has just recorded an instance of this susceptibility to burn. The case is curious and unique. The doctor was summoned by a young woman to come to her mother who was burning alive. On reaching the spot he found a woman aged forty-nine who while burning stumps had set fire to her clothes. By the time the doctor reached her she was half consumed; her intestines protruded, her large joints were laid open, and her belly and both legs were much burnt. Her flesh was itself supporting the combustion. This woman was not obese. If the combustion of fat was aiding the burning there was not very much of it. The flesh itself seemed to be combustible. The explanation, as we have said, is that the fleshy tissues of the body possessed the most unusual quality of a liability to burn. This natural curiosity was observed on the outskirts of the town of Massachusetts; it has been observed no where else."

The only drawback of that case is that it comes from America.

LADY Mackenzie being seriously ill at home, Sir Alexander Mackenzie has left Burma to be by her side. Mr. Smeaton has taken temporary charge as Chief Commissioner. Mr. F. W. R. Fryer, C.S.I., Commissioner of the Derajat Division in the Punjab, officiates in the place during Sir Alexander Mackenzie's absence. Mr. A. P. MacDonnell had a prior claim. But it was not thought advisable to disturb the Chief Commissionership of the Central Provinces, which has had so many men in rapid succession.

THESE restless Europeans will not let ill alone even in the far East. Cairo is about to be drained. An International Commission have been studying the subject. They have rejected thirty projects and then offered their own. Perhaps it was time something was done, considering that the death rate at Cairo is over 46 per 1000, while it is 29 at Marseilles; 23 in Paris and Berlin; and 17 in London.

THERE is a hectograph journal published at the Causeway, Salisbury, South Africa, called The Moshonaland Herald and Zambesian Times, of the size of a sheet of foolscap, priced one shilling.

MR. Sala in the Englishman adds:—

"I wot of an even more curious specimen of journalism published in some part of the Deccan in which 'stone of a nature suited to lithographic purposes' was abundant. The Anglo-Indian publication was published every morning, lithographed on a square of white cotton stuff. After being perused it could be utilised as a pocket handkerchief; and in the evening this Journal Mouchoir was returned to the local dhobi or washerman, who, after it had gone through the requisite lavatory processes, returned it to the newspaper office to be issued to subscribers."

Is that fact or fancy? Where is the local habitation and what the name of this wonderful journal? Our Deccan friends ought to tell.

NOTHING is so useless as to be good for nothing. Here is a tribute to the worth of the distilled damnation of Jamaica or Bengal which must shut up the irrepressible Sir Wilfrid Lawson himself:—

"The Emperor, always on the look-out for anything that might kindle the spirit of emulation among the troops, decided that General Morland's body should be placed in the memorial building which he proposed to erect on the Esplanade des Invalides at Paris. The surgeons, having neither the time nor the materials necessary to embalm the General's body on the battle-field, put it into a barrel of rum, which was transported to Paris. But subsequent events having delayed the construction of the monument destined for General Morland, the barrel in which he had been placed was still standing in one of the rooms of the School of Medicine when Napoleon lost the Empire in 1814. Not long afterwards the barrel broke through decay, and people were much surprised to find that the rum had made the General's moustaches grow to such an extraordinary extent that they fell below his waist. The corpse was in perfect preservation, but, in order to get possession of it, the family was obliged to bring an action against some scientific man who had made a curiosity of it."

Hurrah for Rum!—for the mustache if not the mouth and the inner man.

MONS. Renan in his last book says:—

"I should be very glad to feel sure that there is a hell, for I prefer the hypothesis of a hell to that of annihilation. I imagine that if in His severity, the Eternal were to send me to that unpleasant place I would manage to get out. Paradise seems a place where people must be very much bored. What I should prefer is purgatory, which I picture myself as place replete with a certain melancholic charm—a large park illuminated with a polar light and interspersed with groves, where the loves commenced on earth will be purified pending complete etherization. What exquisite romances will be completed there!

With what familiarity these Westerners speak of the horrible regions! Indian serpent-charmers handle snakes with more caution.

It is said that kerosine will take off iron rust and fruit stains from almost every kind of goods, without injuring the fabric. This washing, if preceded by soap and water, will be of no use.

SIR DENNIS FITZPATRICK will be off for the hills on the 16th. He breakfasts the next morning at Solon and reaches Simla in the afternoon.

The Civil Secretariat office of the Punjab Government opens at Simla on the 21st.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE German Emperor is encouraging rowdyism in the military. The other day much public feeling was evoked on the occasion of the violent death, in a street in Berlin, of a citizen by the hand of a sentinel who, provoked by some insolence, shot him dead. That rash act was universally condemned. It now appears that the Kaiser was of a different mind. He has publicly commended the soldier for his conduct and given him promotions.

THE Bulgarians, Georgi Merdjan and Christo, have been sentenced to death for the murder of Dr. Vulkovitch. The brothers Tufekchieff, who devised the murder and afterwards fled to Russia, have, in their absence, been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment.

THE ministry are preparing a Bill for the exclusion from Great Britain of destitute aliens.

COLONEL Kitchener has been gazetted Brigadier-General, while holding the appointment of Sirdar of the Egyptian Army. That word "Sirdar" is not our own. Sirdar of the Army, indeed!

COLONEL G. G. Walker, 3rd Battalion, Scottish Borderers, and two Colonels of Volunteer Regiments have been appointed Commanders of the Bath, while eight Colonels of Volunteer Regiments have been appointed Companions of the Bath.

THE Unionist cotton operatives have not resumed work at Stalybridge, because all of them are not re-engaged.—A renewal of the great strike of 1890 is apprehended at the London docks. The Directors of the London Dock Company are not despondent. They think that their disputes with the labourers are of a trivial nature and will be easily solved.

THERE is distress in the North of England. On account of the strike of the Durham miners which has stopped all dependent industries, one hundred thousand people are without work and without food. The Mayors of Hartlepool, Middlesburgh, Stockton and Darlington have appealed for public help.

ON the 11th, a deputation of workmen waited on Lord Salisbury to urge the eight hours' movement. In reply, he deprecated compulsion in the matter, either by strikes or legislation, and pointed out the danger of hampering employers as tending to drive capital out of the country.

THE same day, Mr. Goschen received a deputation of the Bimetallic League, including several members of the House of Commons, representatives from most of the eastern banks and firms and delegates from the Lancashire operatives. Mr. Goschen would not commit himself to any principle, and dismissed the deputation with the information, hardly new to them, that Government had accepted the invitation of the United States to attend the Silver Conference to consider the question of the increased use of silver money and that Government would bear in mind the views and interests of India, and that he hoped that the Conference would come to a satisfactory solution.

THE Times, while admitting that Government is hard pressed by India to relieve her finances, says that the English acceptance of the American invitation will merely further the Washington election tactics. For it is impossible for the Conference to establish a parity of gold and silver while it will help to keep the silver market in an unsettled state.

Italy and Austria have joined the Conference.

At a crowded meeting of the Primrose League, held on the 6th at Covent Garden, Lord Salisbury spoke of the paramount importance of the Irish question. Parliament, he said, had no right to sell Ulster into slavery. Home Rule did not mean a message of peace for Ireland, but civil and religious war. At Bristol, Sir W. Harcourt denounced the Premier's speech as an incitement to rebellion, and the watchword of religious bigotry, race hatred, and insolent ascendancy.

MR. Patrick Greville Nugent, M.P., charged with indecent assault on Miss Price on the Brighton line, pleaded guilty of common assault, and has been sentenced to six months' hard labor. And what will the House do with him?

MR. Mowbray, the publisher of Commonweal, has been acquitted, but the editor, Mr. Nicholls, been sent to prison for eighteen months.

A BILL for a tramway system throughout London has passed the Committee stage of the House of Commons. It empowers the County Council to construct a tramway over Westminster Bridge and along the Thames Embankment.

THE Russians are adopting stringent measures on the Afghan and Persian frontiers to ward off cholera.

THE Indian Councils Bill has passed through Committee.

MR. Justice Wilson having accepted the post of Legal Adviser and Solicitor to the Secretary of State for India, on the retirement of Mr. Charles Pontifex, an ex-Judge of the Bengal High Court, Mr. Justice Hill has been confirmed as a Puisne Judge of the High Court.

THE omnipotence of Parliament was lately defied by a Welsh railroad corporation, and the British Chamber of Deputies has escaped with the loss of its whiskers. A Select Committee of the House of Commons, presided over by Sir Michael Hicks Beach, had called as a witness before it one Hood, a station-master in the employ of the Cambrian Railway Company. His evidence having gone against the Company, the Directors summarily dismissed him for punishment and, doubtless, by way of warning to their servants against unwise disclosures. The House of Commons naturally took umbrage at the insult to its dignity. The Directors were cited for contempt. They made their submission and tendered an apology. The party leaders were prepared to accept this and make an end of it. But others were differently minded. They smiled at a mere apology, whatever its terms, and justly contended that the Directors should either reinstate their dismissed station-master or grant him full compensation. A little exhibition of firmness on the part of the House would have brought the Directors to its feet. Here, unfortunately, the Inexplicable Old Man interfered. With an eye probably to the interest of the corporations at the coming general Election, such as Pitt had before the general Election of 1784, Mr. Gladstone threw in his whole weight in favour of accepting the apology and dismissing the Directors with an admonition.

He could not deny the seriousness of the Directors' offence. He also admitted, that "it was the bounden duty of the House to maintain the perfect freedom of its witnesses and therefore to punish those who had undoubtedly assailed that freedom." But he took good care that the House should not do its duty. The Commons' satisfaction under his persuasion with a simple apology, surely amounted to such a dereliction of duty. There was no generosity in the Leader of the Opposition in coming thus to the rescue of the Government and his political enemy Sir Michael Hicks Beach from impending defeat on what was no question of party politics nor point of honour. So extraordinary was the conduct of Mr. Gladstone that his chief organ in the morning press, the Daily News, could only whine that Mr. Gladstone acted on the side of mercy instead of justice. But justice is often the true mercy. It would have been so here.

To accept an apology until the wrong was righted, was to eat very humble pie. But that is not the worst evil. So long as the House of Commons is supreme, it may regard an insult with equanimity. But the punishment of station-master Hood by destroying the protection of parliamentary witnesses, impairs the value of their testimony. That is a national calamity.

THE Bengal Government thus mourns in the Gazette the loss of Sir Henry Harrison:—

“NOTIFICATION.

The 7th May 1892.—The Lieutenant-Governor announces with profound regret the death by cholera at Chittagong, on the 5th May 1892, of Sir Henry Leland Harrison, Knight, Senior Member of the Board of Revenue and Member of the Bengal Legislative Council.

After a distinguished University career, Sir Henry Harrison joined the Indian Civil Service in 1860. He early attracted the attention of Government and was appointed Junior Secretary in 1867. For nearly six years he was Magistrate and Collector of the important district of Midnapore, and acquired the reputation of being one of the best district officers in Bengal. He then served as Secretary to the Board of Revenue, and for a short time as Secretary to Government. In April 1881 he was appointed Chairman of the Corporation and Commissioner of Police, Calcutta. For nine years he discharged the duties of this difficult office in a manner which won for him the approval of Government and the esteem and respect of the public. His name will always be associated with a period of greatly improved Municipal administration, and his public services to Calcutta constitute a large part of the history of the Metropolis during the past decade. In April 1890 he was appointed a Member of the Board of Revenue. The news of the sudden death, while visiting the district of Chittagong in the discharge of his duties as Member of the Board, will be received with universal sorrow. This calamitous event has deprived the Lieutenant-Governor of one of his most trusted advisers, the Civil Service of one of its most distinguished ornaments, and the province and people of Bengal of one of their truest friends.

H. J. S. COTTON,
Offg. Chief Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal.”

That is, on the whole, a niggard tribute to the memory of a brilliant officer. It was perhaps unfortunate that the drafting of the official obituary fell to the hands of Mr. Cotton. He could have spoken out his own mind, but he had to express for another of whose mind he was, perhaps, not sure. Besides, in his solicitude to sink the friend in the Secretary, he has scarcely done full official justice to the sacrificed official. The deceased was one in a thousand—the notification might apply to fifty officers, and is the common form of courtesy for all officers entitled to a Gazette notification on their death, whether they be strictly entitled to the praise or not. The pathos of Sir Henry Harrison's early end, with all its pitiable attendant circumstances, is but faintly adumbrated in the lifeless document. The cruel fate of this high functionary, next in position to the Lieutenant Governor himself, does not touch one sympathetic cord of gubernatorial feeling. Sir Charles Elliott announces the death of Sir Henry Leland Harrison, Knight, Senior Member of the Board of Revenue, Member of the Bengal Legislative Council, “with profound regret.” The death of a pet parrot excites a more tender emotion. Of a piece with this perfunctory performance of the duty to the dead, in setting forth for the last time the name and titles of the deceased, his honorific title as a member of the Bengal Council is buried. For the rest, the biographic notice seems taken from a “Men of the Time” in which all colour and sentiment are tabooed. Sir Henry's great services to Calcutta are dismissed with the commonplaces of compliment. Justice no doubt is done at the end. Only we should have liked it in more burning terms. The words themselves are good and of noble signification, but then they have been depreciated by indiscriminate bestowal on the undeserving, like the titles of Rai Bahadur and Raja. No generous ardour is visible in the document. To be personal and mechanical is the official way, to be sure, but if ever there was an occasion for departing from it, it was here.

We hope, at any rate, the Bengal Government will now relent and remove the cause that exposed so valuable an officer to such a sudden and lamentable death.

THE Corporation of Calcutta, we are glad to find, is willing to its duty to its dead old Chief. On a requisition from several of the Commissioners, the Chairman has called a special Meeting of the Commissioners, “to express their sense of deep regret at the death of the Hon'ble Sir Henry Harrison who, for nine years, was the Chairman of the Corporation.” All the same, the requisitionists, including the protégés and pets of the deceased, do not advance beyond cold formality, any more than the Government. They only translate the Bengal office phrase in describing their feeling as one of “deep regret.” The Government have the more sounding and sonorous epithet, but then their scribe had the first choice of the vocabulary.

Alas! for the degradation of the times! Had a promising lordling or an obscure princeling so died, there would have been no end of gush on every side. But people are ashamed to mourn a valuable public servant who falls a sacrifice to duty.

ON the departure of Mr. C. A. Roe on furlough, Mr. F. D'Olbart Bulluck, Divisional Judge, Jhelum, will officiate as a Judge of the Punjab Chief Court, till the 26th July, when Sir M. Plowden returns. The Punjab Government is alive to the fact that, since the death of Pandit Ramnarain no native has been appointed to the bench of the Chief Court. Mr. Bulluck has, therefore, been given to understand that it was “not improbable that he would have to give way to a gentleman of the native Bar in the event of some permanent, or perhaps in certain circumstances, in the event of a future temporary vacancy occurring.” All thanks to Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, for his liberal promise! We only hope he will not succumb to the unmeaning cry of a native of the Province for the Chief Court Judgeship, but appoint the best available native, and at once. A native is a native, whether born in one Province or another. Besides, there are natives in the Lahore Bar, who are essentially of the Punjab, though born out of it. They have made Punjab their home, living and labouring in it, and to leave them out on the plea that they were not of the Province, is absurdly unjust, and barbarously cruel.

MR. Pearson, officiating Chief Reporter of the Indian Law, is now dispensing justice in the Police Court, as officiating Chief Magistrate. Mr. Hyde acts as officiating Chief in Mr. Pearson's place, Mr. Abdur Rahman acts for Mr. Hyde in the High Court. The native community have reason to be grateful to the Chief Justice and the Government of India for once more recognising the claims of the Indian section of the Bar in the matter of law reporting. Let us hope that, under the liberal lead of Sir Charles Elliott, the Government of Bengal will follow the example and recognise the claims of the native Barristers in the new Provincial Service. In their respective evidence, both the Chief of the Judiciary in Bengal, Sir Comer Petheram, and the Chief of the Bar in Bengal, Sir Charles Paul, strongly pressed upon the Public Service Commission the advisableness of appointing qualified men, who have had sufficient practice in civil and criminal litigation, as District Judges. Of the six District Judgeships allotted to the Provincial Service, it is only fair and just that at least two should be reserved for native barristers, who besides being young, able, possess the confidence of both the Government and the High Court.

THE habits of one of the district civil courts of the Twenty-four Parganas are suffering cruelly from the effects of a singular judicial Clature. The Pleaders of the Alipore Bar have complained to the District Judge, Mr. Garrett, that the First Subordinate Judge, Baboo Purna Chunder Shome, holds his court from 11 in the forenoon till a late hour in the evening, with every door and window closed, and that he would not relax his practice, though repeatedly reminded of the inconvenience and unhealthiness resulting therefrom. Instead of appealing to the District Judge, the Pleaders might have subscribed between them and sent the Sub-Judge one or two sanitary primers. Perhaps they know their man better than we can teach them. We suppose Baboo Shome cherishes the notions of his grand-mother and the Vaidyas, so ignorant of the science of life. After all, he is by no means singular in this country in living like hermetically sealed provisions and recommending the regimen to others. Our very medical men, graduates of the Medical College—the Garbadhanists in particular, we suspect, have a horror of the air of the atmosphere. We only wonder how this Sub-Judge manages to live under his irrational arrangement. Even without closure of all doors, these courts are worse than ovens. The cloture converts them into Black Holes. This Shome Nath is a veritable cat.

It is wellknown that Jack Tar is an easy prey to the landsharks of every port. But alas! the poor fellow has no better fate reserved for him at Home. As at Calcutta or Hongkong, Sydney or Valparaiso, so at Liverpool or Hamburg. How Jack Bull fares in London itself hear Mr. Sala in the Englishman :—

"Forty years ago, in Charles Dickens's 'Household Words,' I wrote an article called 'Jack Alive in London,' describing as faithfully as I might the humours,—rather tragic humours, some of them—of Ratcliff Highway, and I have never been to that highway since. In the innocence of my heart I have long since imagined that Ratcliff Highway, thanks to missionaries, district visitors, and Mr. G. R. Sims, had become quite a reformed neighbourhood, and that Jack was now only alive in London in the most innocent and decorous fashion. Alack! I found a rude awakening from my dream when I read a report of a meeting of seamen of all nationalities gathered at tea at the 'Strangers' Rest' in the maritime boulevard I have mentioned. A question put to the meeting was 'Are sailors still drugged and robbed in this neighbourhood?' A chorus of voices arose unanimously affirming that mariners were still liable to be relieved of their clothes, and even of their boots while in a state of insensibility arising from drugged drinks, while others declared that sailors were often robbed without being drugged at all. The local publicans, who are as respectable at the Eastend as they are at the West, have, I should say, nothing whatever to do with this abominable system of hocussing and plundering seamen. It is in the low lodging-houses, and when he is in 'gay' company, that Jack is rifled and stripped."

And so in Calcutta. The rifling and stripping is done by a set of crimps who ought to be wellknown to the Police, who inveigle honest Jack to the haunts of gay company at lodging-houses or rather low brothels. Jack has a sneaking weakness for the society of "Indian Queens" and he is introduced to pariah women rudely personating royalty, with whom he boozes and is soon drugged out of his senses and then plundered and finally bundled out into the street pavement.

WE have much pleasure in cutting for our readers' benefit the following body of

"FACTS ABOUT MAN.

The average number of teeth is 32.

The weight of the circulating blood, is 29lbs.

The average weight of an adult is 150 lbs. 6 oz.

The brain of a man exceeds twice that of any other animal.

A man breathes about 20 times a minute or 1,200 in an hour.

The average weight of the brain of a man is 3½ lbs.; of a woman 2 lbs. 11 oz.

Five hundred and forty pounds, or one hogshead and one and a quarter pints of blood pass through the heart in one hour.

The heart sends nearly 100 lbs. of blood through the veins and arteries each beat, and makes four beats while we breathe once.

One hundred and seventy-five million cells are in the lungs, which would cover a surface thirty times greater than the human body.

The average of the pulse in infancy is 120 per minute; in manhood, 80; at sixty years, 60.

The pulse of females is more rapid than that of males."

Some of these facts are very interesting, e.g., the difference in weight between the brain of man and the brain of any other animal. That undoubtedly fortifies man's position. Still more valuable a truth is the physiological difference, over and above sexual, between man and woman. Talk of equality, after that!

MR. Sala notices that Prince Bismarck

"has recently told a visitor that northern nations all require a wetting, and that if the German is to become fully conscious of his strength he must first have swallowed half a bottle of wine, or better still, a whole one."

That is founded on an old delusion. But it has been proved over and over again that teetotallers endure cold and fatigue much better than drinkers. Very properly,

"The Man of Blood and Iron does not admire liquors and 'such sweet stuff.' He avers that a good glass of cognac is more in his line."

But then, it is said that

"the ex-Chancellor, many years ago, is said to have invented a kind of glorified 'shandigaff' or sublimated dog's nose, composed of champagne and Guinness's stout, well bricked up with Cayenne pepper."

The vile barbarian! Dog's nose, indeed. Dog's something worse, we suspect. Champagne and stout. What a combination! The Cayenne pepper is of course introduced to force the repulsive draught down the gullet against nature, just as the Plain Cookery of Europe positively needs the help of a threat of mustard blister on the tongue to coerce the unfortunate victim of it into swallowing the underdone strong meats.

Mr. Sala offers this crumb of comfort :—

"Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his friends may, however, derive some slight consolation from the fact that when Bismarck's visitor refused a glass of whisky offered him by the Prince, the latter exclaimed, 'I think drinking is dying out more and more in Germany. I only hope that we shall not become like the English, who drink only water and tea.'"

Mr. Sala does not think that Millennium yet come in England :—

"But most sagacious of Bismarcks, the English people absolutely swim in beer, and they drink enough gin every year to float the Channel and the Mediterranean fleets combined. Our Irish and Scotch brethren have not lost their thirst for whisky, and the amount of the annual National Drink Bill is regarded by the friends of total abstinence as a national horror and a national shame. With all this, while the Revenue returns tell us that the consumption of strong drink continues to increase, there is a steady decrease in crime and in drunkenness."

WITHOUT making elaborate comparison, any candid man who was present at the last meeting of the new Calcutta Corporation, could not help feeling that, after all deductions, the present Commissioners are not wanting in strength and capacity for usefulness. We have already stated our view of the law in the matter of the Chairman's casting vote in favor of Babu Joygobind Law in the election of the general Committee. At the meeting in question, the various sections of the Municipal Act were more or less strictly construed according to various well-known rules of construction. Mr. Apar moved to obtain the opinion of the Officiating Advocate-General of Bengal on the so-called knotty question of Municipal law. By the way, the said law was on trial at the time and was being dissected in the High Court; even the English of it was found fault with judicially an hour before the meeting. Another limb of the law, Mr. Abdur Rahman, valiantly led the opposition, and, in an able speech, proved from his point of view that the question was neither difficult nor abstruse, and that the time had come when the rate-payers' money could not further be frittered away in that fashion, as it ought to be the duty of the new Corporation to minimize the enormous law charges, instead of increasing the same. Babu Kalinath Mitter and a number of others followed Mr. Rahman. Mr. Apar's resolution was, however, carried by a large majority, after some vigorous speechification on both sides. Thus victorious, Mr. Apar moved for the appointment of a Committee consisting of Babus Durgagati Banerjee, Nalin Behary Sircar, Joy Gobind Law, Kalinath Mitter and himself. This was, of course, seconded. Mr. Abdur Rahman objected to this proposal on the ground that Mr. Apar had carried his resolution minus the committee, and there being no suggestion of a committee in it and he not having given notice of his resolution number two, it should be rejected. That being so, the motion was, to the disappointment and chagrin of Mr. Apar's party, thrown out. It is indeed a pity, for it is well known that counsel's opinion is counsel's opinion. A case drawn up by a strong committee must be in the nature of things quite a different thing from a case drawn up by either the Chairman or the Solicitor to the Corporation.

A RUM Daniel has come to judgment in England. The other day, he presided at the Leeds Assizes. He is none of your hard men of mere law fed upon musty precedents. He exercises his own wits and, we may add, is not ashamed of his natural feelings. He applied the principle of the law of defamation and of treason to the litigation of courtship. If signs against individuals are actionable for slander—if signs against the state are indictable as sedition, why shall not they be good in other wrongs? This Judge laid down that to constitute a breach of promise of marriage, words were not necessary. A silent man may, without recourse to speech, make, as well as mar, love. He may court and promise as well as back out. He may gull a girl with hopes and then abandon her before completing the engagement without recourse to articulate expression. There are coquettes and crimps and pretenders of both sexes, and a man may, so to say, jilt a woman, first decoying her to submission, and finally sending her to the right about. It was a pitiable case in which a teacher had fooled his pupil to the top of her bent, addressing her in terms of affectionate familiarity and continuing for years to exchange tenderness, and at last when the time came to seal the mutual attachment before the altar—or a Registrar—throwing off the disguise and pretending that they were simply playing with mutual enjoyment a play which was not to be taken so seriously. The base man taking advantage of his ingenuity, turned round to ask his poor, outwitted victim if she possessed any letter of his containing the word marriage. If she possessed any, then he might treat with her, or else not. His "dearest Jane" was in a fix.

Is there, in human form, that bears a heart—
A wretch! a villain! lost to love and truth
That can, with studied, sly, ensnaring art,
Betray sweet Jenny's unsuspecting youth?
Curse on his perjurer's arts! dissembling smooth!
Are honour, virtue, conscience, all exiled?
Is there no pity, no relenting ruth,
Points to the parents fondling o'er their child?
Then paints the ruin'd maid, and their distraction wild?

But Jenny was advised to go to law, and luckily there was for her a judge equal to the occasion and the offender. Mr. Justice Wright held that no such letter or word was necessary. It were enough if the fact was established. According to him, a valid breach of promise may be made by a mere shake of the hand or even a wink of the eye, and there may be a thousand other modes independent of language. We are reminded of the Poet's song:—

Was it something said,
Something done,
Vexed him? Was it touch of hand,
Turn of head?
Strange! that very way
Love began:
I as little understand
Love's decay.

There was a decree for £100 with costs against the perfidious pedagogue.

It is given out in the English papers that Sir John Strachey has acceded to the request of the Countess of Lytton, the widow of our former Viceroy, to write a history of her late husband's viceroyalty. There is not much of sacrifice in the compliance. The request offered Sir John too tempting an opportunity for vindicating his ways to man for refusal. The Lytton régime was in point of fact the second Indian administration of Sir John Strachey. Sir John has been a power in the state from the days of Lord Lawrence. As Chief Commissioner of Oudh, he had zealously seconded that Governor-General's mischievous enquiries into tenant-right in the Province and early, in 1868, he was called to a seat in Council with the special object of taking charge of the Oudh land legislation. With the next griffin Viceroy, his importance waxed unusually high. He now invited his brother the Engineer too to the Government of India, and between them they ruled the roast. It was the talk, not to say the scandal, of the time. In 1871, the Royal Dick was attracted to the snug berth of inspector of railway machinery and stores, at the India office, and Jack was left alone to the joy, if not all the dignity and glory, of ruling this Empire. Thus he remained in undisturbed influence till the sad end of the good Viceroy in the Andaman islands by the assassin's hand. This cruel event gave him a still greater lift and completed his triumph. During the interregnum, he ruled de jure as well as de facto. By the sudden death of Lord Mayo, Mr. John Strachey, of the Bengal Civil Service, became, by simple operation of law, Viceroy and Governor General, if only for 14 days. Again, nearly all through the viceroyalty of Lord Lytton he was the real ruler. While Owen Meredith poetized and orated and, for the rest, ate, drank and made merry, Sir John guided the vessel of state. His history of the administration will be much of a chapter of autobiography.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—The most effectual Cure for Gout and Rheumatism.—A frequent cause of these complaints is the inflammatory state of the blood, attended with bad digestion, lassitude, and great debility, showing the want of a proper circulation of the fluid, and that impurity of the blood greatly aggravates these disorders. Holloway's Pills are of so purifying a nature that a few doses taken in time are an effectual preventive against gout and rheumatism, but anyone that has an attack of either should use Holloway's Ointment also, the powerful properties of which, combined with the effects of the Pills, ensure a certain cure. The Ointment should be thoroughly rubbed into the parts affected at least twice a day, after they have been sufficiently fomented with warm water to open the pores to facilitate the introduction of the Ointment to the glands.

THE CONQUEST OF NADIYA BY GOVERNMENT FOR ITS PET PANDIT.

WE have lately, on more than one occasion, been considering the proposals of Pandit Mahesh Chandra for the confusion of Sanskrit learning in this Province. Its importance draws us to the theme once more. Those proposals veil a scheme for the conquest of Nadiya for Mahesh Chandra. The ambition of our hero is to be accepted as the head of the Pandit community of Bengal. But to be a really great Sanskritist is no easy task, and the notoriety which he has attained as a grammatical blunderer by his little Sanskrit primer intended for the use of candidates for the University Entrance Examination, must have made him hopeless of distinguishing himself in the higher fields of our ancient language and literature. With such position and opportunities as he enjoys, any real scholar might have rendered lasting service to the literary world by antiquarian and philological researches. But our political Pandit is too wise a man in his generation to make his life miserable by the "toil of sprite" which is the lot of scholars and authors. Yet with the resources at his command, he cannot be expected to give up one of the apparently cherished dreams of his life. He is now C.I.E. and Mahamahopadhyaya, besides Principal of the Sanskrit College. Why then should he not aspire to be the head of the Pandits? His ambition is not, however, to take up the rôle of a Dig Vijayi (world-conquering) Pandit, and to crush the giants of Sanskrit learning at Nadiya in a fair fight. He is a strategist who in order to win his object would have recourse to the shortest cut, and would not waste his energy for the sake of a principle. He may not have the necessary amount of literary powder and shot to engage in a war of learning with the heads of the Faculties at Nadiya. But he has a large stock of tact in him, and what honor is there in this country that cannot be attained by the skilful playing of the card of official favor? By tact a man of straw can rise to a Maharaja; by tact the veriest scum of society can attain the position of saints. If an illiterate courtier of a Nadiya Raja could, by dint of tact, vanquish and frighten away one of the profoundest scholars who visited the court of his master, cannot Companion Mahesh, with such learning as he possesses, aspire to be regarded by his countrymen as the highest living Sanskritist of his time? If we have read Nyayaratna rightly, delenda est Nadiya has been the motto of his life since the beginning of his official career. When the late Sir Cecil Beadon expressed his readiness to sanction a grant of a lac of rupees for subsidizing the tols, and when Messrs. Woodrow and Cowell were deputed to visit the Nadiya tols for preparing a scheme, it was, we believe, the Pandit who rendered it abortive. Latterly, he started the Sanskrit title examination, and by that plan tried to subordinate the Nadiya Pandits. But they perceived its real object, and they not only held aloof from it, but were forced to organize an examining body in their own town, the operations of which have, without any help whatever from Government, thrown into the shade the semi-official examinations and titles of Mahamahopadhyaya Mahesh. The Nadiya Pandits are nevertheless not very partial towards the annual examination system. Experience shows that it can never secure that thoroughness which is found to result from the indigenous methods. But, as observed above, they were forced to adopt the examination system in order to meet the craze for titles which is the order of the day and which has found its way even into the recesses of the tols, as well from the fussiness of the Babus of Dharma Rakshini Sabhas as through the modus operandi adopted by Pandit Mahesh for gratifying his ambition. The part which he took in connection with the scheme lately sanctioned by Government, disposed not only our publicists, but many of the Pandits who knew him better, to look upon him as a true friend and well-wisher of Nadiya. But as effect is being given to the orders of Government and as the veil of disinterestedness is being gradually withdrawn, his real policy is becoming quite unmistakable.

The scheme sanctioned by the Government of Sir Charles Elliott, contemplates the subsidizing of three of the leading tols of Nadiya. This was in accordance with Pandit Mahesh's recommendation. He has ignored the claims of the great Pandits of Madhubani in Mithila for pushing up a mushroom institution lately started under the odd name of Gautama Thompson Patshala, at a place called Revelgunge. But either because there is no such Pickwick club in Bengal, or because the claims of Nadiya were too well known to the authorities to be overlooked, he recommended the grant of three substantial stipends to the latter. But how is the order of Government now being carried out? We are told that a teacher of the late Babu P. C. Tagore's Sanskrit School at Moolajore, has been sent to Nadiya as the Government stipendiary Pandit of a new tol to be set up by him. This gentleman is a pupil of one of the chief Pandits of Nadiya, and there is very little chance of his ever being able to attain a high position as a teacher at that seat of learning. It may be easy enough to represent that he has attracted a certain number of pupils. The true question is whether these are of the class who usually resort to Nadiya for giving the finishing touch to their education, or whether they are not mere tyros attracted by the prospect of having a share of the amount sanctioned by Government for the subsistence of the Nadiya tol students? Pandit Mahesh's nominee may not be an empty phial with a gilded label. By serving apprenticeship as a pupil teacher in a Nadiya seminary, he may one day become qualified to be a Nadiya Professor. But even on the supposition that he is a deserving man, his appointment at Nadiya is like carrying coal to Newcastle. It may serve to give to Pandit Mahesh and to his patron, the Maharaja of Pathuriaghata, a footing at Nadiya. But this step, unless countermanded at once by Government, would, instead of conciliating the Pandits, alienate their feelings to an extent which it is almost impossible for an outsider to realize. The learned Director of Public Instruction and Sir Charles Elliott who made the grant, might form some idea of the abuse that is about to be made of it, if they would only consider what the feelings of the professors of Greek and Latin in a European University would be, if a teacher of an Indian school were placed above their heads. Mahamahopadhyaya Mahesh may have the satisfaction that the world of Pandits now grows pale at his name. But then the interest of Government and that of the public has also to be taken into consideration in such matters.

Our impression is that to attempt at reducing the Pandits to the position of paid servants, would be a great mistake from every point of view. At present, they throw their whole heart into their work, and from personal knowledge we can vouch to the fact that some of the principal Professors devote more than ten hours a day to their tutorial duties. According to the existing practice, a Pandit would stay at his tol from morning till noon or even later, in order to solve the questions and remove the doubts of his pupils. But if the professors of the tols be subjected to rules as to attendance, they would perhaps do their work quite as perfunctorily as the paid teachers of the Government Colleges. Teaching is a labor of love to the Pandits, but such love can never arise under compulsion. The ambition of the Pandits to be regarded as votaries of learning, would be quenched altogether if they be placed in the position of bondsmen and slaves. From their habit, the Pandits can appreciate nothing so much as a vidaya or honorific bonus. A salary of Rs. 10 or even Rs. 20 per month, would be regarded by most of them as an insult. But an honorarium of Rs. 100 once in the year would be coveted by many of them as a welcome windfall of fortune. From sheer necessity some of these noble philomaths may accept the position of paid servants. But the situation would be galling to their pride, and the harness of office would deprive them not only of their peace of mind, but also of the respect which they now enjoy in the estimation of their countrymen. The only plan which can suit the exigencies of the case, is that which has been adopted by the Nadiya Pandits themselves. At present, they hold not only an annual examination in the several branches of Sanskrit learning, but convene also a convocation in which the leading Pandits of the country meet with their chosen pupils and receive small presents of money. The resources of the Nadiya College of Pandits being limited, it cannot afford to pay very large bonuses to the professors or their pupils, over and above their travelling charges. But the superiority of Nadiya being admitted on all hands, the Pandits consider it a great honor to be invited to the assembly. If the object of Government is to conciliate the Pandits, and also to encourage the study of Sanskrit in the indigenous institutes for its culture, then that object cannot be better attained than by placing the amount sanctioned for the purpose at the disposal of the Collector of Nadiya, and instructing that officer to administer it—say, in accordance with the rules and recommendations of the Nadiya College of Pandits. If the Collector could successfully administer the grant which used to be made in previous years for the assistance of the pupils of the Nadiya tols, there seems to be no reason why there should be any hitch in connection with the disbursement of the enhanced grant.

The annual convocation of the Nadiya College of Pandits has already acquired some popularity in the District, and with a little encouragement from Government it would become much more so. In fact, our belief is that if the annual gathering be presided over, for a few years, by some high official, then the tols would receive an amount of contribution from the Hindu princes and zemindars that would render them more than self-supporting. So great is the veneration felt by the people of this country for the Pandits, that there is hardly a well-to-do Hindu family that does not spend some money in honorific gifts to them. Such being the extent of sympathy of our countrymen for the native Sanskritists, it would manifest itself by substantial pecuniary contributions for their benefit, should our Government only recognize and back up the unique position of Nadiya. An Oriental University may be organized under the headship of Pandit Mahesh Chandra Nayaratra. But it would stand on no higher footing in the sympathies of the people than the institution organized at Lahore by Dr. Leitner. The position of the Nadiya College of Pandits is quite different. It has all the advantages of a high historical name, and, if backed by the prestige of some high official, its importance would be such that not only the eminent Pandits, but even the great princes and reises would consider it a matter of honor to be connected with it, either as Fellows or as office-bearers. The plan which has been adopted on the recommendation of Mahamahopadhyaya Mahesh Chandra, cannot serve in the least degree to encourage the culture of Sanskrit. On the contrary, it will not only create great discontent among the Pandits, but also seriously shake the confidence of the people in the motives of the British Raj. The decision of Government on the matter has been announced. But even now, we hope, Sir Charles Elliott and the learned head of the Education Department will be able to see their way towards inviting and acting upon better advice. If only for the sake of form, the opinion of Babu Mohendra Nath Bhattacharya, who holds a high office under Government, and who, according to Pandit Mahesh Chander's own report, is the life and soul of the Nadiya College of Pandits, ought to have been taken before Sir Charles Elliott recorded his orders. But it is not too late to mend matters even now. At any rate, the only course by which His Honor can avoid being bamboozled by his political Pandit lies in inviting the opinions of such English-knowing Sanskritists as are interested in and conversant with the affairs of the tois.

RAJSHAIYE.

Baulia, May 10.

Since the late unusual meteorological phenomenon of a hail-storm, a full account of which appeared in your columns some time back, the showers have been few and far between, followed, as a natural consequence, by a succession of hot days and sweltering nights, so that when last Sunday evening the sky became suddenly overclouded and a sharp wind began to blow from the river-side, we were at first actually led to exult at the prospect of a heavy downpour. But as the wind grew more alarmingly tempestuous and the shadowed horizon began to present an ominous look, as it was occasionally lit up by flashes of lightning, accompanied by terrific and disturbing peals of thunder, we were forced to considerably modify our expectations. What at first appeared to herald the approach of only a cooling and therefore welcome rainfall, threatened to develop into a fearful storm manifesting unmistakable traits and decided tendencies of a cyclonic character. The wind blew with extreme violence and with sudden changes, making a shrill moaning sound, when in 'its wild career,' it tore through the strong ranks of the vegetable world, which dared to offer resistance. The green deodars and the lovely cypresses were all smarting under the buffets of the mighty element run amok! As the cyclone, for such assuredly it was, swept over our little river-girt station, banging doors, damaging window-panes, upsetting flower-pots, striking down trees, we watched the furious course of the hurricane through half opened shutters, with anxious concern. Our worst fears were not, however, destined to be confirmed! After lasting for nearly half an hour, the wind gradually diminished in virulence. The rain came down in torrents dispelling all our fears by afterwards settling down into a drizzle. A slight hail-fall was also perceptible, but the hail-stones were so small in size that they could hardly be distinguished from the tiny rain-drops that accompanied them. A brief space of calm followed, when, with characteristic suddenness, the clouds dispersed and the radiant slanting rays of the setting sun, shot through a clear blue sky, at once enhancing the piquancy of effect produced by the sudden phenomenal transformation of scene!

The news of the sudden death of Sir Henry Harrison and his daughter was received here with deep regret, and much sympathy is felt for Lady Harrison and family on whom the sorrowful intelligence must have come with a painfully shocking suddenness. As if the untimely death of a distinguished officer, possessed of such varied accomplishments, exceptional ability and infinite tact, was not sufficiently unfortunate, his lovely daughter has also shared his terrible fate. It is generally felt, that Sir Henry has been a victim of the ill-advised system of inspection introduced under the present régime. Your strongly-worded, withal able, leader, in which you have so fearlessly condemned the flashes of misdirected energy and blind, wrong-headed zeal so characteristic of the present administration, is greatly admired and no less widely appreciated. It is hoped, that this sad incident will not be lost upon the powers that be, whom it should awaken to the lamentable consequences incidental to a ill-considered policy!

A grand entertainment was given, last night, by Baboo Rakhai Chunder Dass. There were nautches, the nautch-girls having been called up from Calcutta. Dancing was kept up till the small hours of the morning. All went off merry as a marriage-bell!

BEHAR.

Motihari, May 12.

Sir,—The rash and unlawful act done by the Sub-Registrar of this place has produced a great stir among the world of mukhtears here. The other day a local mukhtear, a Kayesth by caste, went before the Sub-Registrar, also a Kayesth, to have a document registered. Unluckily, it contained certain mistakes which made the Registrar Saheb throw some taunts upon the poor fellow. The mukhtear remonstrated in gentle words. This enraged the Registrar, and he at once ordered the mukhtear to be dragged into the Hajat. The poor victim begged for pardon and mercy. The Bara Hozoor granted him this boon, but inflicted another punishment still more degrading. Before the full court he was ordered to pull his own ears, and to slap his own cheeks. This he did and thus purchased his release.

Now Sir, before giving the other particulars of this case, I must stop to discuss whether the Sub-Registrar had any power to order the poor mukhtear into the Hajat or to inflict upon him any other punishment calculated to bring dishonour on him, and also whether any contempt of court was committed by the mukhtar's remonstrating with him. It is a clear fact that a Sub-Registrar, while performing the duties of his own Registry office, has no criminal powers. The only thing which he can do is to report the matter to the Magistrate. Besides, the Registration Act distinctly lays it down that a Sub-Registrar's office is no court at all. It is like the ordinary Serishta and the Sub-Registrar is the Serishtedar of it. Hence it is evident that the Motihari Sub-Registrar had no reasonable grounds to proceed in this way, and in doing so he stepped beyond the bounds of law and brought discredit on himself and dishonour on the local bar.

But to the point. The other mukhtears on hearing this news were filled with rage and indignation. Immediately a petition was drawn up, asking the District Registrar to allow them to proceed criminally against the Sub-Registrar. This reached his ears, and he was greatly confused and terrified. He immediately despatched his mohurri to the mukhtarkhana, confessed his fault, and after expressing regret begged for their pardon. This was refused to him at first, but after many attempts, and through the intervention of a few kind hearted gentlemen, he succeeded in obtaining his pardon. Thus ended the case. But I must make some reflections here. The victim mukhtear has brought discredit on the very profession itself. His cowardly act in thus soliciting pardon, is well calculated to encourage these good-for-nothing Hakims. The well known saying that "Pulling the ears of the mukhtears is not an offence," has been practically proved at Motihari. It is indeed to be regretted that the matter was dropped. The Registrar ought to have been made an example of. He ought to have been given a lesson which might have taught others also. If the mukhtears are insensible to self-respect and self honor, and if they are so cowardly, then let them at once bid farewell to free and independent practice, and let me at once tell them that they would find it difficult to practise their profession without being chastised at every step of their proceedings.

DEBATE ON THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

Mr. Schwann moved, as an amendment, "That, in the opinion of this House, no reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle will prove satisfactory to the Indian people or compatible with the good government of India." He assured the House that he proposed this amendment in no party spirit. In the presence of 285 millions of our fellow subjects in the East it would be wrong for any one to touch upon the subject in any but the most judicial and impartial spirit. At the same time he felt it incumbent upon him to submit the amendment, because he believed the Bill would not in any way answer the expectations, the desires, or the aspirations of the Indian people. It could not be accepted by the House, and it would not be accepted by the Indian people as anything like an instalment of what they desired, what they required, and what was necessary for their happiness. The Bill contained but a very slight trace of the elective principle. He admitted that India consisted of a number of races of different degree and origin. At the same time, England consisted of more than one race, and it would be impossible to find a nation which maintained absolute purity of race and blood. The Indian people might now be called a nationality. How had that taken place? Through the instrumentality of the English language, English education, free Press, and the right of public meeting. (Cheers). The hon. gentleman had spoken as if India were sunk in ignorance. The House should remember that there were five Universities in India, and, besides, there were 20 Indians at Oxford, 20 at Cambridge, and others at other Universities in this country preparing to return to India after receiving a thorough English education. When they went back to India they would meet a large number of men who had also passed through the English Universities. At one time the Panjabees could not understand the Madrasees, and the Bengalees could not understand the Madrasees. Now they could act together for political purposes. Lord Macaulay forecasted a period when the Indian people, being instructed in European knowledge, might demand European institutions, and he said that when that time came, if it ever came, "it would be the proudest day in English history" (hear, hear); that England, finding a great people sunk in the greatest depths of superstition, had raised them to such a level. "That, indeed," said Lord Macaulay, "would be a glory all our own." Was it not strange that in the National Congress they would find representatives of all the races acting together with the greatest harmony, the greatest loyalty to the Crown, and with great advantage, he submitted, to the Indian people? They would find amongst the members of the Congress Hindoos, Mussulmans, Parsees, Christians, Sikhs, and others. The growth of this Congress was phenomenal. In 1885 the Congress met in Bombay, when there were 72 delegates; in 1886 at Calcutta, 400 delegates; in 1887 at Madras, 607 delegates; in 1888 in Allahabad, 1,500 delegates; in 1889, Bombay, 1,590. When it met in 1890, owing to the difficulties as to hospitality, the number of delegates was 677 at Calcutta. The delegates came from the extreme portions of India. He denied, therefore, that there was any lack of competent men, to undertake the duties referred to by the hon. member. He had the pleasure of being present at the meeting of the Indian Congress in 1890, and he had never seen any debate carried on in a more orderly, imposing and amicable manner. The only difference he noticed from one of their own party congresses was that the costumes of the delegates were in some cases very gorgeous and in other cases very simple. There were present besides the delegates some 6,000 or 7,000 spectators. The delegates were all elected in public meeting, open and free, so that already the elective principle was already in operation to a large extent. He should also insist on the loyal spirit of the Congress. The chairman, in his opening remarks, said, "The keynote of the movement was loyalty to the British Crown and the English people to whom India owed its rebirth." The Indian National Congress was at first treated with ridicule; then threats were used; and now it was received with cordiality. The present Viceroy had spoken handsomely about it. He declared that it was constitutional, and that there was no reason why Civil servants should abstain from attending it. The English Press had also changed its tone. The Times now treated it with far more courtesy than formerly, and so it was with other papers; but he need not weary the House. The Anglo-Indian Press was different. They might as well expect the Orange Press to be partial to the member for North East Cork as for the Anglo-Indian Press to deal in a friendly spirit with the Indian National Congress. The House would be surprised to hear that there were 755 municipalities in India and some 890 local boards, and these bodies had the control of Rs. 7,000,000. All the evidence testified to the enormous interest taken by the Indian people in the election of their local boards. It was true that sometimes there were occasional lapses, and that the management of some boards might not be in accordance with the very best principles, but he had yet to learn that such things did not exist in the British Isles. (Hear, hear.) In the North-West Provinces the returns of the voters showed a very large percentage of the whole number, amounting to 96 and 89 per cent. at contested elections. With regard to the application of the elective principle to the Viceregal and Presidential Councils, the hon. member had referred to Lord Dufferin. For his own part he had been somewhat surprised at this reference, knowing what Lord Dufferin had stated with regard to this question. Lord Dufferin said that there were wide and new fields in which the Government of India was called upon to labour, but they no longer had to labour alone; education had done its work, and they were surrounded on all sides by native gentlemen from whose co-operation they might derive the greatest benefit; and he had spoken with approval of their natural ambition to be more extensively associated with their English rulers in the management of their domestic affairs. (Hear, hear.) Lord Dufferin had himself proposed that the elective principle should be introduced into the Presidential Councils. The hon. member had spoken of Lord

Dufferin's suggestion to the home Government but had omitted to say that amongst them was the elective principle. In another place noble lords had always taken it for granted that this suggestion had been made by Lord Dufferin. Lord Northbrook in another place had stated that he was in favour of a properly guarded application of some mode of election. With regard to Lord Lansdowne, they had been led to believe that the Bill embodied his views. It was, of course, difficult to know the private documents which had passed between the home and the Indian Governments, but there was a very general feeling that when Lord Lansdowne had sent round the proposal of Lord Dufferin to all the different Governments in India he had received from them a general acquiescence to the elective principle being adopted to a certain extent. It seemed to him that in a case where there was such a strong feeling it would have been right if the full text of the communications with Lord Lansdowne had been given to the House. (Hear, hear.) Lord Canning in 1861, when the matter had been put forward, said that the whole proposal should be laid before the Government and the people of England, so that they might arrive at a clear decision upon it. It was, perhaps, scarcely necessary for him to refer to Lord Ripon, because they all knew that he had broad views upon this matter: he had stated that, while he did not look for an early introduction of household suffrage into India, he thought that there should be infused into the Legislative Council a reasonable proportion of the representative element, which would enable the educated natives of India to make their voice really heard. The hon. baronet the member for Evesham, speaking in August, 1889, had said that he had long thought that elective members might be substituted for the appointed members in the various Legislative Councils. In our representative government we were completely behind some of the native States; in Mysore, for instance, the elective principle had been adopted with complete success. Nomination was the real key to the whole position, and the nomination system was a perfect fraud. How could a Viceroy be expected to appoint to his Council the men who criticized his policy most severely? It was true however, that one or two Viceroys, such as Lord Ripon, had endeavoured to do this. He would direct the attention of hon. members wishing to study this subject to a book entitled "New India," by a Mr. Cotton who had had much experience of Indian administration. This writer, while disclaiming all disloyalty to the Indian Government, declared that it was not too much to say that the present constitution of the legislative Councils was the merest farce; that officials predominated too largely to permit of any independent action; and that the official members were the mere puppets of the Viceroy. The Indian people made demands which were irresistible because they were just and reasonable, and the more educated and advanced representatives of the Indian people would always be found loyal to the British Empire. Whenever the House of Commons had interfered in Indian affairs, it had always been for the real benefit of India. The House would remember the eloquent address of the late Mr. Bradlaugh, advocating the restoration of the Maharajah of Cashmere—a ruler who was at the time painted in the blackest colours by the then Under-Secretary for India. Yet during his recent visit to Cashmere Lord Lansdowne had himself reinstated the Maharajah. Again, the House had beneficially interfered in the opium question; and there could be no doubt that if the Manipur affair had been submitted to the House before action was taken the common sense of the House would have prevented the gratuitous mischief from being wrought in that State which was actually achieved. No one who had read Mrs. Grimwood's account of the state of Manipur under the late ruler could doubt that the Indian Government ought never to have interfered at all. There were some good features in the Bill—for instance, the granting of power to discuss Indian finances in the Councils, but the question was, By whom were these discussions to be conducted? The greater number of the members of the Councils would be officials or nominees, and but a very small proportion would really represent the interests of the Indian people. The proposed additions were wholly inadequate. The principle which the Indian National Congress had always held was that the number of elected members should not be less than one-third of the whole, and not more than one-half. In the Council of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, of the four elected members only two could be said to represent the 70 millions of Indian people who were concerned. He hoped the Government would understand the situation, and see that it would be unwise to offer a stone when bread was asked for; and certainly it would be unreasonable to expect gratitude for such a gift. He thought he had shown that the question of the enlargement of the Councils by the introduction of the elective principle was deserving of the attention of the House. As far as the question of the invasion of India was concerned, the best and the strongest rampart to the Indian Empire was the loyalty and attachment of a happy and contented people. He had adduced a large body of weighty opinion to show that the promises made on more than one occasion to the Indian people ought now to be fulfilled; and he therefore moved the amendment standing in his name. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Gladstone, who on rising was received with cheers, said—As far as controversy is concerned, I hope that this debate may be compressed within narrow limits. My hon. friend the member for Manchester has asked the House by his amendment to declare that, in its opinion, no reform of the Indian Councils can be satisfactory which does not embody the elective principle. Looking at the Bill and at the amendment, I have to ask myself whether there is between them such a difference of opinion and principle as to make me desirous of going to an issue on that difference. Undoubtedly, looking at the Bill standing by itself, I am disposed to agree with my hon. friend that its language is insufficient and unsatisfactory in as far as it is ambiguous. But the Under-Secretary had introduced the Bill in a comprehensive and lucid speech, and if I were to criticize any portion of that speech it would be that portion of it in which the hon. gentleman addressed himself to the amendment before the House, because it appeared to be his object to put upon the amendment the most hostile construction it would bear. I, however, desire to put upon the speeches I have heard, and upon the Bill itself, the least controversial construction of which they are fairly susceptible. (Hear, hear.) While the language of the Bill cannot be said to embody the elective principle, it is very peculiar language, unless it is intended to pave the way for the adoption of that principle. (Hear, hear.) I believe it was suggested by a nobleman in the House of Lords, who is friendly to the elective principle in India, that, unless it had been intended to leave room for some peculiarities not yet introduced into the Indian system in the appointment of the members of the Councils under this Bill, it would have been a very singular form of speech to provide not simply that the Governor-General might nominate, but that he might make regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations should be made either by himself or by the Government in Council. (Hear, hear.) It is plain that those who have adopted that language have in view something beyond mere nomination. (Hear, hear.) Then I come to the speech of the Under-Secretary, which distinctly embodies something which I confess appears to me to be not very different from the assertions of my hon. friend, except in the important point that the Under-Secretary proposes to leave everything to the discretion, judgment, and responsibility of the Governor-General and the authorities in India. With that limitation the speech of the Under-Secretary appears to me to embody the elective principle in the only sense in which we should expect it to be embodied. (Hear, hear.) My construction of the Under-Secretary's speech is that it implies that a serious effort should be made to consider carefully these elements which in the present condition of India, might furnish material for the introduction into the Councils of the elective principle. If that serious effort is to be made, by whom is it to be made? I do not think that it can be made by the House of Commons except through the medium of empowering provisions. The hon. baronet the member for Evesham has spoken of a plan of that kind, and I observed with pleasure the genuinely liberal views of the hon. baronet with respect to Indian affairs and to the government of the Indian people, and were the hon. baronet to propose a plan of the kind he has indicated to the House it would no doubt contain much that would be useful, and wise, and honourable to the spirit of such an assembly as the House of Commons (Hear, hear.) It may, however, be doubted whether, even under such enlightened guidance it would be wise on our part, with our imperfect knowledge, to proceed to the determination of the particulars of such a plan. (Hear, hear.) I think that the best course to take would be to commend the plan to the authorities in India with a clear indication of the principle on which we desire they should proceed. It is our business to give to those representing her Majesty's Government in India ample information as to what we believe to be sound principles of government. It is the function of this House to comment upon any case in which we think the authorities in India have failed to give due effect to those principles; but in the discharge of their high administrative functions, or as to the choice of means, there is no doubt that that should be left in their hands. (Hear, hear.) It is evident that the great question—and it is one of great and profound interest—before the House is that of the introduction of the elective element into the government of India. That question overshadows and absorbs everything else. It is a question of vital importance; but it is at the same time one of great difficulty. (Hear, hear.) No more difficult office has ever been intrusted to a Governor-General than that of administering a Bill such as that which is now before the House in a manner that shall be honourable and wise. I am not disposed to ask of the Governor-General, or of the Secretary of State, that they shall at once produce large and imposing results. (Hear, hear.) What I wish is that their first step shall be of a genuine nature, and that whatever scope they give to the elective principle shall be real. (Hear, hear.) There are, of course, dangers in their way. There is the danger of subserviency. There is the danger of having persons who represent cliques, classes, or interests, and who may claim the honour of representing the people of India. The old story of the three tailors of Tooley street does, after all, embody an important political truth, and it does exhibit a real danger. (Hear, hear.) What we want is to get at the real heart and mind, the most upright sentiments, and the most enlightened thoughts of the people of India; but it is not an easy matter to do that. (Hear, hear.) I think, however, that upon this point we are justified in being a little more sanguine than the Under-Secretary has been in his speech. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member, however, did not venture to indicate where the materials for the elective element in India are to be found. Undoubtedly, as far as my own prepossessions go, I should look presumptively with the greatest amount of expectation and hope to the municipal bodies of India, and to the local authorities, in which the elective element is already included in that country. (Hear, hear.) My hon. friend, in moving the amendment, has pointed out authorities in favour of the elective principle, these including men who have been responsible for the actual administration of India. It is there that we stand upon solid ground, and her Majesty's Government ought to understand that it will be regarded as a most grave disappointment if, after all the assurances we have received that an attempt will be made to bring into operation this powerful engine of government, there should not be some result such as we anticipate from their action. (Hear, hear.) I do not speak of its amount, I speak more of its quality. In an Asiatic country like India, with its ancient civilization, with its institutions so peculiar, with such a diversity of races, religions, and pursuits, with such an enormous extent of country, and such a multitude of human beings as probably, except in the case of China, were never before under a single Government, I can understand that there should be difficulties in carrying what we desire to see accomplished; but great as the difficulties are, the task is a noble task, and will require the utmost prudence and care in conducting it to a successful termination. But after the assurances we have had from persons of the highest capacity, and the greatest responsibility, I believe we are justified in looking forward, not merely to a nominal, but to a real living representation of the people of India. The great nation to which we belong has undoubtedly had to do most difficult tasks in the government and in the foundation of the institutions of extraneous territories. But all the other parts of the British Empire have presented to us a simple problem in comparison with the great problem presented to us by India. Its magnitude, its technicality, is such that the task of Great Britain in this respect is far greater than that which any other country has attempted, and far greater than that which it has itself attempted beyond the sea in any of the dependencies of the Empire. I rejoice to think that a great and real advance has been made, both before and especially since the direct transfer of the Indian Government to the immediate superintendence of the Executive at home, and to the authority of the Imperial Legislature. The progress thus made has been made by the constant application to the government of India of the minds of able men acting under a strong sense of duty, and also a strong sense of political responsibility. (Hear, hear.) All these things induce us to look forward cheerfully to a great future for India, and to expect that a real success will attend the genuine application, even though it may be a limited one, of the elective principle to the government of that vast and almost immeasurable community. If this attempt be successful, it will be the accomplishment of a task to which it would be difficult to find a parallel in history. (Hear, hear.) I see no such difference between my hon. friend's language and the language of the Bill as ought to induce my hon. friend to divide the House. If the language of my hon. friend is to receive a perfectly legitimate, and not a strained, construction, it is only an amplification and not a contradiction of what the speech of the hon. gentleman the Under-Secretary implies. I think it would be a great misfortune if the House were to divide on the subject. I think that the acceptance of the elective principle by the hon. gentleman, though guarded, was on the whole not otherwise than a frank acceptance. I do not think there is on that side of the House any jealousy of the introduction into India of that principle (hear, hear) which undoubtedly if it did exist would form a strong mark of difference between the party who sits there and the party who sits on this side of the House. In reality, and in substance, we have the same objects in view, and are prepared to recommend the employment of the same means. If that be so, it would be unfortunate that any division should take place even though the numbers might be very unequal. I certainly could not take part in any division hostile, or apparently hostile, to the Bill. (Hear, hear.) After the speech of the hon. gentleman such a division would convey a wrong impression. It would be well that the people of India should understand that united views on this question substantially prevail in this House. (Hear, hear.) My persuasion is that those views are united, and that they are such as tend to the development of an enlightened and not only a liberal but a free system of government. I venture to submit that the hon. gentleman has no substantial quarrel with the intentions of the Government, and that we should do well to allow this Bill to receive the unanimous assent of the House in the present Session, in the hope that without serious difficulty it may shortly become law and fulfil the beneficent purposes with which it has been framed. (Cheers.)

Half-yearly Meeting. Calcutta, 11th May 1892.

THE Half-Yearly General Meeting of Proprietors was held this day at the Rooms of the Association, No. 102, Clive Street.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

A CHURCHYARD SCENE.

It was a gloomy Sabbath eve—
I felt in dreamy mood,
And wander'd to a lone churchyard
To join its solitude ;
The village groups had all withdrawn,
But, through the twilight grey,
I saw a lonely woman stand
As loth to go away.

She was array'd in widow's weeds,
I could not see her face,
Which might have told why at that hour
She sought the silent place ;
I stole aside with soften'd step
No rude annoy to bring
To one who seem'd bow'd down with grief,
For grief's a sacred thing.

The shadow of the old grey church
Fell round me like a pall,
But the mourner's figure I could see
Upon the churchyard wall ;
She knew not any eye was near
Except the eye of Him,
Whose presence we the more behold
The more our eyes are dim.

Long long she gazed upon the ground,
On one small spot, alas !
Which seem'd to swell to meet the hand
She laid upon the grass ;
Her hand she laid upon the grass—
Retired, yet lingering stayed,
And aye upon the silent grass
Her long thin hand she laid.

That hand had often smoothed the couch
Of him who slept beneath,
And the love by which 't was guided seem'd
A love that knew not death ;
And so she knelt as if to feel
If earth were warm and soft
As the pillow—vacant now—on which
His head had lain so oft.

Ah me! what depth of love was here
Who thus her home forsook,
And all the living world beside,
Upon his grave to look ;—

I could not see the tears she shed,
They flow'd not to be seen,—
But well I knew the grass was wet,
O'er which her eyes had been.

And still the grass she gently touch'd,—
And bended meekly o'er,
As if to give her hand to him
Who took it once before ;
That so she might bring back the time,
The morning time of life,
When by his side—a girl in years—
She felt in heart a wife.

Or haply 'twas in memory
Of some old early vow,
To love him even after death,
That she sought his grave place now,—
Or, for some word unkindly said,
Though not unkindly meant,
Perchance upon his grave to shed
Atoning tears she went.

And oft upon that grave she look'd,
And oft she look'd above,
As if between that spot and heaven
She shared her whole heart's love !—
'Twas long before she left the place,
And as she moved away,
Methought her inmost bosom yearn'd
Forever there to stay.

A few stars glimmer'd over-head,
Deep darkness crept around—
Beneath, old generations slept—
The place was holy ground !
All silent through the dull grave-mounds
I homeward sadly turn'd,
Yet almost deem'd 'twere sweet to die
To be so loved and mourn'd.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—A Cure for Abscesses, Piles, Fistula, and Sores of every description.—The very satisfactory results arising from the use of this invaluable Ointment, when the patients have been suffering from any of the above disorders, have induced the Medical profession to introduce it into the hospitals and their private practice, and in many instances where the sufferer was considered incurable, Holloway's Ointment, in conjunction with his Pills, healed the most desperate cases. They are also unequalled for the cure of scrofula, scurvy, and all diseases of the skin, and the cures they effect are not temporary or imperfect, for by their purifying powers they bring about a marvellous and most beneficial change in the whole system, and enable it, with renovated powers, to resist the approach of all future attacks of the same disease.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

WEEKLYANA.

HER Majesty's seventy-third birthday passed off wretchedly in this metropolis. There was no ceremony to speak of unless the feu de joie fired may be accounted one. There was not even the Lord Mayoral entertainment of a Garden Party, introduced by the late Sir Henry Harrison as Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation. The death of his friend and the half-allowance of house rent sanctioned, probably decided Mr. Lee in honouring in the breach rather than the observance what had grown to a metropolitan civic custom.

THE day was, however, observed as a public holiday. The daily press too, excepting the Indian Daily News and the Hindoo Patriot, gave their employés rest. The neglected capital was not even aware of the honors of the day. The ignorance threatened to last the following day. Indeed, but for the Indian Daily News of the 25th, nobody, not specially telegraphed to, would have had even an inkling of them. The Patriot, with its new enterprise, could only copy at noon the telegraphic summary of the News, with all its imperfections and mistakes, telegraphic and typographic, on its head. The next day the Englishman gave a more precise list.

Why are not arrangements made to issue the day's Gazette simultaneously at all the capital cities of the Empire? The telegraph cannot often be put to better use. The Birthday honors are a part of the celebration. And they are, by far, the best part. They serve to bring the Queen Empress to the business and bosom of the people. All the military stations fire the feu de joie. The cost of simultaneous publication of the Honors at the capitals would not very much exceed the cost of the gunpowder expended, while its effect would be immense. It would go a goodly way towards establishing the British Throne in the East.

AT Simla, besides the Levée, there was the customary State Dinner, at which sixty-two officials, including the Viceroy's staff, attended.

A contretemps occurred at Naini-Tal. The hour fixed for Parade was eight. As the Lieutenant-Governor and staff, who were riding, were within a short distance of the ground, the big clock near the parade ground showing that they had still over five minutes in hand, the feu de joie was fired in the presence of Major Croker, Commanding the dépôt. Hearing the sound, Sir Auckland Colvin turned and rode back, leaving behind his Aid-de-Camp to enquire into the cause of the premature outburst of joy.

 The Hon'ble Major J. H. Spring Branson, Commandant, Madras Artillery Volunteers.

THERE are some capital anecdotes in Mr. George P. A. Healey's article in the Century magazine on the famous French painter Couture. Here is one. The Emperor Napoleon III. commissioned him to paint him. In sitting for his portrait the ruler gave him no end of suggestions and proposed no end of alterations more or less trenching upon the painter's province, so that Couture at last broke out saying, "Sire, who is to paint this picture, Your Majesty or I?" The "Sire" made no reply, unless perhaps muttering, Well, well. But the portrait remained unfinished, the Emperor giving no more sittings.

"JYOTISHI Kulendra Prosad Saraswati," Calcutta, writes to the papers—"I find by calculation that there will be loss of life and property by the inclemency of the weather on the 27th June next." He is discreet enough not to particularize the locality or to ascertain the extent of the loss. The Englishman enquires who he is and recommends his friends to look after him carefully. There is no need of taking any trouble in that behalf. The man is wise in his generation, seeing that he can get all the European journals of the metropolis to advertise his business gratis. It is the journalists who want taking care by friends. As for the calculation of which this sage brags, if it has any value it has no novelty. Every Hindu knew all about it before the jyotishi rushed into print.

ON April 29, a cyclone swept over Mauritius, completely annihilating the island. A local journal writes:—

"The colony has just been struck by one of those disasters of which there are but few examples in history. In less than six hours it has been completely annihilated—annihilated to such a degree that it is really doubtful whether it will ever recover from the blow. Half the town of Port Louis is a heap of ruins. Thousands of wounded, dying, and dead have already been dragged out from under the ruins of the houses, and as we write the living and dead are still being dragged out. The funeral knell is continually tolling, and carts conveying the dead and wounded are to be met in all the streets. There is not a Mauritian family but is in mourning. There is not a family which is not ruined.

Three quarters of the sugar houses are overthrown; plantations are destroyed. The splendid crop we expected is reduced to zero for some estates and to less than half for those whose mills are still standing. Whole villages have disappeared. Thousands are without bread, houseless and homeless, camping in the open air.

Beau Bassin, Rose Hill, Phoenix, Vacas, Rose Belle, Mahebourg, and Souillac, like Port Louis, are heaps of ruins. Whole families have disappeared, crushed under the ruins of their dwellings. The hurricane was not the only cause of the destruction. While the wind was blowing its hardest, fires burst out in several places. All Pouce Street and the lower part of the Mountain were in flames. The disaster at Martinique is spoken of as being one of the most dreadful within the memory of man. It is a question whether that which has just fallen upon us is not a still greater one."

Another account says:—

"There was no doubt that we were in the presence of a hurricane without example. Solid buildings were blown down; planks, shingles, and tin roofs flew about in all directions. The hurricane lasted about an hour and a half, and in that short space half the town was destroyed. Plantations were uprooted, and most of the sugar mills blown down. Most of the ships in harbour were on shore. While the island was being thus devastated, a great number of inhabitants were detained in the greatest anxiety at the central station, their families being alone without assistance in the country. It was only at about 7 P. M. that people began to be aware of the extent of the disaster. A few went out in quest of news. They came back to the station announcing that the Convent and Orphanage de Notre Dame de Bon Secours had been blown down, making many victims. The sky now became red—fire had broken out among the ruins in several places at the same time. Some attempt was made to organize assistance, but a great part of the suburbs was on fire. Daylight at length came to enlighten an unexampled scene of ruin and desolation. It was only then that the extent of the disaster became apparent. From one end of the island to the other all is death, ruin and desolation. The hurricane which raged for a few hours yesterday, the 29th of April, has in many respects been unprecedented in Mauritius. Never till now has the island been visited by a cyclone or hurricane at any time between the 12th of April and 1st of December. Hitherto the hurricane season of Mauritius has been supposed to begin on the latter and to end on the former day, and till yesterday, there has been no exception to the rule. Nor was there any sign of danger till yesterday, when the barometer began to fall rapidly and the wind to increase to a heavy gale. The suddenness, rapidity, and extent of the changes which took place in course of a few hours are without a parallel in the annals of the Colony."

MR. Henniker Heaton, M. P., the champion of ocean penny postage calculates that the cost to the Post Office of sending a letter to any quarter of the globe is one farthing, and, therefore, if his scheme of penny postage were adopted, there would be a profit of three-farthings on each letter. He has, besides, visited every Postmaster-General in the colonies who all have received his idea eagerly.

IN England, with a population slightly exceeding 29,000,000, there were registered, during the year 1891, 226,025 marriages, 913,863 births, and 587,666 deaths. The total of births was made up of 465,927 males and of 448,209 females, and as regards the deaths of 302,518 males and 285,148 females. In the face of these figures, the difficulty for women to get married is significant. Polygamy in such a community is out of the question.

THERE is a plague of mice or voles in the south-eastern counties of Scotland. While the farmers are concerting plans to exterminate them, a new species of owl not before seen in Scotland and which lives on voles, has put in an appearance. The Lord gave and the Lord is taking away. Blessed be the name of the Lord!

THE Mahratta, of May 22, concludes an article entitled "Price of the Bridegroom" thus:—

"But there appears to be total apathy about the matter among those who ought to be the first to set an example of disinterestedness to their countrymen. The last social Conference refused to entertain a proposition condemning the Hunda custom for reasons we can hardly conjecture. All are agreed in strongly protesting against it when they have to pay, but none ever shows sufficient moral courage to forego the advantage when his turn comes to receive.

The custom has become intolerable among the Bengalees as it is amongst the Parsees, the Parbhys and other limited communities on our own side. Girls frequently grow up to mature ages without marriage, as husbands are practically unobtainable owing to the large prices set on them and the growing inclination amongst the youths for the freedom of bachelorhood and dissipated life. The result of this is of course an enormous amount of heart-burning and immorality; and it is to be feared that the contagion will soon spread to Brahmins and other large castes if the evil is not rooted out in time. Pandit Mahesh Chandra Chakravarti is trying to put a stop to the custom of taking dowries in East Bengal by making persons sign a declaration that they will never extort money at their sons' marriages. But we have hardly any faith left in such pledges. We had our own tabular declarations, but experience has proved that no one is bound by them when the devil tempts them. Persons are not even ashamed to confess that their signatures have no more value than the ink and paper. The problem however difficult demands immediate solution, and ought to be sternly and seriously faced by those who call themselves champions of social reform. We shall content ourselves with suggesting a few remedies which may be effective:—

1. To form a strong public opinion against it.
2. To extend the field of selection by permitting intermarriages amongst those communities which can dine together such as the Konkarnasthas and Karhadas of the Deccan.
3. To prohibit all useless expenses at marriages.
4. And to introduce the practice of settling such dowries, if any are given at all, in the name of the girl or at least the husband."

There is no want of denouncers of the growing evils. But the denouncers themselves are usually the worst offenders.

FROM an advertisement in another column, it will be seen that the next Hare Anniversary falls on next Wednesday. The discourse selected for the occasion is the History of the Press in India. The subject ought to interest other than schoolboys. The development of the press in India is the history of modern progress in this country.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

OUR OWN NEWS.

FLOODS of American proportions have overtaken the Missouri and Mississippi valleys, ruining crops and drowning many people. Fifteen hundred square miles of country are under water. The damages at Saint Louis and in the adjacent countries bordering on the Mississippi are estimated at eleven million dollars.

THE Czar and family have gone to Copenhagen to assist at the celebration of the golden wedding of the King and Queen of Denmark.

LORD Salisbury had a narrow escape from an alarming accident on the evening of the 26th. His horses took fright and bolted down St. James's Street, overturning and badly smashing his brougham. His Lordship was severely shaken, but as the leading Englishman of the day he got out and quietly walked to the Foreign Office. It was the best treatment for his case too.

IN the interests of peace and with a view to increase the strength of the active armaments, both France and Germany have passed Bills for re-forming their armies. The German Bill provides for the gradual reduction of the term of service in the Infantry to two years.

THE Khedive has been honored with the Grand Cross of the Bath.

SIR Charles Parker Butt who only last year succeeded Lord Hannen as President of the English Court of Probate, Divorce and Admiralty, is dead. He was sixty-two years of age.

THE Indian Councils Bill was, on the night of the 26th, read in the House of Commons a third time without the introduction of any amendments. We may take the Bill as passed. It is a gift indeed and may be associated with the seventy-third Birthday of the Queen just celebrated.

IN the House of Commons, in reply to a question from Sir Roper Lethbridge, the Under-Secretary of State for India traced the origin of the Imperial Service Corps, started by Lord Dufferin while Viceroy of India, to the loyal and generous offer of the Nizam to place at the disposal of the Government of India a strong force and in time of war his own sword. That tracing is nothing new, but is the truth? Did the man Nizam or the system of intrigue and falsehood called the Government of Hyderabad make the offer? Did the Nizam even know of it when he was irretrievably committed to it?

MR. Curzon assured the House of Commons that the cost of the Behar Cadastral Survey was not expected to exceed eight annas to the acre, that the employment of village officials under careful inspection would prevent extortion and oppression, that no staff beyond that now under Colonel Sandeman would be appointed until October, and that the reports against the Survey would be included in the papers that were being printed—doubtless after careful editing—for presentation to Parliament.

These assurances have little practical value. Mr. Curzon, it is well known, does not speak for himself, he is the mouthpiece of a department. In this matter he spoke as advised. For some time the telegraphic communication between the India Office and the Governments in India has been brisk. Information and explanations have been called for and given. The Local Government could only put a good face upon a doubtful matter. As the struggle becomes keener, the air will be thick with assurances of diverse import. Our countrymen had better keep their heads clear from the influences of such feelers, if not worse.

After all, it was scarcely necessary for Reuter to telegraph to us Mr. Curzon's assurances. To us they have nothing new. The same information and much more to the point have been, officially or otherwise, published in this country. In fact, the assurances made in the House of Commons have already been contradicted by admissions made in India in the last Bengal Resolution on the Orissa Survey.

BEFORE the enquiry into the tragedy at Rampore has concluded, another diabolical crime has overtaken the Ulwar State. The Maharaja died suddenly at Naini-Tal on Sunday night and a high official of his was simultaneously murdered at city Ulwar. The cause of the Maharaja's death is yet unknown. Baboo Kunj Behari Lal, senior Member of the Ulwar Council, was found lying dead near a tank with five or six cuts on his body. The Political Agent, Colonel Fraser, who was with the Maharaja, hastened to Ulwar.

ON Monday, at Bombay, while a number of native and European gentlemen were standing on it, the gangway over the side of the mail steamer Pekin suddenly gave way, bringing them all down to the water below. There would have been loss of life but that the sea was calm and the boats alongside rendered prompt help in rescuing the plunged men struggling for their lives. All were saved, only some little property which fell into the water could not be recovered.

The accident is most discreditable to the administration. It is simply shocking that a mail steamer should be liable to such an accident. We trust the Government will institute the most searching inquiry and find out the responsible officer and deal with him without compunction.

IT is so rare to see the right man in the right place, that the people of Behar are really to be congratulated on the appointment of Mr. C. F. Worsley as Commissioner of the Patna Division. The news will be received with joy throughout that province where, for the last 8 or 10 years, it was in the mouth of every person that no one was more fitted for that responsible and difficult position than Mr. Worsley, who had worked in it with remarkable efficiency in varied capacities for nearly a quarter of a century, and whose sympathy with the Behar people is as unmistakable as his knowledge of their wants and requirements is known to be extensive. Of late, Patna has been ruled by a succession of strangers, who, whatever their abilities, could not bring to bear upon their administration the special experience required for successfully and quickly dealing with each important question, and the ready information necessary to guard against the aims of pretenders and imposters and upstarts of sorts and different schools under different cloaks of public life. We hope things will now take a different turn and go on smoothly.

We hear that our old friend Pootee Ghazi, who figured so prominently, about twenty years ago, in the Alipore Courts, in connection with the daring dacoities perpetrated by a fearless gang in the Sunderbuns under his leadership, and who was convicted and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, has, after undergoing his full term, appeared before us again in an entirely new but not uncongenial garb. We have no doubt that the inmates of the Presidency Jail will be able to identify him as their old associate.

IN execution of Messrs. Gladstone, Wylle & Co.'s decree for Rs. 18,000, M. C. Borooah, Honorary Magistrate and member of the Local Board at Gauhati, was arrested and placed before the Deputy Commissioner of Gauhati on Monday last. He was released on his undertaking to file a schedule of insolvency. Mr. Borooah's liabilities are said to exceed a lac of rupees, while his assets are almost nothing. At the same time, criminal proceedings against the insolvent by the Alliance Bank of Simla, who complain of his dealings, are talked of.

SAHIBZADAH Hafiz Mahomed Abdul Lateef Khan, son-in-law of the reigning Nawab of Tonk and son of Sahibzadah Mahomed Obaidullah Khan, Prime Minister of that State, is on a visit to Calcutta for nearly a fortnight. The young nobleman is the guest of his namesake, Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadur.

The Sahibzada paid with his tutor Mr. Reed, Principal of the Ajmere College, a flying visit to Darjeeling whence he has just returned. He is likely to proceed to Colombo by the P. and O. steamer which leaves in the beginning of next month.

MRS. Sala is said to have published in America a book called "Famous People I have Met." Her most famous man is, naturally, her George Augustus. "The most interesting chapter" of the book, according to the Morning Post, "is that which tells how 'G. A. S.' produces his D. T. 'leaders.'" Are the latter initials intended to suggest the wild, hysterical character of the editorial columns of the great Fleet Street daily with which Mr. Sala, no less than Sir Edwin Arnold, is identified?

This is the process of production of the brilliant articles which, notwithstanding the sneers of Saturday Reviewers and similar pigs, young and old, have been the delight of several decades of readers:—

"After the subject has been selected and thought over for a little time the article is dictated, the time so occupied being about an hour and a half:—He never stammers, never harks back, and rarely recasts a sentence. He just talks slowly and deliberately, 'like a book,' only interrupting the flow of his phraseology from time to time by quietly saying to his amanuensis, 'colon,' 'semi-colon,' 'full stop,' 'invert,' 'dash,' 'hyphen,' 'caps,' 'underscore,' and so on, as the case may be."

Such is the perfection of practice! At the same time, it has reduced what ought to be the outpouring of the soul to an almost mechanical operation and a matter of business.

At one time Lady Ermytrude Malet—who is now in London with her husband on leave from the Embassy at Berlin—plumed herself on her jewels, which she used to carry on her person at some balls to the value of seven or eight lacs of Rupees. Her vanity has now declined on a lower range and she is now proud of her leather and prunello—boots and shoes. It must be a pity that she cannot carry them all on her beautiful limbs. She is obliged to hold a permanent exhibition of her nether extremity wear, for the benefit of her friends. Valnest of vanities! The wife of a tradesman in Regent Street may beat my Ladyship any day.

MR. Sala has dished the Professor with a hideous name—Butcher—who responded to the toast of "Literature" at the Academy dinner of 30th April. The Prince of Journalists had never heard of this literary Butcher, to say nothing of reading any of his contributions to literature. He generously takes for granted the Professor's eminence from the circumstance of the Academy inviting him as a representative of literature and admires his reply as "really a very neat and readable speech." By way of proof of the praise he quotes from it the remark that "Greek literature was at once artistic and popular."

Whereupon remarks Mr. Sala,

"This sage utterance should at once cover with shame, as with a garment, the reprehensible persons who are contending that schoolboys only lose their time in learning Greek."

This is hardly fair to the poor Professor. That is a true observation of his, and it is not quite so trite as to call down punishment on its author's head. Another remark quoted is more open to exception on the ground of triviality. It appears that Professor Butcher—"the sapient Butcher," as Mr. Sala calls him—said,

"It was an important preliminary question to determine what literature is. A railway guide or a Blue book was not literature."

On this, Sala—

"True, O Professor; yet, on the other hand, railway guides and Blue books often render very valuable service to men of letters. A complete set of 'Bradshaw,' from the beginning, would be an inestimable boon to an author who undertook to write a history of English railways. As for the blue books, those azure folios have been guides, philosophers, and friends to a host of novelists. Blue books furnished Charles Reade with a host of material which he artistically worked up in 'It is Never Too Late to Mend,' and in 'Put yourself in his Place.'"

Again—

"Mrs. Trollope was largely indebted to Blue books for the technique and local colour in her novels, 'Michael Armstrong, the Factory Boy,' and 'Jessie Phillips: a Tale of the New Poor Law,' and it was while Marcus Clarke was subcurator of the Melbourne Public Library, and was surrounded with Blue books on Transportation and Convict Discipline, that he welded into shape the idea of his terribly realistic romance, 'For the Term of his Natural Life.'"

And so on.

With all deference to the great master of our craft, that is scarcely pertinent to the Professor's observation. To say that a railway guide or a Blue book is not literature is not a stunning proposition. It is triteness itself.

READERS of the Indian Press will remember a writer in its columns who during the last few years has been striving to pass as Dr. Sheppard, Physician on the staff of the Emperor of Russia. During the visit of the Czarewitch and his cousin, we never heard of him, maybe because he was too deeply engaged. Certainly, he did not chaperone them, nor any others of the many Russian magnates who have come here. Latterly, the said Dr. Sheppard has been devoting himself, like an old English doctor famous in English literature, to cemeteries, burials, tombstones and urns. Perhaps he has been disillusionised in respect of the Northern Bear. He does not appear to have regularly received his regulation pay and staff allowances. His change of residence from Mott's Lane to Park Street, has not availed him. His house is haunted by Small Cause Court bailiffs' devils—far more serious enemies of human happiness than those of the printer. One of the bailiffs, Mr. Franks, armed with the order of Court, went to arrest the doctor. The lord of the castle in Park Street repulsed the bailiff and bailiff's peons and all with bloodshed. Whatever else the mansion might want, it was rich in arms and accoutrements. The Doctor wrenched one of the swords pinned to the wall and delivered a formidable blow on Mr. Franks. Luckily it missed aim and eventually broke in the Doctor's hand.

The Bailiff saved himself by flight, pursued even to the street. He came to the nearest Police station where his wound was bandaged. The Police now organized a storming party, consisting of two European officers with a large native following. They found the enemy ready to receive them, dressed in the full dress of a Russian officer, with top boots and spurs, drawn sword in hand and dagger in his belt. He told them that he was Russian and that his house was Russian territory, and he commanded them to disperse, unless they wished to be cut down. Our hero was no general, however, for all the heavy outfit he had donned in this weather. While he was kept parleying, Inspector Elliott suddenly seized him and threw him on the ground, and another, Inspector Carroll, disarmed him, not however before he had inflicted several wounds on Inspector Elliott. The magistrate allowed him bail on his own recognizances and on two sureties. These sureties could not be found. The Foreign Office did not come forward to save the Doctor of Her Britannic Majesty's Imperial Ally, and none of Her Majesty's lieges ventured to oblige Dr. Sheppard. So the Czar's Physician and the necrological antiquarian is lying in jail for nothing, pending trial of the question of his heroic defence of Russian territory in Park Street, Calcutta.

The public are so ready, on the slightest pretence, to run down the Police and pile on its head all sorts of sins of commission as well as of omission, and atrocities perpetrated and unperpetrated, that when our civil defenders do acquit themselves thoroughly well they should get the full measure of credit that is their due. The Calcutta Police behaved splendidly in their encounter with the Russian bear of Park Street. He was an ugly customer, and the whole business a most difficult one. The problem was how to capture a desperate man armed cap-a-pie as quietly as possible, without extraordinary measures as without unnecessary bloodshed. The sphere was humble, yet success in it required no little strategy and the utmost coolness and daring. These were shown by Commissioner Lambert's Force. Inspector Elliott has made himself famous in his line. In braving his formidable desperado brandishing a naked sword still reeking with the blood of another European and grappling with him, he not only exhibited pluck but also tact and skill. It is in emergencies like these that the Briton proves his distinct superiority to the Indian.

AN esteemed friend writes to us privately on a subject which, after long thought, we consider worthy of public notice. He questions the strict accuracy of "a paragraph which appeared in Reis and Rayyet to the effect that Mr. C. C. Stevens, Member of the Board of Revenue, after visiting Chittagong, came away from that place for fear of cholera which was then raging there." We did not name Mr. Stevens, but it is true that we meant him. And although our language was different, our purport is correctly reported by our correspondent. He adds:—"Mr. Stevens, after finishing his business at Chittagong, proceeded to Mutihari in Champaran, where also that disease was prevailing on inspection duty." For our part, we see not much practical difference between the two statements. The element of fear that we introduced is a mere literary colouring. It was taken for granted. Nor is it a discredit to the greatest hero to fly before the plague unless he has special duty in connection therewith. It is mere foolhardiness to expose oneself for nothing in the midst of cholera or other equally serious epidemic. Wise men do not usually fail in courage and brave men are not habitually rash. We can scarcely believe that Mr. Stevens was not made anxious by the epidemic he encountered at Chittagong. If he really was devoid of such thoughts in presence of that danger, we really pity him and cannot surely respect him. In such a case he would be simply callous, not brave.

Visitations like the cholera and the small-pox, though our natural enemies, are no foemen worthy of our steel. As physician, as friend, as servant, public or private, it may be our duty to brave them, but our ordinary course is to keep them at arm's length, or rather at leagues' distance. For surely it is no part of our duty to court a miserable death for ourselves and our own.

In saying, in our impudent way, that Mr. Stevens ran away from Chittagong to inspect another time if need be, we did not impugn his courage in the least or his sense of duty. We certainly would have skeddaddled in the same honourable fashion.

In point of fact, Mr. Stevens did not run away but, after finishing his inspection in due course, he returned. So there is an end of the matter.

WE have not dwelt upon the ethics of the matter without a purpose. From the way in which our remark appears to have been taken in official circles and, above all, from the imprudent readiness with which officials below only the Lieutenant-Governor in rank without administrative urgency, actually risked themselves and one of them lost his valuable life, we conclude that a wrong sentiment prevails. The innovations of a doctrinaire head of the administration and the pressure of a new broom of a Lieutenant-Governor have created a new standard of official etiquette—a morbid sense of duty—which is demoralising the service and is in a subtle way hurtful to the public interests.

ORTHODOX Lahore is jubilating over the restoration of speech of a Hindu fakir. The story is that he cut off his tongue at Mirpura near Jhelum, and has got it back. A subscription is on foot to celebrate the miracle. It would be more to the purpose to inquire into the antecedents of the man. An authoritative denial or confirmation of the statement about his tongue would be a public service which would be everywhere appreciated. Since the early planting of Christianity, no such miracle has been known in the West.

ONE touch of Nature makes the whole world kin. It is not our Baboos that are jealous of one another. The handful of whitemen who are here to make their fortunes in different lines, are no less divided by antipathies and enmities. A remarkable illustration has just come to our notice. A British cur eaten up with envy and malice, who how wows to the very moon, thinking every body a dog, has gone to the trouble and expense of inserting the following advertisement in the Calcutta Exchange Gazette :—

"LOST"

A small smooth-faced liver colored thick set Terrier of uncertain breed and pedigree. Last seen in a bad temper rattling on the hills near Simla. Answers to the name of Sir Jeems, any one returning same to Elysium Row with above name entire will be rewarded.

Messrs. Mackenzie, Lyall & Co. ought to be called upon to explain how they came to lend themselves to so disreputable a business.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE NEW HONOURS.

WE usually accept the dispensations of the Fountain of Honour in loyal silence and submission. As a rule, we are content to record the new creations without note or comment, except perhaps in rare cases. In this, however, we find that we disappoint the public. Our constituents do not appreciate our philosophic calmness and reticence. They almost accuse us of shirking a duty. Not that they wish to see the favorites of the hour hurled down and dragged through the mire. For they wish us to approve as well as to condemn. They expect guidance in forming their judgments. And no doubt in many cases they want the necessary information. The grant of titles of distinction is a useful, and may be an important, instrument of administration as well as of national education. It is only its systematic abuse that has estranged respectable men from the subject. However, we bow to the general wish and decide to say something about the last Birthday Honour List. It would perhaps not be desirable, specially as matters now stand, to complain why this or that man, whom we think deserving of honor, has not been decorated. There may be particular reasons which might have induced Government to hesitate or delay in honoring him, and of which we may not be aware. It is sometimes hazardous to mention the names of any really deserving individual thus omitted, for that may do him an immense deal of harm, without any compensating good. All that concerns us, today at all events, is the List itself that gives the names of those honored on this occasion, and the public are at full liberty to express their opinions regarding the merits of each and every one of them.

First of all, we would take up the case of the Maharaja Pertab Singh of Kashmir. We think that after the scanty courtesy with which His Highness has, during the last few years, been treated by the Government of India, Lord Lansdowne has done a graceful act in getting the highest possible decoration conferred upon him; and we have no doubt the Maharaja will duly appreciate the honor coming as it does direct from Her Imperial Majesty the Queen Empress. The next decoration which calls for our approbation is that of the Maharaja of Vizianagram who has been raised to the dignity of a Grand Commander of the Indian Empire. A worthy son of a worthy father, he has, by his own continued good deeds, rightly earned the distinction, and we do not think that there will be any two opinions regarding him whether in or out of India. The name of the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces of Upper India reminds us of an inexplicable wrong. Sir Auckland Colvin was already a knight, having long ago earned his knighthood for important services rendered out of India, so the present creation is mere surplusage. The gift of the Crown is of course to be received with loyal respect, but a successful and brilliant administrator can scarcely feel thankful to the keepers of the Sovereign's honouring conscience for this tardy recognition of his distinguished career. Sir A. Colvin receives on the eve of his retirement an honour which is conferred upon Lieutenant-Governors on their entrance into office, almost as an appanage of it, like the simple knighthood of our old Supreme Court Judges and of the Chief Justices of the High Courts. It is incomprehensible how his eminent services in India during the last nine years, services which have enjoyed the approbation of Viceroy and Secretaries of States, could be passed over at successive Birthdays and New Year's Day after New Year's Day. No doubt Sir Auckland himself never bothered himself about these honours. Still there was clear failure of duty somewhere. In vivid contrast behold the treatment accorded to the late Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab! Without rhyme or reason, the most humdrum member of the Civil Service is overwhelmed with an honour to which he has no possible claim, which in his wildest dreams he could not aspire to!

We are indeed quite at a loss to account for the reason which has influenced the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India, to raise Sir James Lyall to the highest grade of an Indian Order. It is scarcely likely, that the late Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab may have rendered services to the Government of India which are not known to us. So far as we know, not a single Lieutenant-Governor of an Indian Province as such has yet been raised to this high dignity, although there are many who attained fame of a very high order by their administrative abilities and distinguished and varied services. Even Sir James's brother, Sir Alfred Lyall, who has earned a high and world-wide reputation, not only for important services of a varied character, but also for his interesting literary productions, has not been equally fortunate. The public will not be satisfied until they are enlightened as to the cause of this exceptionable preferment.

Among the Knight-Commanders of the Indian Empire, we find three lawyers, one of whom is a native of India. Justice Mathuswami Aiyer has established his reputation as a sound lawyer and efficient Judge, by eminent service on the Bench of the Madras High Court, and the Government have done honor to themselves by honoring him. Mr. Charles Pontifex was Judge of the Calcutta High Court, for ten or twelve years, and Legal Adviser to the Secretary of State for India for another similar period. As he was known to be a sound lawyer and was of very great use to the India Office, his decoration comes to him rather tardily. Mr. Evans is indeed very fortunate, but not beyond his merits. He has been a sort of standing member of the Imperial Legislative Council for more than twelve years. For an Indian barrister in leading practice who has no glorious vision of the woollen sack to tempt him to public spirit, this itself involves no small sacrifice. During all that time Mr.

Evans has been of signal service. Administration after administration has profited by his talents and ready resources, while his independent position, as a lawyer unconnected with the Crown, has enhanced the value of his support. Accordingly, his is the first case of a Barrister practising in the High Court, and not being an Advocate-General, who has been so honored. Of the newly made Companions of the Star of India, Sir Edward Buck has rendered exemplary service to Government in his useful and important sphere. Mr. Cotton is well-known to be an officer of ability and thorough acquaintance with Bengal, whose reputation, we are sorry to see, suffers from a general suspicion of his partiality to extreme views and fads of sorts. Towards the end of the last administration he had by an act of extraordinary indiscretion compromised himself. But his luck is equal to his ability and energy. An old friend has since come to the throne of Bengal and, as had been anticipated from the first, Mr. Cotton has become Chief of the scribes under the present régime, elbowing out the fidus Achates of the late Lieutenant-Governor. Still as a junior officer is understood to air himself as His Honour's right-hand man, the new title is a welcome proof that the confidence of the head of the Local Government in Mr. Cotton is unabated, and will go far to re-establish him in the proper influence of his office.

Mr. Romesh Chunder Dutt has been selected for a decoration under the Indian Empire, doubtless for his literary accomplishments and labors, but we cannot make out what services have been rendered by the Dewan of the Maharaja of Dumraon, which have entitled him to be bracketed with Mr. R. C. Dutt. They cannot be of the same species. Nothing succeeds like success, and that his Dewanship is a successful man is beyond question. Only we are yet in the dark what extraordinary services have been rendered by him to the Government and the public, that would justify his being placed in the rank of some of the most distinguished men of the day.

Among the purely Indian titles, we are glad to find that Moulvi Abdul Jubbar has been made a Khan Bahadoor, as we know him to be an officer of great distinction and independence of character. But we do not think he or his friends would look upon it as a great honor, when men inferior to him have received higher titles, and when men of a very inferior position, in all respects, have been bracketed with him.

The manner in which the title of Shams-ul-Ulama has been given away in late years, has been a source of great dissatisfaction and disgust to the learned of the Mahomedan community; and we pointedly drew attention to it last year. But as high European officials have entirely given up the study of Persian and Arabic, they are not in a position to appreciate real eminence in Arabic scholarship. The result is, that officials in power recommend certain individuals for the title of Shams-ul-Ulama, who manage to influence them in some way or another, the officials themselves being incapable of judging of the extent of their learning, and thus simply on the recommendation of those officials, the Government of India confer that title upon those parties. We believe that this title was created by Lord Dufferin solely with the object of honoring and bringing within the touch of Government, the most eminent Arabic scholars of India who, from their profound learning and exemplary retired and sanctified mode of life, are revered or rather worshipped by the Mahomedan community. A number of such venerable gentlemen were found and titles were conferred upon them on the first occasion. But since then, many others who have no claim whatever to the distinction, but who are the authors of some works in Persian or Urdu, or who are simply known to the authorities as Persian scholars, or who are the favorites of certain high officials, have been honored with the title, solely on the recommendation of those officials. Such a result has not only served to decrease the value of the honor so thoughtfully conceived in the first instance, but has been looked upon by the really venerable individuals who have got the title as an insult and a degradation to their eminence by being grouped together with men who by no means possess the same erudition and learning, or enjoy the respect and confidence of the Mahomedans. Another tendency has lately arisen—that of honoring with this unique title men who have adopted English habits and dress, and who are more familiar with English language and literature than with Persian and Arabic. We never thought that this title was created to reward such men, whatever their general scholarship. There are various other ways for appreciating the merits of such individuals, such as the titles of C.I.E., L.L.D., Khan Bahadur and so forth. But instead of that, these men are shoved into the ranks of retired men of eminence and sanctity famous for their learned lore, who do not court Government favor.

In the above view, we are not satisfied that the title just conferred on Mirza Hairat, Persian Professor in the Elphinstone College, is a happy one. He is undoubtedly a Persian scholar and is also the author of some Persian books, but that alone does not entitle him to be placed in the same fraternity with the select learned of India, for whose benefit alone the title came into existence. In proof of our contention we may say, that Mirza Hairat has been holding his post at Bombay for many years, but he was never considered all these years by the authorities at Bombay to be a fitting recipient of this honor. Finding, however, that men inferior to the Mirza have got this title, he might have pressed his claims to the honor, and his official superiors may have agreed with him that his claim was a proper one, and thus recommended him for it and obtained it for him. From what we know of the Mirza's accomplishments, we think that he would have been sufficiently honored by being made a Khan Bahadur, if it was considered necessary or advisable to honor him. As for the two Pundits who have been made Mahamahopadhyas, we think that they are both deserving of the honor. But this arises from the fact of there still being a number of high European officials who take an interest in Sanskrit learning as well as a number of Sanskrit scholars among the savants in Europe who have means at their disposal for distinguishing the merits of Indian Pundits. We can speak positively of Pundit Krishna Natha Nyayapanchanana of Purbasthali, in the District of Burdwan, not Nuddea as the official List erroneously puts it, than whom a profounder Hindu jurist does not live in these Provinces. The country beheld with surprise that he was not one of the first batch of Mahamahopadhyas when the title was created. The jealousy of the official Pundits must have kept him out.

We find that of late years there has sprung up a desire in the Local Governments to recommend Hindoo and Mahomedan gentlemen for the titles of Rai Bahadur and Khan Bahadur, who have distinguished themselves as Honorary Magistrates and Municipal Commissioners. Such a desire is no doubt a praiseworthy one. But the difficulty is, how are the comparative merits of the different Honorary Magistrates and Municipal Commissioners in different Provinces and Districts to be ascertained, and who is to do it? The result is, that if any Magistrate is favorably inclined towards a certain individual, or is pressed in his favor by a friendly sub-divisional officer, he sends up that individual's name with a recommendation and he is at once honored with a title, while many others filling similar posts in the same district or in other districts, much more worthily, continue unhonored because their names have not been sent up by their official superiors. Such invidious distinctions, therefore, create heart-burnings and unpleasantness, and otherwise cause a great deal of harm. The truth of this position was illustrated only a short time ago, by only one Municipal Commissioner of Calcutta being honored with a title, over the heads of scores of others, several of whom worked much harder and with much greater ability in the interests of the Corporation than this individual, who had somehow or other ingratiated himself into the good graces of the late Chairman. That lamented officer, however, found out when it was too late, the unworthy object of his caresses.

We find among the present recipients of the honors, that one Baboo Poran Chunder Bose, Honorary Magistrate of Manicktollah, 24-Pergannahs, has been made a Rai Bahadur. Although we have never heard his name or of his extraordinary and praiseworthy honorary work—living only about a couple of miles distant from Manicktollah—we congratulate him upon his good fortune. We take it for granted that he must have given satisfaction to the officer in charge of the Sealdah Court or the Magistrate of the 24-Pergannahs to entitle him to such honor. But the question is, out of more than a hundred Honorary Magistrates in the Town and Suburbs of Calcutta, many of whom have worked very hard in the discharge of their honorary duties, as will be evident from the latest Resolution of the Government of Bengal on the Police Administration of the metropolis, was there not another individual who had done equally well with this Baboo Poran Chunder Bose? We doubt not many had shown better zeal and turned out superior results than this unknown worthy. Such is the way to make titles cheap, and they have been brought low in the market indeed.

We have already adverted above that these titles become somewhat like a dishonor, when one of a very high position is bracketed with another of a very comparatively low status. This is illustrated by Babu Protol Chunder Chatterjea, the foremost pleader at the Lahore Chief Court, and who was once selected to fill the post of a Judge in that court—being bracketed with hospital assistants, police inspectors and the like.

We think that it is the duty of the Chief Secretaries of the various local administrations, to personally examine most carefully the claims of each individual recommended for a title, by the local authorities, and then to submit the names of the most eligible for the consideration of their chiefs, after scrutinizing most minutely the comparative merits of all.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpore, May 14.

Mr. B. Keightly, M. A., Barrister-at-law, General Secretary, Theosophical Society, Indian Section, was here the last two days and gave a couple of lectures on the following subjects :—

1st., On Postmortem existence of man.

2nd., Theosophy in practical life.

There is a cry for water here. The wells have almost been dried up. The Railway Company's tank is receding fast daily. The Bayley reservoir close to the hill, which was erected by the Railway Company a few years back at a large outlay is, quite dry. Not a drop of water is to be had there. Wild animals, such as leopards, tigers, &c., are said to be out of their lairs at dead of night to quench their thirst and to come to the adjacent tanks in the heart of the town. For the scarcity of water on the main line a great inconvenience is felt for the train arrangements and it is in contemplation to run the Chord Line trains via Loop shortly, till the crisis is over. The Railway Company is also devising a scheme to carry water from Monghyr (river Ganges) to this by rail to meet their demands for workshops and trains. The Municipal Commissioner who was criminally prosecuted for tampering witnesses, has, on conviction, been sentenced to a fine of Rs. 250 by the District Magistrate of Monghyr.

DEBATE ON THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

Sir Richard Temple acknowledged the pointed yet kind manner in which the right hon. gentleman had alluded to him in adverting to a plan of his own which he had more than once mentioned in the House. The plan always had reference to the Bill before the House, which had been in print for several Sessions. The plan would be found a modest one. He must admit that to form any scheme which would in any proper sense represent the population of India was an absolute impossibility. You might theoretically construct a system whereby constituencies could be formed in every district, but that would involve local Parliaments consisting of hundreds of members, and it was impossible to say, if such a system were introduced, what sort of men would be elected and how such Parliaments would work. But because such a representation of the people was impossible in this sense, it did not follow that some moderate scheme within sensible limits might not be propounded. His plan would be simply this. It was now proposed that 16 additional members should be given to the legislative Council of India. He supposed they might be elected by 16 selected cities in various parts of the great Indian dominion. He would like to select the cities, and they would be so chosen as to represent as nearly as possible various sections of the population. For the purpose of providing for a minority representation certain cities should be chosen which would select Mahomedans. All these cities would be places which had the elective principle in force within them for municipal and local purposes, and therefore the idea of election would be familiar to the citizens. To such a scheme there was this obvious objection—that these cities would not represent the country—that was to say the country in our sense of the term, as contradistinguished from the town. Nevertheless, their inhabitants would form fair specimens and types of the various forms of thought and sentiment which reigned in that vast population, and they would be great centres of native thought, activity, and industry. So far there would be, not a perfect, but yet a limited representation upon a scheme which was practicable; and because a perfect representation of town and country was impossible, that was no reason why we should not have some representation for the towns. According to that plan, it would be necessary that the Government should always provide itself with a majority. It would not do to leave to elected members in such a country as India anything like a control of legislation. Elected members would be there to help, not to supersede, but the advantage would be that, instead of having nominated members we should have men chosen by the suffrages of their country. At present every Governor who had a nomination endeavoured to choose a man who was a type and a representative, and every man he had himself nominated was exactly the man who would have been elected had there been an elective system in force. Within that moderate compass such a principle could be safely and effectually carried out. The plan was perfectly workable, and it was also absolutely consistent with this Bill. Although he quite acknowledged that our tenure in India depended upon good administration, good management, and conciliation of the people, its ultimate basis was upon the sword, and upon nothing else. Therefore we must have a majority on the Legislative Council, but as long as we had a majority he would like to make the minority a mirror and looking-glass of the sentiments of the people. These remarks which he made with regard to the Governor-General's Council might be applied to the Councils of provincial arcas—he would not call them local governments. He wished to take care that the various minorities should be represented, especially the great Mahomedan community. The hon. member for Manchester and the member for Donegal had referred to this point, but not one of these men would elect a Congress man; they would take no interest in an election. This being his humble plan—and the House would see that it was moderate and reasonable—it started with small beginnings, and it was quite compatible with this Bill. He would point out, however, how important it was that these things should not be arranged by that House, but should be left to the executive in India. It was impossible for them sitting in a committee in that House to make out an elaborate scheme. They must leave it to the Government of India. The hon. member for Manchester said that no plan would be satisfactory to the people of India which did not specifically include the principle of election. He might repeat the question—who were the people of India, and how were they represented? The hon. member said that the Congress represented the people of India. He traversed that statement in the strongest possible manner. The men who proposed the scheme would be swept into the sea tomorrow if British rule disappeared to-day. (Hear, hear.) He did not wish to disparage those who composed the National Congress. They were what the English had made them, and no man living had a greater share than he had in making them what they were, so he was not the one to disparage them. All he said was that they did not represent the population of India. The hon. member said they formed a nationality. He could not imagine any phrase less applicable to them than “a nationality.” That was just what they were not. The hon. member said the Congress spoke with the voice of the people of India. Nothing could be more contrary to the fact. The hon. member said they had great influence over the great masses of the people. They had no influence at all. They were looked upon as foreigners, with all the faults of foreigners, and perhaps none of their merits. No doubt they deserved to be popular, only the people of India did not seem to see it. He agreed with the member for Oldham. There was nothing that could be done to raise the natives intellectually and morally that he would not do, but to give them political power—they were the very last persons he would select. Until they showed greater moderation, greater sobriety, greater intelligence, greater self-control, he for one should not think of entrusting them with political power. Therefore he was not in favour of making any concession to the Congress particularly. They should take their place in the ranks of their fellow-citizens, and take their chance there. Much had been said about the masses. The masses in India were outside all conception of the matter in question. Besides the masses, the artisans and labourers in the field, there were distinct sets of classes who were very nearly outside any electoral system, and the Congress could not claim to represent many influential sections of the vast population. Perhaps the most important class in India are the village headmen. They had withstood the shock of revolution and the disasters of war, and they had come out like gold refined. These men, quite representative in their way, were totally outside any idea of the electoral system. Then there was the great class of peasant proprietors. They were everywhere, from Cape Comorin to the Himalayas. They were outside. Besides these were the frontier chiefs, the men who dominated the border, who kept back marauders and robbers, who were the wardens of the marches all around the frontiers of India. These hill tribes were nearly everywhere. They were like the bones in the body and the arteries. They were of the martial races, and they supplied the native officers for the infantry and cavalry. These men never heard of election. (Hear, hear.) The shopkeepers were numerous in every town and village; they had no notion of the principle of election. Then there was the important class the shipowners, the proprietors of boats—men who circumnavigated the great Indian peninsula, who formed the inland navigation, not equalled in any other country in the world. They never heard of it. Take the priesthood; they had great influence over the whole lives of the people from the cradle to the grave. These men were wholly innocent of the principle of election. Take the Brahmin who studied the ancient Sanscrit, the men who looked back to the dawn of ancient civilization, and who were the repositories of the religious traditions of the country. These men were innocent of the idea of the elective principle. So it was with the Mahatta Brahmins; and lastly there were the men of what he might call the old school—those who looked back to the ancient régime, who regard all Western civilization as an evil. These men would abhor the idea of election. He asked the House to reflect on the great variety and importance of all these classes and they would see what a powerful phalanx they composed. The Mahomedans were opposed to the principle. He had received repeated communications from them, entreating him to explain to the House that they were entirely opposed to the National Congress; and for this reason, that these Mahomedans knew that, forming as they did a very important and influential section indeed, they dreaded that an undue share of power might accrue to this National Congress, which consisted almost entirely of Hindoos and Parsees. He desired to speak of these races with all respect, but they did not represent the true feelings of the people of India. They were, in fact, merely like the swallows which portend the coming spring. The Mahomedans apprehended that they would be outvoted by the Hindoos, and they naturally wished to maintain some influence in the country. That was only reasonable. They asked, in effect, that there should be some arrangement for the proper representation to their important minority, which might now be numbered at between 50 and 60 millions. This last fact alone showed how hard and onerous this elective scheme must be in such a country as India. He asked himself this question—was the elective system at all in the hearts and minds of the people? His answer was that it was not. The dignity of headman was hereditary; so were the village offices; and almost all the ancient appointments held by Mahomedans were more or less hereditary. Here and there, however, germs of the elective system were to be found. The priests, for instance, were elected; though in what way no outsider could say. If the elective system were going to be introduced, the natives would have to be educated up to it and taught what it meant; and, to do this, they must lend themselves to the task. He had himself experimented with the elective system in Calcutta, but he had not found it altogether a success. It was almost as hard to get the Calcutta citizens to understand what it meant as it was to bring ratepayers to the poll at the London School Board or County Council elections. In Bombay, on the other hand, the elective plan had always been found to answer; and, with regard to the district boards which were originated under the régime of Lord Ripon, the principle of election would grow year by year, and no doubt in most towns of India a germ of the elective system was to be found. But if this plan were to be generally adopted and carried into effect, it would have to be by means of rules and regulations which should be framed here, and the working out of which should be left to those on the spot. The number of persons whom the Governor-General would have to consult and of others who would have to be propitiated and otherwise taken into account by him must be very large indeed. He praised this Bill because it left the details of the schemes which it intended to propose to be worked out on the spot. The Government of India would, no doubt, profit by a perusal of that night's debate. If an additional number of members were to be nominated by the Indian Government, he failed to see the danger of allowing those members to be elected. For all the reasons he had stated, he ventured to express two opinions—first, that this Bill was entirely worthy of the support of the House; and, secondly, that the amendment of the hon. member for Manchester ought not to have effect given to it.

Mr. Keay said the hon. baronet was like Balaam, for while in theory he blessed the elective principle, he in effect cursed it all through his speech. The question was whether the Bill as proposed by the Government did contain anything so near to a mandate as was supposed by the right hon. gentleman the member for Mid Lothian, and by other hon. members. He did not hesitate to prophesy that the Governor-General would never dream of exercising such power as was supposed to be conferred upon him in a mandatory way by the Bill as it now stood. The Governor-General would simply treat it as a dead letter. They had as yet no knowledge how the mandate to exercise the elective principle was to be better embodied in a Bill. The Bill as it stood contained nothing in the nature of a mandate, and without a mandate of some kind it was impossible to hope that the Indian authorities would put in force anything in the character of an elective principle in the government of that country. He ventured to say that existing facts ought to incline that House to the conviction that the government of India could not safely be carried on without the introduction of some modified elective arrangement. It was too much the fashion for the House to accept the views held by Anglo-Indian officials who had enjoyed high positions, and who invariably gave most bland assurances that everything was going on so well in India that there was little need for the House to attend to Indian affairs, much less to inaugurate any great or radical changes. Speaking from 30 years' experience of the real condition and wants of the people of India, he ventured strongly to protest against those views, which were mainly the offspring of an easy-going hope that that state of things was sound which they themselves personally had administered, and in the administration of which they had secured comfort, honour, and advantage. The bureaucracy which governed India were frightened at the bare idea of the elective principle being extended to the government of that country, because they knew perfectly well that real representatives of the people would feel it their first duty to insist upon the reduction of the vast salaries and the numerous appointments held by Europeans, whereby natives were to an undue extent excluded from the public service of their own country, and its revenues were eaten away to a quite unnecessary extent. A return presented to Parliament nine years ago showed that out of the 68,000 Europeans in the whole of India 25,000 held Government positions with a salary of more than £100 a year, the total of their salaries amounting to £13,000,000 a year, £4,000,000 of which was entirely spent out of the country by absentees. Out of 285,000,000 natives only 11,000 held Government posts with a salary of over £100 a year, the total of their salaries amounting only to £2,250,000; and he believed that the new return would show that matters now were even worse. (Hear, hear.) In connexion with India policy simply meant pounds, shillings, and pence in the shape of salaries to Europeans, and there would be the strongest possible opposition to any Governor-General making any use of mere powers like those delegated to him in the Bill now before the House. An even more serious reason why the elective principle ought to be introduced without delay was equally, he feared, a reason why its introduction would be opposed by the European bureaucracy—that was, the enormous and ever-increasing impoverishment which was now taking place under our rule as it at present existed. It was only by absolutely excluding elected members that our officials were able to go about crying peace and prosperity everywhere while the fact was well known that enormous poverty and decadence were going from day to day and year to year throughout the Indian Empire. In the Budget debate last year the hon. baronet the member for the Evesham Division had talked of the wonderful prosperity of the Indian people. Why, if the people were so prosperous, did the hon. baronet think it necessary when in Bombay to introduce his Draconian revenue law? He proposed to give some particulars showing the hideous severity of that law.

The Speaker said that he could not see the relevancy of this to the Bill before the House. The hon. member was not entitled to review the whole state of India on a Bill for introducing elective Councils.

Mr. Keay explained that his object was to show the way in which the people were at present ground down under enactments passed by Legislative Councils in the constitution of which the elective principle was ignored. His contention was that the elective principle should be introduced without delay in order that oppressive laws might no longer be passed without the sanction of the representatives of the people. They were often told that the taxes paid by the natives of India were light and the fact that there were only insignificant arrears was pointed to as a proof of the truth of the statement. But the reason why there were no arrears would be found in the stringency of the laws passed by non-elective Councils to enforce the collection of taxes. He could tell of the imprisonment of the inhabitants of a whole village because one cultivator was in arrear with his payments. No assertion was more often made than that the cultivators were only taxed to the extent of half of their net produce. That was a fallacy. Last year he had prepared for him an industrial census of a village in the Bombay Presidency.

The Speaker observed that the hon. member's remarks were hardly relevant to the Bill.

Mr. Keay, coming to another point, said that he proposed to quote some authorities to prove that the idea of elective representatives was by no means as new in India as some hon. members appeared to think. Sir T. Munro, speaking of the days prior to British rule, said: "In all Indian villages there was a regularly constituted municipality by which revenue and police affairs were administered, and which exercised to a very great extent magisterial and judicial authority." Sir John Malcolm, dealing with the same topic, declared that the municipal and village institutions of India maintained order and peace within their respective limits by the common consent of all ranks. It had been stated that it was only as late as the 14th century that a large tract on the western coast of India had been governed by four senators and a president, who were elected by the people every three years. If we really intended to govern 280,000,000 of people to their content we ought to allow them representative government to, at all events, a certain extent. He had no desire to be an alarmist, but being the only member of that House who had had official experience in the agricultural districts of India he had no hesitation in saying that our extremely expensive and impoverishing system of government in that country was conducing to a terrible feeling of hopelessness and despair on the part of the people of that country, who found themselves reduced under it from the position of well-to-do farmers to that of landless labourers. (Hear, hear.) It was for that House to determine whether India was to be maintained as a human cattle farm whether, by accepting the principle of the amendment, they would give a pledge to the people of that country that they intended honestly to establish in it representative institutions. (Hear, hear.)
